Reinout: Life is very difficult. Do you know, Papa, I think it is almost impossible for a man always to know how to act as a gentleman.

The Count: Certainly not. Nothing is easier. It becomes a habit, like all others. Like speaking French without mistakes.

M. de Souza: Never do anything mean to a woman—except under the cloak of "love." A gentleman should not save but spend, wisely, if possible, and, if not possible, ill. Money must flow, or it freezes.

The Countess: A gentleman is a man who breaks all the commandments—genteelly—and who keeps his linen scrupulously clean. —The Gleaner.

Art for Art's Sake

Scene: Committee room at the Hopkins' Institute. Time: Seven days before the spring exhibition. Characters: Mr. Lickman, Mr. Scratchers, Mr. Foolin, of the hanging committee; President Learn, of the Art Association.

Mr. Lickman (turning over a canvas with his thumb and forefinger): What's this?

Mr. Learn: That is my portrait by Signor Landowner.

Mr. Lickman: Portrait? Did you sit for it, or was it enlarged from a photograph?

Mr. Learn (haughtily): Let us get down to business.

Mr. Foolin: I don't see any pictures to judge. None of these is worth a place on the walls.

Mr. Learn: What's the matter with these portraits?

Mr. Scratchers: I don't see any portraits.

Mr. Learn: Gentlemen, this is no time for jokes. We must get down to the business in hand.

Mr. Scratchers: I see nothing here worthy to hang beside my Vision of a Lone Tree on a Hill. And you can't hold an exhibition of one picture.

Mr. Lickman: I have two pictures here—A Sailor Mending His Jersey and a portrait of Foxy Grandpa after his Morning Shave.

Mr. Foolin: My Arizona Venus and A Bacchus of Mexico are what I call

OUR OPINION

Buying Entrance to the Coronation

English newspapers are just now highly wrought up over another threatened American invasion. Their spleen has been roused by the ebullient and highly garnished stories turned out by the competing Eastern yellow journals regarding the lavish show of riches which certain American millionaires will make at the forthcoming Coronation. Of course the stories of gorgeous gowns, coronets costing fortunes, ropes of pearls and jewels without price, are all figments of the panting reporter's brain but the English journals don't know that and take the yarns and the accompanying pictures of fake gowns and diadems in all seriousness. The dignified London Times completely lost its composure on reading in a leading New York paper the sensational story with full yellow garnishment that "the reason why the Koh-i-noor was to be set in Queen Alexandra's crown was because the Queen was afraid that the jewels to be worn by a certain wealthy American woman at the ceremony would outshine her own. The American in question was said to have ordered a coronet for the occasion similar to the Empress Josephine's, to cost one million two hundred and fifty thousand dollars." After reading the wild item the Times snaps out:

"If it were known in England how certain Americans are using the coronation as a means of advertising themselves, an order forbidding the presence of unofficial foreign persons would centainly be issued."

The St. James Gazette lays down the item with the tart comment that "the worthy American dame is somewhat 'previous' if it be true that she has ordered such a coronet to wear at King Edward's coronation. Such stern republican simplicity would be quite out of place at a gorgeous survival of feudal splendor like the coronation. It is clear, therefore that, the ceremony must be a strictly family party, to which even our own good cousins from over the water cannot be admitted."

Truth consoles itself and its readers as follows: "

"The King, I am glad to note, has decided that Americans are not to be admitted to the coronation, even though they may come arrayed in their most gorgeous vestments and robes of pearls and diamonds. The space in Westminster Abbey is limited. The pageant will be paid for by the British taxpayer, and until every taxpayer who may wish to view the ceremony finds a seat, there must be no admittance for the representatives—male or female—of foreign shoddydom. There is the more reason for insisting on this if it be true, as asserted, that some of those who claim a right to be present are offering to sell their tickets in New York to the highest bidder."

The British press will not have any difficulty in keeping wealthy American women arrayed in gorgeous vestments and wearing one million two hundred and fifty thousand dollar coronets outside the coronation ceremonies, because no American women thus bedecked will apply for admission but they'll never be able to keep out the wealthy Americans who care to spend the price of the tickets to see the show, for there isn't any doubt but what, as on previous occasions, many degenerate representatives of Briton's ancient nobility will be eager to barter their family tickets, even though the King has imposed disgrace on the nobleman caught in such traffic.

Russia's Great Commercial Schemes

Gradually it is coming to light that the great Siberian railway is only one of a series of great engineering problems which Russia has contemplated for some time in her immense scheme of bettering her commercial prospects. Outlines of two other projects are now fairly well known: to join northern and southern Russia by a canal system for developing internal commerce and the creation of an inland sea in Asia, both problems of water communication. That which has longest been advocated is a great canal across European Russia from the Baltic to the Black sea, utilizing the river systems by joining the northward flowing Duna with the Dneiper. The estimated cost of this canal is one hundred and fifty million dollars, and it would traverse the best agricultural soil of the land. The great cost of the new Siberian railway has crippled this scheme for a time. But the plan for creating an inland sea in Asia arouses the liveliest interest among the Siberian inhabitants. The destruction of the great forests there has caused a marked decline in the humidity of the country. The result is the increasing liability to famine, always caused by drought, and the forestry laws are an insufficient remedy for the evil. Various remedies have been proposed and the one most favored at present is that of diverting the Tobol and Obi, northward flowing rivers, into Central Asia. The details of the scheme have been worked out by M. Demchenke, an eminent Russian engineer. It is estimated that in an area of over three hundred thousand square miles the rainfall would be increased so as to change the whole character of the country, turning the unproductive steppes and the deserts of Turkestan into land habitable by a settled population. All these schemes are well calculated to increase enormously the food-producing and commercial utilities. The steady perseverance of Russia in achieving her aims, combined with her patience and the force of a great historic tradition, can hardly fail to win new engineering triumphs as notable as that of the Siberian railway. This scheme of diverting a river to flood a barren territory is no new one in the history of nations. The last great one to receive the serious attention of economists was proposed a few years ago by a French engineer. He offered to cut a channel across the highlands bordering the Algerian seacoast, and then to turn the waters of the Mediterranean into the Sahara, transforming the great desert into a vast inland sea. In this case the proposition excited something very much like consternation, since, if such a thing were done, it would undoubtedly so affect the climate of Europe as to convert the northern countries—Norway, Sweden and the British Islands —into regions of almost bitter coldness. Oddly enough a scheme of a somewhat similar nature is just now causing considerable comment in England. It relates to an alleged plan on the part of King Menelek to protect himself in case he should come in conflict with the Anglo-Egyptian government. The assertion is made that this picturesque monarch of Abyssinia has had the problem worked out for him by French engineers for the diversion of the waters of the Blue Nile eastward into Lake Demebea, and thence by an artificial channel into the Red Sea. Of course the result of any such operation would be to lower the waters of the Lower Nile and to prevent the annual irrigation upon which Egypt depends for her harvests. The story seems improbable. There may be one element of truth in it and that is that Menelek at one time entertained such a plan in considering a scheme for protecting Abyssinia.

About Evening Schools

Ella Wheeler Wilcox, in the course of one of her misty vaporings, has taken occasion to regret that Carnegie and Miss Helen Gould have not let their benevolence take the form of donations toward the maintenance of evening schools, which, in the opinion of Ella, are doing such a lot of good. Evening schools are all right in their way, but Ella talks blithely from theory, rather than from familiarity with facts. Evening schools should be encouraged when regarded as places where children, obliged to labor through the day, are given the opportunity to get in the evening hours such schooling as they would otherwise be deprived of. The primary idea was to prevent unfortunates from growing up illiterate, but any one who chances into one of our evening classes will be struck not by the number of children, but by the number of adults who are taking advantage of the opportunity afforded. It is not plain reading, spelling, grammar and elementary mathematics, but foreign languages, bookkeeping, industrial and architectural drawing, stenography, and other accomplishments which are being taught, and these, if appearances are any indication, to young men and women who are able to pay for what they get. It is true that these deserve some credit for spending their evenings in mental improvement but the object in establishing evening schools was not to copete with private institutions, and there is no more reason for supplying adults with the opportunities for accomplishments than there is for setting them up in business or endowing them with substantial purses. In this city at least, where so many of the primary schools are death traps and breeding places for disease, the sums of money expended in teaching fancy branches gratis to people able to pay their way, would be more sensibly dispensed in providing proper school facilities for the children of school age. Evening schools are, like a good many other benevolent projects, getting beyond the bounds which were originally set for them, and it would be just as well to take stock and shorten sail a bit. As it looks just now, it is only a question of time before there will be a demand for instrumental music and voice culture. Only let some one with the proper amount of pull appear on the scene, and the classes would be formed forthwith. The public would have to pay, and as to pupils, they would flock in by the hundred, provided the course were easy and required no effort. Instead of calling for public benefactions, what is wanted is a great deal more of individual effort. With public libraries and facilities on all hands, and the complete elucidations afforded by modern text books, it is lack of mental activity which stands in the way of advancement, not lack of school opportunities. Let any pupil of the present day overhaul the attic, and see what he can make of the ill-printed and mapless geographies of the early part of the last century, the grammar modeled on the Latin, and plentifully besprinkled with Latin terms, and the arithmetics with their intricate puzzles of problems; let him compare print, and prices and consider the dearth of supplementary assistance, and then ask whether it is more schools or more study that is needed. Opportunities, like everything else, are valued according to their rarity and cost. It is not schooling that makes education; not teaching that insures learning.

Make Way for the Fashionable Disease

And now it is propesed to make disease fashionable; to entertain it with the compliments of the season; to bestow on it the wholesome benefits of the "community of interest" idea. Not long ago there was organized in this city a locomotor ataxia club with affiliations in the East. None but those similarly afflicted were eligible. For very good reasons the Thespians, or "bad actors," as some of them preferred to call themselves, did not go in for dancing and outdoor sports as do the members of Oakland's select Appendicitis club. They preferred to gather in the inglenook and recount the pleasures of the good old times. But their idea was spread by giddy bacteria and gay microbes and the result has been fruitful in all sorts of germ cells. Last week the smallpox victims in two widely different sections of the country set about ameliorating each others' condition. At Bloomfield, New Jersey, the inmates of the Isolation hospital have planned a series of dances, even the members of the orchestra being sufferers from this disease. At Omaha, Neb., the smallpox patients in the Emergency hospital have organized a golf club and have links covering forty acres. It wasn't so very long ago that the patients in our own Pest House out in the Potrero organized a gun club to go shooting on the marshes in that vicinity. But the authorities cut short its life when they discovered that the patients frequently met and talked with outsiders when on their shooting trips. All of which goes to show that those suffering the most grievous maladies are susceptible to the pleasures of sociability and abase pain and despondency to elevate the conviviality of those similarly afflicted. Men become brothers in locomotor ataxia and appendicits as well as in charity, gastronomy and the arts. The day may come when some other disease than appendicitis will lead the fashion. If it does there will then be only a short time till exclusive diseases will be represented by high-priced clubs and the dude of the period will be boasting of his membership in the "loco" club where a poor man can't get above the "rheumatism" step.

The Saunterer

Society Girls to the Rescue

Jessie Fillmore and Amy Gunn would be blue-ribboned and bemedaled if society were prepared for its belles to blossom into heroines. Last Saturday these Lenten maidens ignored the "world, the flesh, and the devil," and escorted to the park Augustina Morales, the pretty young Guatemala girl who was brought here by a man named Baffett. He boasted on shipboard that he had bought the girl from her Central American mother for two hundred dollars. The authorities placed the girl under the wing of the Chinese Presbyterian mission until her mother could be heard from and a peg driven to hang the charge against this purchaser of a white slave.

Tried to Kidnap the Senorita

The girl has been under the care of Miss Cameron for two months, but were it not for the bravery and presence of mind displayed by Miss Fillmore and Miss Gunn she would once more be in the power of Baffett. It was late last Saturday afternoon when they returned from the park with the Senorita Morales. When within a stone's throw of the Mission a man suddenly sprang from one of the alleys that network the district. He grabbed the senorita and whisked her off the main street into an alley before the girls realized what was happening. Not knowing into what tortuous blind passage he might lead them they quickly followed and dragged the Spanish girl from him. They screamed lustily for help, meanwhile warding off the man's efforts to recapture the girl. Fortunately an outlook for the Mission heard their cries and Miss Cameron and the guard ran out to their assistance while Baffett beat a hasty retreat.

Love Freed One Slave

This has opened the eyes of the authorities to a nefarious slave trade that passes belief. Augustina Morales, facts show, is not the only Central American girl who has been sold into slavery here. Instances of Mexican girls sold by their parents and brought to this post are also being unearthed. It is whispered that the beautiful Mexican wife of a prominent local merchant was purchased by her husband for five hundred dollars gold, and brought here. Subsequently the merchant fell very much in love with her and married her. The couple are now very happy and have several handsome children. The Augustina Morales case is evidently not unique of its class.

Declines to Marry Him

Miss Morales, in her simple, unsophisticated way, explains that she saw nothing improper in her mother's selling her to a "Gringo," who promised that she should live a life of besatined, bejeweled ease. Baffett, who is a widower, registered her on the steamer as his "wife." When he was haled into court here he seemed willing enough to escape his trouble by marrying the girl, though it was not so stipulated on the "bill of sale." But the senorita, in her childish fashion, tearfully declared that she did not love the "Gringo," and did not wish to marry him. So she was sent to the mission. Miss Fillmore and Miss Gunn offered to help dissipate her doldrums by giving her a day at the park and cliff. Amy Gunn has spent several years in Spain and drips Spanish softer than honey from the comb. Augustina was as happy as a little child on the jaunt and delighted at the chance to talk to some one who knew her language. The sudden appearance of Baffett was a sensational climax to the day and gave Jessie Fillmore and Amy Gunn a chance to show their fibre.

Somewhat Uncertain for the Bride

Although Samuel Cheyney and his bride, Bessie Wall, are flitting to Europe their troubles are by no means over, for the lady who was beaten in her suit to establish herself as his wife is proceeding to carry the case to the Supreme Court. One cannot help wondering what will be the position of the Cheyneys in case the higher court should overrule the lower tribunal.

THE STANDARD FOR CHAMPAGNE QUALITY IS

THE WORLD OVER

The Committee Fell on its Knees

The controversy over the hanging of certain pictures at the Hopkins exhibit is reminiscent of a little mistake a committee of local artists perpetrated some years ago. Susan Sroufe Loosley, a sister of Mrs. John Merrill, had just returned from studying abroad, and friends urged her to send some of her work to our local salon. Mrs. Loosley sent a picture of which she had reason to be proud. Fancy her wonder when it was returned as unworthy of hanging beside the masterpieces of local artists. The fact that the picture had won the gold medal for its class at the Paris salon salved any chagrin Mrs. Loosley might otherwise have felt. She had not thought it necessary to ticket the picture with its foreign triumph, preferring to let the committee discover its merits—but our knights of the brush and palette did not recognize its worth. The story leaked out before opening day and raised such a jeer in artdom that the committee were brought to their knees and begged Mrs. Loosley to let them hang the picture. They declared that it was all a hideous mistake; that the wrong picture had been returned; that a blind artist could feel the breadth and soul in her work. But no amount of art jargon and explanation could regild the committee in the public estimate. Their judgment had been put to the test and found wanting according to Paris standards.

Croesus Versus Cupid

Hearts are never supposed to be trumps in the smart set, and Croesus is said to have made Cupid pack his arrows and try less worldly targets. Of a truth there are probably as many love matches as marriages of convenience scored against society. And according to a matchmaker with a kink for statistics, the marriages for love have not stood the test of time as well as those where Cupid had no finger in the pie. She ran over the marriages of the last ten years at a little luncheon the other day, and proved her assertion to the satisfaction of the other guests. Even Mrs. Burton Harrison and Mrs. Van Rennsalaer Cruger never marry their silk-lined heroines to celluloid cuffs and collars. Mrs. Harrison and Mrs. Cruger sometimes give their brides a preliminary canter of poverty—the sort of poverty that includes four servants. "Society girls should marry money, or if they have money enough of their own they should marry position," is the edict of our local arch matchmaker. The sentimentalists may shiver at this and call it cold as cracked ice, but if money and position are the things the dear girls want they certainly ought to marry them, for love won't fill in the chinks made by the absence of these two talismen.

Cases of O'er True Love

Marrying for love is regarded as a vagary by the smart set. But staying single is impatiently pronounced madness. There are several instances of "first love" remaining "last love," and society has never ceased to wonder at such constancy. Daisy Casserly, Flora Low and Jennie Blair are three examples of this—these young women were not the "victims of unrequited love," but their affection was returned. In each case there was a different impediment that prevented their marrying the men of their choice. The years have not wooed them to a loveless marriage, and if not faithful to their first loves they are at least constant to first ideals.

Cost of a Beauty's Smiles

Paris papers are still discussing the provocative advertising suit brought by La Belle Otero against an Englishman. The gay danseuse demanded that he should be made to pay a bunch of bills for furniture, jewels and dresses which she claimed he had undertaken to defray. As he was a man of prominence it was thought he would be mulcted rather than face the notoriety but the Briton was game for the bills were high. The fair Spaniard was non-suited but she attained her object—publicity. Incidentally the Englishman's counsel offered the spicy announcement during the hearing that his client was only one of a train of admirers who enjoyed La Belle Otero's smiles for two or three years and that the pleasure had cost him three hundred thousand dollars.

Farmers on the Water Front

A report that John Mackenzie, the new member of the Board of Harbor Commissioners, intends to make not a few appointments from the interior of the State reminds me of the farmers that were put in collectors' and wharfingers' jobs during the administration of Governor Stoneman, much to the disgust of local Democrats, but to the infinite amusement of shipping circles and the water front. They seemed to have been chosen for their ignorance of things marine, and out of the entire lot not more than two had ever seen salt water. One day one of the yokels who had been installed as a collector at one of the wharves hailed the master of a deep-water ship who was just going ashore: "I say there, captain, hev ye heerd haow many head o' ship got in yesterdey?" The skipper's answer was a look of pity and disgust. Another brilliant wharfinger, resplendent in much new brass and braid, went aboard of a Britisher. After gazing aloft at her forest of yards and sticks for several minutes in undisguised amazement he went to an open hatch and looked down into the cavernous depths of the vessel's hold. A look of wondrous awe came over his face and he stepped back from the hatch combing a few paces and stamped on the deck. "B'gosh," he said to a sailor who was standing near him, "it's holler, isn't it?" "Of course she is, you —— fool," said the salt. But Sammy Braunhart when he was Port Warden earned the contempt of a whole ship's company by addressing a mate thus: "Say, open that door," and he indicated a hatch, "and let me down in your cellar so I can see what you have there."

Among the debutantes said to have succumbed to Cupid during the first season is Miss Katherine Herrin. Reddick McKee Deperu, the stock broker, is the man accredited with having won her nineteen-year-old heart. Reddick has been so long in commerce that he can tell an heiress by her looks. Wherever you see the girls with a dot of a million or two, there you see Reddick. He is a bright, good-looking chap, and he has a fund of small talk that makes the bud think him the dearest darling ever. Miss Cohen of Alameda was his first crush, but Lieutenant Bent won her. There was a time when Florence Breckenridge had him in her train, but she was whisked off to Europe. At one time it looked as if he and Grace Spreckels were surely going to make a go of it, but John D. Spreckels has a way of settling penniless aspirants by remarking to them incidentally that no man can marry his daughter unless he has a hundred thousand. But Reddick is a bright fellow, and will doubtless succeed in his aspirations.

Isabel McKenna's Diplomacy

The news that Lily Oelrichs and Isabel McKenna have broken biscuit at a love feast will be an interesting tidbit for the gossips. Miss Oelrichs happened to be in Washington on the day set for Miss McKenna's luncheon, and Isabel held out the olive branch, probably to show the world that the green-eyed monster had no fangs on her. Miss Oelrichs accepted—she could hardly refuse—and it was noted that the two girls were frankly cordial. They were naturally watched with some curiosity by the other guests, but one who had not read the history of Peter Martin's heart affairs would never have guessed that Miss McKenna had been a predecessor of the fair Lily. Isabel McKenna has not lived in the diplomatic circle for nothing. That luncheon to Miss Oelrichs and her attitude was a wily stroke worthy of the Dean of the Corps.

Peter Martin's Bon Mot

Peter Martin and several New York friends were discussing bon mots by the club fireside and Peter told one over which the Gotham smart set has been smiling ever since. Peter, it seems, wrote a letter to his mother, in regard to some matter connected with his marriage, and she disagreed from him on some of the points. She wound up her objections with this clincher:

"I ought to know, my dear, boy, for I was married before you were born."

"So I was brought up to believe," answered Peter, "but I am glad to have it in black and white from your own pen."

Confessed Her Sin Penitently

Perhaps the choicest and most delectable bit of gossip now going the rounds of the tea tables is the story of a matron who went for a moonlight stroll over the golf links with a fascinating bachelor who was old enough to know better—so was the lady for the matter of that, but the bachelor has a very winning way. It seems that the tryst was originally planned with a girl who was then visiting the matron. On the night that the girl was to meet him she had sudden qualms and confessed the proposed moonlight ramble to her hostess. The matron pronounced it a bit too unconventional and declared that the man ought to be punished for proposing such a thing. She determined to meet him at the golf house herself and hand him a large slice of her mind.

Caught the Confused Matron

When eleven o'clock came and the matron did not return the girl imagined that she had met with some accident—had probably been "held up" on the way. She held herself responsible for the awful fate which she felt sure her hostess had courted for her sake. As the matron's husband was out of town she rang up his brother, and told him of the dilemma. Together they went to the rescue and finding no trace of Madame they waited around the deserted golf house awhile, hoping for some clew. In about half an hour a couple came in sight and proved to be the missing matron and the cavalier.

"Mrs. —— had such a long scolding to give me that we didn't dare to stand still for fear we'd chill," glibly explained the suave bachelor.

"I couldn't resist taking a walk, it was so lovely," contradicted the confused matron.

Somehow the cat has jumped out of the bag. It is suspected that the girl for whom she walked by proxy ungratefully slipped the knots.

Blackballs Shower at the Pacific Union Club

Just at present the Pacific-Union club is having a spasm of exclusiveness. Apparently no applicant for membership, unless he has the millions of Pierpont Morgan, will be admitted to the club. Some of the blackballing has made the hair of members with candidates to stand on end. The election committee is the haughtiest ever known in the club. There is no redress for applicants residing here, but New Yorkers have a way of wreaking vengeance. When Elisha Dyer was out here a few years ago he was blackballed. Later, when George Crocker and Downey Harvey went to New York, and had their names put up at the Union club their friends were warned to take them down if they wished to save them. Something like a feud exists between the clans in the fashionable clubs of the two cities.

Seems to be Happy with Either

Smart society in Oakland is amused by the apparently transferred affection of one of its gilded youths. Since a boy he has been prone to seek the society of women older than himself. When a certain dashing widow of some remaining beauty arrived here from the Southland and was enthusiastically admitted to the exclusive coterie in which this chevalier-of-dames moves, he fell an immediate victim to her fulsome charms. This devotion has been going on for something like a year, the widow amusing everybody by her almost girlish enjoyment of the situation. A few weeks ago the captivating widow went East and it was freely predicted that the lovesick youth would soon follow her. To everybody's surprise, however, he has been looking anything but cast down and the other day he startled his set by being discovered making goo-goo eyes at a smart and pretty woman on this side of the bay, who is living apart from her husband. Oddly enough, she is at least four years older than the widow, but she carries this handicap in a far better way. This transference of attentions at such short notice to a woman who can go her rival a lot better in age and worldly experience is amusing society exceedingly. The young man is well liked and takes his gentle quizzing with cheerfulness and amiability.

The Baron as a Diplomat

Here is a story of the diplomatic way in which the Baron von Shroeder used to soothe his wife when she was irritated over his spending too much money:

"Baron," said she, "Don't you know that is my money?"

"Of course it is, my dear," he murmured, "but aren't you my Mamie?"

What could she say?

His Parthian Shot

One reason has just come to light for the bitterness displayed by D. M. Delmas in his excoriation of Baron Von Shroeder at the memorable San Rafael trial. It seems that on the morning of the argument the two men met, and the Baron said, "And so you, Mr. Delmas, are prosecuting me. I am extremely afraid for it takes a thief to catch a thief." Shortly afterwards the attorney went into court and made his noted "Go back to your Baroness" speech. Von Schroeder winced and in a stage whisper said, "Go back to your Baroness, Mr. Delmas."

The young Baron Alec von Shroeders are as happy as two turtle doves. They gave Californians just a peep at their bliss and now have gone back to Europe to remain a year. Baron "Alec" will then resign from the army and come to California to pass his life with his bride.

For over half a century "Jesse Moore" Whisky has held its supremacy as the best, purest and most palatable.

Luck of the Williams Heir

The birth of a son last week to Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Williams Jr. has settled the disposition of the Williams estate. Had Tom Williams died without heirs his fortune would by the will of the late General Williams have gone to young Frank Johnson of San Rafael. General Williams provided in his will that only his direct descendants should inherit, and so widows of his sons and vice versa were to have nothing. The Williams baby cuts Johnson Jr. out of nearly four hundred thousand dollars, but as he has already that amount in his own right he is doing pretty well for a youngster.

Cupid's Cruel Work under the Palms

I advise all young women who are contemplating matrimony with South Sea islanders, whole or half caste, to read Louis Becke's tales of the tropic seas. If they are capable of drawing conclusions therefrom they may be saved many unpleasant repinings after the fatal knot is tied. Marriages with half-castes are quite the thing since Porto Rico, Hawaii and the Philippines were added to our possessions. Generally these marriages have the white blood on the bridegroom's side and in that case it is only the offspring that suffer for the mixture of races. A short time ago an Oregon man, Albert Brazee, married one of the prettiest of the Filipino belles, Consuela Palma, the heiress of Judge Jose Palma, in his time a famed justice of Manila. This marriage promises to be one of the happy ones for it was a decided love match.

Rumors of Domestic Troubles

The rumors of another dark and fair alliance are not so rose-hued, and all sorts of things are whispered in the letters coming from Honolulu. It seems a pity that the Harry Macfarlanes' dream of love could not last. Some say it is another case of half-caste blood cropping out where least expected. In spite of the denials of Mrs. Dole, who but recently became the bride of General Dole of Honolulu, those who are close connected with her declare she and her husband have practically separated. There are various reasons assigned for the domestic trouble. One is said to be that the bride found upon her arrival in Honolulu the usual appendages to an Hawaiian household and objected to being confronted with so many seemingly little living likenesses of her bridegroom. Another story is that the Doles enlivened their bridal passage across the Pacific with wordy differences of opinion, the husband objecting to his young wife's high spirits on board ship.

How the Gay Widow got her Gift

The name Christmas mentioned this week in Eastern dispatches in connection with a scandal regarding the sale of the Danish West Indies, recalls a tale which stirred San Francisco some years ago. A lady of that name figured prominently in it. She was very beautiful and very brilliant. When she came here from the East she brought letters to some of our best people, among them the Lloyd Tevises, at whose house she became an honored guest. It was not very long, however, until society saw how the land lay between host and visitor. It took longer to open the eyes of the hostess to the true condition of affairs. The smart set was greatly amused with the comedy. Strained relations finally developed and rumors of a probable divorce between the man and his wife. One day a valuable Market street lot was hastily transferred from the man to the Eastern fair one in the guise of a registered "sale." Almost immediately after she had bagged the game she returned to Washington. The local wags dubbed the property "the Tevis Christmas gift."

Miss Guygirl—I thought her husband was considered so smart. He doesn't seem to know anything.

Miss Maygirl—Know anything! Why, dear girl, he doesn't even suspect anything.

Duplicating Our Beauties

Those who call Mrs. Edward Moore Robinson a duplicate of Lillian Russell—and that is one of the comparisons some of Mrs. Robinson's girly-girl admirers are making—are talking through their Easter confections. Mrs. Robinson's only resemblance to the airy fairy Lillian of comic opera fame is that both are blondes. Their coloring is similar; their features are very dissimilar. However there is a duplicate of Lillian Russell in San Francisco who, in all except inches, might successfully counterfeit the idol of New York. This is Mrs. Helen Walker Tay, who is considered by many to be an even nearer perfect type of blonde than is that lovely grass widow, Mrs. McCarthy. Mrs. Tay is beginning to go about a bit, by the way, and she is prettier than ever. Her mourning, no longer in the heavy crepe and veil stage, is marked by its simplicity and is immensely becoming. As was the usual thing before her husband's death, Mrs. Tay in her walks abroad is invariably chaperoned by her mother.

Does She, oh does She Touch Up?

Mrs. Robinson had not been in the glare of society's calcium for more than a day before the girls who were invited to meet her at luncheon and tea began to whisper that the golden hue of her hair was—well, not quite natural, that the tint was too even and unshaded and that she must use—whisper the word—a bleach. The fact is that Mrs. Robinson, like many Californian blondes, has always touched up her hair. It is a tradition at the Denman school, where she gleaned some of her sheaves of learning, that Ailene Ivers was the first Denman girl to bleach her hair. She came to school one day with her hair almost a peagreen shade, from misplaced confidence in peroxide. But she was always a blonde and when a little girl was a real towhead. She was always a beauty, too, and the gracious manner that charms all those who meet her nowadays is not assumed, but a natural gift.

Blondes in the Beauty Parade

In the local swim nearly every other woman seems to be a natural blonde. There are grades of fairness and occasional Titian heads, but the brilliant brunettes are too few and far between. There seems to be something about the Californian climate that produces the society blonde. Edith McBean, Therese and Ella Morgan, Edith Preston, Helen Hopkins-Taylor—they are but a cluster in society's cornucopia of blondes. Theodosia Cook, who has made such a hit in Washington, D. C., is a blonde with brown eyes, and the Van Dyke blonde, as that combination is called, is rare everywhere. In their time there were no more beautiful blondes in this part of the world than Miss Cook's mother, Mrs. McLean Martin, and the latter's sister, Mrs. Crittenden Thornton.

Theodore Wores Coming Home

A letter from Samoa announces the early homecoming of Theodore Wores, the artist, who has been working hard for months on south sea subjects. He spent much of his time time on the island of Savii, one of the Samoan group, which is practically unexplored and where the inhabitants still keep up their trivial customs. Oddly enough Marie Wells and Marie Oge, whose pictures he delighted to paint, sail today for Tahiti. Miss

Her Golden Spoon is Ready

Little Eugenie Hawes, whom I mentioned last week as one of the buds of next season, will be one of the richest in this season's garden of girls. She has in her possession now the largest portion left of the Horace Hawes estate which at one time was worth nearly a million dollars. Mrs. Hawes Sr. was most extravagant and went through with nearly four hundred thousand dollars. After the widow of Horace Jr. married "Jack" Schroeder they spent nearly a hundred thousand with lavish hand. Free spending runs in the family. Mrs. Jimmie Robinson, Eugenie's aunt, simply closed both eyes and seemingly spent her money as fast as she could. She is one of the most generous women in local society. She used to take young girls East with her on trips and pay all their expenses, and she gave dinners and luncheons without end. Now her husband is in a dying condition at Santa Barbara, and she has taken a house there. At present they live modestly on the small remnant of her fortune. Mrs. Timothy Guy Phelps, another of Eugenie's aunts, is also very wealthy and spends her money without stint.

A belle of seven seasons ago was recently heard to call this year's buds "the worst lot of little stuck-ups' she ever saw.

To Welcome Admiral Evans

The naval officers stationed here are preparing to give Rear Admiral Robley D. Evans a warm and hearty welcome when he arrives. His stay will be extremely brief as he leaves for Yokohama April ninth, where he will succeed Rear Admiral Kempff, a junior in command of the United States fleet in Asiatic waters. Admiral Evans has been leading a very quiet life since acting as this Government's special representative to look after Prince Henry.

Gave a Matron Quite a Scare

Through the mistake of a badly muddled young man at a very well known Pine street family hotel, one of the best known matrons there passed a very wretched quarter-hour the other evening. Entering her rooms after dinner she turned on the light only to discover on her couch a well-known young business man who has for a long time been her constant admirer Realizing that to summon assistance would bring upon her innocent head most dubious reflections, she tried in vain to awaken the sleeper and have him go quietly away. Shakings and pleadings proved in vain. Then she did a wise thing. She slipped downstairs and sent word to her husband, who was in the billiard parlor, and told him of the awkward situation. A few minutes later the muddled and befuddled young man was bundled to quarters where he could do no harm if discovered. Since then he has been vainly trying to square matters with apologies.

Alice Rix O'Leary's Lost Home

Alice O'Leary that is, Alice Rix that was, has lost her picturesque side-hill ranch in the Mendocino redwoods, not by a landslide, as her friends who had seen the property prophesied, but by a decision of Uncle Sam. The O'Learys stumbled on the ranch when on their honeymoon. It was then occupied by a shake-cutter named Hall, his wife and the brood of youngsters. The house is perched on a mountain side, encompassed by giant redwoods, and from the back yard there is a sheer drop of two miles down to the silvery Noyo. Hall had only "squatter title," but Mrs. O'Leary fell in love with the place and incontinently bought him out for four hundred and fifty dollars. Then her troubles began; also O'Leary's. The ranch is twenty lone miles from everywhere. While awaiting the arrival of a Chinese cook from the city, Mr. O'Leary undertook the cuisine and catering departments. He hunted deer and quail by day and if he was fortunate enough to bag game, in the dusk of the evening he cooked it and the family dined. If he wasn't—why, they picnicked in deviled ham and crackers. The night Ah Chin arrived a raccoon entered his room; next day he ran into a wildcat near the spring and resigned, remarking, so O'Leary says: "Me no likee. Too dlam muchee circus companlee!" The O'Learys stood the situation six weeks and succumbed. Later a woodchopper filed a contest in the Land office and a decision was rendered in his favor on the thirteenth.

Prompt to Defend Marie Zane

A bird of ill-omen certainly seems to roost near the Loughborough girls. Somehow everything they do or say gets twisted out of plumb. They are perhaps a bit bohemian for girls brought up in the thick of conventionality, but their wildest larks never even approach the dangerous edge. They do things openly which other girls keep under cover. And now that pretty Marie Zane has made such a mess of matrimony people are underlining her cousinship to the Loughboroughs. "It's bred in the family bone," says Mrs. Grundy; "they all have the bohemian kink." Just why Marie Zane's affair should prove that her cousins are not the pink of propriety is the kind of logic that is brewed over the tea cups. It is true that the Loughborough girls have taken up the tongs for cousin Marie and brand her as showing proper spirit in getting a divorce right away instead of keeping the marriage certificate in cold storage for a year. "I'd do the same thing," said pretty Josie Loughborough, and the tabbies purred, "Of course you would!" which the initiated will appreciate is not the retort courteous.

The Standard for Over Half a Century
BEWARE OF IMITATIONS

Mystery of Gertie Carroll's Pearl

The gossips are wondering whether the magnificent pearl Gertie Carroll is wearing means more than meets the eye. It is a pearl that the Sultan of Sulu would be keen to add to his collection, and Mrs. Grundy insists that it is the gift of George Hall, who happened across the gem while junketing in the South Sea Islands. Those versed in Cupid's lore have long since paired off Miss Carroll and Mr. Hall, but the young people have never given these wiseacres a chance to say, "I told you so." If they are engaged they have kept their secret deep under the rose. The pearl is the first tangible proof the matchmakers have discovered. Miss Carroll has set her feet firmly in the path that runs at right angles with society. She has seriously taken up the study of French literature and is on intimate terms with German philosophy. Her French has a Parisian coating that even every-day wear does not tarnish. George Hall has a Johnny-on-the-spot pronunciation, absorbed during many years' residence in France.

Cowles' Forfeit to George Hall

If Hymen is trimming his torch for them there is reason to believe that the light will not go out as soon as it did in the Cowles-Zane fiasco. George Hall and Northrup Cowles have been "pals" for a long time, and after they "did" Europe last year a story was started to the effect that they had plighted their troth to eternal bachelordom and the first to break his vow must pay a forfeit known only to the two friends. This may account for the astonishment George Hall was surprised into when the Cowles-Zane marriage came over the wires. But he did not even quiver a carefully groomed eyelid at the news of the divorce. If that mysterious forfeit was ever paid it is not public property.

Eastward Flight of Circe

That sprightly little grass-widow, the co-respondent in the Northrup Cowles divorce case, is back in town after a delightful trip to Santa Barbara, and Los Angeles, and is preparing her fourteen trunks to return East at an early date. She is occupying spacious apartments in one of the leading hotels, and one of Northrup Cowles' swellest club friends is dancing devoted attendance upon her. He was a star in her cluster of ardent admirers before she went East last time to dazzle New York swelldom with her figure and charms. She purrs content and looks unutterable things over his avowals and pronounced attentions—and, as usual, simply allows him to pay her bills. Of all her artful traits that of adroitly getting her admirers to take a pride in paying her extravagant bills is certainly prominent. No wonder the very high official in the telephone company, within a week after meeting her, called her "Sugar Coated Circe." She laughed and when she went East dropped off at Chicago just to let him see her. With the usual sigh he muttered "Circe" again as he paid her tidy little hotel bill. The fact that the court forbade Northrup Cowles to marry again doesn't seem to bother her any, and she's going back to the only man who seems to have been successful in holding her fickle devotion for more time than it takes a rose to bloom and die.

Still Follows his Charmer

There is much curiosity being manifested about a manicure establishment that has been opened recently in Post street by a young woman well known in another establishment. She was discharged, owing to the too devoted attentions paid her by a well-known City Hall office-holder. She has furnished her parlors in lavish style, and her admirer drops in to see her at least once a day—at present. The matter wouldn't attract such widespread notice, except that the man has a wife and family occupying a handsome residence in the western addition.

He Didn't Think It a French Farce

One of Oakland's society girls feels that it is impossible to cherish kindly feelings toward the tabbies of that town. A long, long time ago she had a little adventure. It was a very mild sort of incident with only a bit of risque, and would have been forgotten long ago if it had not been for the tabbies. Whenever this young woman laughs over the whisper line or takes a third glass of champagne, the tabbies begin to wag their tongues and tell that old, old story. It's a rattling good tale, too, and contains material for a bright Bisson farce. The scene could be laid in a smart French restaurant, in an upstairs apartment. Time, the lunch hour. Characters, an Oakland benedict, his handsome wife (slightly inclined to be jealous), and the society girl referred to. Scene I would show the benedict and the maiden lunching a deux. Entrance of waiter, breathlessly informing the lunchers of the arrival of "Madame votre femme" belowstairs. Consternation, hasty conference and departure of the lady convoyed by the waiter.

She Shot the Dumb Waiter

As the tabbies continue the tale, the benedict proceeded to finish his lunch. Presently appeared his wife, wrath in her eyes and voice. Received with a charming smile, she was somewhat shaken in her confidence, for she had come to the restaurant on what she thought was a sure tip.

"What! lunching alone upstairs?" was all she managed to say.

"Why not?"

And the whole incident would have closed without a jar had it not been that the young woman, in her hasty flight, had left her gloves on the chair and these could not be explained away. The wife investigated and found out the manner of the girl's escape. She had gone via the dumb waiter, through the kitchen. The servants below gave the whole thing away.

Sue—I wouldn't marry a man unless he knew me thoroughly.

Prue—They say Tom does, but I never heard of your engagement to him.

Earns his Living as a Mystery

The crowd of curious people that has been haunting a well-known local music store trying vainly to discover whether "Psycho, the musical wonder," is a man, an automaton, or a missing link, can easily solve the problem by slipping into the basement some half-hour before the "figure" is so carefully lifted by several burly assistants into his place before the piano. In a small dressing-room will be discovered a trim-looking chap of about thirty years carefully smearing enameline over his face to give it a waxlike appearance, and otherwise fixing himself up to look like the mysterious "Psycho." J. Howard Hill is his name. The Psycho act is his business, for which he receives a handsome sum weekly. The first time I ever saw him was in Chicago, where he attracted a lot of newspaper notice at the World's Fair by entering into a wager that he could stare steadfastly at an object for forty-eight hours without winking. He won. Thereafter he gave a number of exhibitions to show the marvelous manner in which he can keep his muscles motionless for hours at a time. Fix his limbs and body in any position and he will remain so till most people get tired of looking at him. It was this ability that led him to develop his peculiar "automaton acts," and "Psycho, the musical wonder," is one of them.

Ecstasy by the Pocketful

No more will anxious man have to go out between acts "to see a friend," or to break through "the line" on Market street to reach salvation. An Oakland man, James P. Mordant, is after a patent on a highly concentrated form of intoxicant. It is in the shape of a pill, and a man can carry an assortment of "braces, pick-me-ups and night-caps" in his vest pocket and rattle all kinds of stages of ecstasy with his keys and coin. These pills are said to be compressed whisky, treated something like hydrogen and other liquefactions described by learned chemists. The globules are easily dissolved in the mouth of the delighted user and cause a glow and ecstatic titillation to creep over him that is said to outstrip anything that comes over the bar. Inordinate use of them is said to make the earth bulge in spots and cause the universe to take on the same toppling aspect as seen through the bottom of a glass in the early morning hours. The new lozenges taken freely are likewise described as leaving the same dark brown taste in the mouth next day. Despite these trivial details the "regulars" will undoubtedly place James P. Mordant and his prize pills beside the bust of Bacchus and the other great "life savers" in the Hall of Eternal Fame.

William J. Bryan, who was the guest of honor at the smoker of the New York Press club recently, was elected an honorary member by a viva voce vote without a dissenting voice. In his easy, fluent way he created a hearty laugh, in acknowledging the compliment, by saying: "I can assure you, gentlemen, that I am glad to be at last unanimously elected to something and especially in New York."

Latest Amusement of Society

This is the mi-saison when there are still enough people in town to keep up the round of dinners. The latest thing in the East is a fancy headdress dinner. And one of our indefatigable hostesses will very likely pioneer the fad out here at an early date. The Countess Cassini of the Russian Embassy gave one last week to twenty-two guests. The interesting young Countess was gowned in a conventional ball dress of white lace, but she wore a Francesca de Rimini cap consisting of pearls and diamonds. Some of the guests, among them Mrs. De Koven and Mrs. Chatfield Taylor, wore the powdered hair and patches of the colonial dame, but many tried more bizarre and original effects, ranging from the Egyptian to Chinese headgear and the local experiment would be more amusing, though less picturesque, if the guests wore characteristic headgear. Fancy Ned Greenway with a dancing pump perched on his pate; or Mr. Crockett with a bit of gaspipe; Frank Carolan in a headgear of marigolds; and Mrs. Henry Scott with a miniature matrimonial bureau on her head!

Miss Beulah George, who made such a decided hit at the last Pasmore concert, has been engaged to sing at the Orpheus club concert which will be given in Oakland next Friday evening. She will sing an "Ave Maria" by Abt, with the club, and as a solo number the "Bell Song" from "Lakme."

Family Skeletons in Will Contests

The contest over Winfield Jones' will goes to prove again how few of our rich men die and have their last testament carried out according to their desires. And how many family skeletons are unexpectedly brought to light in these contests! Take for instance George W. Gibbs, the iron man, a pillar of the church and for nearly half a century the main support of Grace Episcopal parish. No sooner was he laid away than a disputant arose in the person of a Mrs. Marie Louise Hastings whose children were mentioned in the deceased millionaire's will though she herself did not appear therein. A compromise was effected and what promised to be a rich scandal was averted by a settlement out of court. The will of Peter Donahue, the rich foundryman who left a comparatively small sum of his large estate to his widow and second wife, Mrs. Donahue, was successfully contested by her, the sums thus obtained going later to enrich her sister, Mrs. Eleanor Martin. Mrs. Annie Donahue's will was in turn threatened by her step-daughter, the Baroness Von Schroeder. The baroness however finally reconsidered that move. The will of her step-son, (brother of the Baroness), Mervyn Donahue, was successfully contested and broken by his wife, Mrs. Belle Wallace Donahue, now Mrs. Richard Sprague. The will of Charles Mayne, an old-time resident of San Francisco and member of the banking house of Belloc Freres, was a long time in the courts. The German cousins of the deceased capitalist contested the document, claiming he had been unduly influenced in the disposition of his estate by Mrs. Louise Barroilhet to whom he left the bulk of his wealth. During the controversy it came out that his true name was not Mayne but Merzbach. James G. Fair's will is among the countless others in point. All of which goes to show that heirs-at-law of Croesus think they can divide his wealth much better than he can devise it. This kind of contest has given California the name of being the greatest will-breaking State on earth.

Is She Blarneying Blingum?

Mrs. Andrew McCreery has acquired something beside wealth from her Irish husband, apparently, and that is the desire of being thought to have fallen captive to the people she meets which is so characteristic of that nation. Blarney, some call it; others call it taffy. However, the lady has convinced the Blingumites that the charm of their settlement has eclipsed Lake Como in her fancy and to them and San Franciscans the hope is held out of her return to become a house-holder next winter. I fear the expectations of both town and country are doomed to disappointment and that it will prove to be like what one British Admiral has so recently called the talk of another British Admiral—"gas, nothing but gas."

Conspicuous among the very wealthy people now quartered at the Palace are Captain de la Mar and the two sons of Copper King Clark of Montana. Captain de la Mar has his little daughter with him. His ex-wife, who was considered such a ravishing beauty, is living quietly abroad with her mother. With the young Clarks are their wives, both strikingly handsome women. Senator Clark's interests are becoming so great in the southwest that the chances are his sons will be frequent visitors here. They spend their time looking after his interests.

Ed. Stetson's Agricultural Trustfulness

Mr. Edward Gray Stetson, the lawyer, has a big marrowbone to pick with the agricultural department of the State University. He owns the Toyon ranch near San Rafael and his hobby is scientific farming. Being a Bostonian and a Harvard man to boot, Mr. Stetson, until a few short weeks ago, reposed a confidence serene—nay, unbounded—in all statements of a technical character emanating from a recognized institution of learning. In the old days, if a scientific sharp trailing Ph.D. after his name had casually mentioned in his hearing that they were grafting their watermelons on plum trees down at Palo Alto, Mr. Stetson would have instantly wired his foreman to raise all melons in future via the plum tree route—or root. Today, such an expert would be very fortunate if he escaped scathless.

Captured the Vegetable Marvel

It was called the Saghalien Polygonum—so the Agricultural College people wrote—after a desolate island off the coast of Kamschatka, where Russia keeps her convicts. It was the greatest, latest and most improved forage plant known to agricultural science. It would produce ninety tons of fodder to the acre! With infinite trouble and at great expense the State University had secured a very limited quantity of the seed of this hardy annual, to be distributed gratis among "advanced experimental agriculturalists" who would cherish and cluck over the polygonum, so to speak. Would Mr. Stetson try a little? Would he—and hay fourteen dollars a ton! Well—he scorched the wire telephoning, "Yes." They sent him a small packet and his mouth fairly watered for more. So he hied him to Berkeley and returned triumphant with enough polygonum seed in his valise to plant almost an acre. With the usual amount of ploughing the seed was deposited in the earth and then, and not till then, Mr. Stetson sat down—and waited for it to grow.

Polygonum Everywhere, but—

He did not have to wait long. The vegetable stranger from the frozen north appreciated Californian sunshine and seemed to realize that the time had come to show its capacity as a long-distance grower. "Jonah's gourd—pshaw! just watch me," said the polygonum, in dumb show, of course. And Stetson watched and marveled. When the plants were six feet high, but still growing, Stetson, his foreman and the ranch hands held a council. The polygonum had developed a thick woody stem almost as succulent as a telegraph-pole; but not quite. "We'll have to harvest her with an ax," remarked the foreman. At seven feet, with prospects of fuller returns later, Stetson introduced one of his Jerseys to the polygonum. The sedate bovine sniffed suspiciously at the long, green, banana-like fronds, but wouldn't bite. Stetson tried it on a band of assorted cows, a thoroughbred horse, six work horses, a pony, a mule, and finally in despair, on a goat—not an Angora, but a plain, every-day tomato can variety. None of them would look at the polygonum, much less eat it. He is striving now to convert it into hay, but as the leaves are difficult to cure and when cured crumble into an impalpable powder resembling buhach, and as none of the Toyon live stock can be induced to try this novel diet, his faith in scientific agriculture is gone forever.

Roused the Comment of the Teachers

Although the Teachers' Institute just concluded was singularly free from this plague of physical culturists, book agents, and others of that ilk, there was one proceeding which was decidedly unprofessional and should not have been allowed. Miss Jennie Long, a teacher of elocution, was billed for a lecture on the subject of reading, assisted by classes from the Hearst and Hawthorne schools. After an address to the teachers Miss Long called in a class from the Hearst school. The children were asked to repeat certain sounds and then to recite "The Brook and the Wave," which they did in a simple, unaffected manner. Miss Long then began to show up their deficiencies of tone, inflection and general style. After confusing them as much as possible by her questions, tone and manner, she dismissed them and called in the Hawthorne pupils. These took their places to a fancy march. They all knew where to stand, as Miss Long had previously worked out their places on the platform with chalk. She then repeated the vowel sounds herself and the children said them after her. Then she asked for "The Brook and The Wave," upon which they had evidently been carefully drilled, for the whole thing—questions, answers, inflection and all, were glib and ready.

Apparently it was Programmed

I am told that Mrs. Mann, the principal of the Hawthorne school, visited the Hearst in company with Miss Long who asked for a class to illustrate her method, Mrs. Mann remarking that one of her classes would not do because Miss Long had been drilling them beforehand. It was decidedly unfair to bring in a class which she had not drilled and "show them up" in comparison with one which she had tutored. The affair was evidently arranged for the glorification of Mrs. Mann and her school.

Ambitious to Shine in Chorus

Mary Mann Haley, who has joined the Tivoli chorus with view of working her way to the higher operatic walks, has had a past that will offer her press agent good material to work upon. It is not a past to give ministers of the gospel material for denunciatory sermons against the stage, but it is sufficiently romantic for a page of a Sunday supplement. The first chapter would show Mary Mann as a schoolgirl, the daughter of two school principals. Then would come her experience with a young ladies' quartet, singing about in country towns and occasionally at a city concert. The first installment would end with her marriage.

Fled from Ironing to Music

Mr. Haley was not Mary Mann's first husband. She made a love match with a young farmer and temporarily forsook her musical studies for ranch life. But the humdrum existence did not agree with her. She was not very strong and among her duties was that of assisting in the family ironing. It proved too trying on her physique. When she could no longer stand the strain she went home to her mother. A season of rest in a sanitarium was followed by her legal separation. Once more she threw herself into her musical studies and in the course of time took unto herself her present husband.

She's the Only Beauty Left

Of the young women forming the quartet only one is still unmarried. Ivy Gardner made a romantic marriage with a Mr. Glassell from Los Angeles, member of a piano firm. Clara Heyman is now Mrs. Emanuel. Florence Doane, the most attractive of the quartet, shows no desire to change her state. She is a beautiful girl, a blonde, and her voice is one of the best under Mrs. Marriner-Campbell's tuition. Miss Doane has many times received good offers to go upon the stage, but she hates to leave home. The Bostonians made her very glowing terms but she declined them.

Opening of the Season in Burlingame

Though all the householders are not yet in summer quarters at Burlingame the season there is in full swing. Burlingamites are beginning to appreciate the fact that the early spring there is all that can be desired for frivols, health, and entertainment. This year festivities have been hastened by the visits of the Eastern contingent headed by the Whitelaw Reids, D. O. Mills, Mrs. A. B. McCreery and the smart quartet of the Burlingame club who are out here to have a polo brush with the local champions. As usual at Burlingame the outdor events have led in social affairs and the devotees of polo have started the ball with little luncheons and dances at the club house and various residences. Several quite formal affairs have been given by the Whitelaw Reids and Mrs. Francis Carolan. This week the latter gave an elaborate affair in honor of the opening of the new polo field. Messrs. Menzies, Dryborough and McCreery of London and Mr. Wheeler of Philadelphia have been doing conscientious training and are in great form for the forthcoming polo tussle. According to present arrangements there is likely to be a series of five polo matches lasting some ten days. With such an early and lively start the season at Burlingame promises to be a most successful one.

Cause of Her Uncontrollable Grief

A well known attorney recently boarded the city-bound train at Palo Alto. A station or two this side two ladies got in the same car with him. Evidently they were strangers to each other, but they happened to take the vacant seat in front of him. One lady was in deep mourning, the other in the prim attire of a spinster. After settling herself in the window seat the elder woman lifted her heavy veil and began to weep bitterly. She was in such evident distress that after a time the attorney, in sheer sympathy, felt impelled to lean forward and say, "Pardon me, madam, but I see that you are in trouble; is there anything that I can do to help you?" "Nothing," she sobbed, and buried her face in her handkerchief. Her grief was so pitiable that the man was shortly impelled to again proffer his services. "May I ask the nature of your trouble, madam?" he said.

"Oh, sir," she managed to say between sobs, "I've buried three husbands and my fourth is in the baggage-car yonder. I'm taking him to the cemetery to have him cremated."

At this recital the spinster gave way to a wave of uncontrollable grief. The sympathetic man in gentle amazement turned to console her. "Is your husband dead, too, madam?" he asked.

"No," she sobbed violently, "I'm crying be-be-cause I'm forty-five and I—I never had a hus-husband, while she's got hus-husbands to burn."

Wooed by Its Original Love

One could almost have imagined it was an old time ladies' jinks at the Bohemian club on Wednesday night. It was strictly an ultra-bohemian gathering, society being there but knocking elbows at every step with Art, Music and Letters. If the Bohemian club ever goes back to its original idea and banishes the financial pall that has caused the old Owl to shed so many tears, it will be largely due to the visitors it occasionally admits within its portals. The red room, peopled with spirits of poet, musician and artist members of the past, has become nothing more than a dining and supper room for the smart set. The green room still withstands assaults upon its privacy. But it is the jinks room that I feel is going to be the salvation of the old Bohemia. On Wednesday night there were smart dames present in lovely gowns, a distinguished United States senator, several writers, artists and musicians. The beautiful Japanese color-prints received close inspection and none appeared more interested in them than Casals, the diminutive 'cellist with the fingers of genius, who came here as a member of Emma Nevada's concert company.

Alluring Beauties in Japanese Prints

The color-prints, by the way, are only interesting to those who have taken the pains to study up the subject. In this exhibit they are shown in all their grades of evolution. Most of them are of rare beauty. The proper way to enjoy these prints is to take them one at a time and not hurry in your inspection. The real esthete who owns a collection of Japanese prints does not cover his rooms with them. He places one on his wall and feasts his eyes on that for days, weeks or whatever time is necessary to absorb its beauty. Then he makes a change, and another print takes its place. During the World's Fair in Chicago, a great Buddhist lectured, and it was he who first told this country how to enjoy art as embodied in the Japanese color-print.

California Girls in London's Nobility

From London I hear that Princess Hatzfeldt, formerly Clara Huntington, is entertaining in lavish style and having her portrait made by the Marchioness of Granby. It is now pretty well understood that the show she made out here of a will contest, under Attorney Redding's direction, had the effect of increasing her million-dollar bequest under the will to a five million-dollar gift.

Viscountess Deerhurst, formerly Virginia Bonynge of California, the stepdaughter of Charles Bonynge, is also entertaining on a very liberal scale. She is devoted to her three children, a boy and two girls. The boy is busy in his second year, and, if he lives, will some day be the Earl of Coventry.

The rumor is again current that the Duke of Roxburghe is going to marry an American "millionairess," but whether either May Goelet or Pauline Astor will have him is a matter of speculation. These two heiresses are being very actively angled for by foreigners. The Earl of Pembroke is said to be particularly anxious to form an alliance between Miss Goelet and his son. Her aunt married Michael Herbedt, the earl's brother.

American Women at the Coronation

In discussing the American women who will occupy prominent positions at the coronation of a leading London society paper says that as a matter of fact only a small proportion of American peeresses among the hundreds of grandes dames will form King Edward's court on that occasion. Of the four American ladies who have worn or are wearing the strawberry leaves, the handsome widow of Lord William Beresford is conceded to be the most interesting personality. As a young girl she married the old and very wealthy Mr. Hammersley of New York. After he died she married the Duke of Marlborough. He added to her already immense fortune. After his demise she capped her social achievements by becoming the wife of Lord Beresford, whom people had always regarded as a confirmed bachelor. Their married life was short but ideally happy.

Consuelo, Duchess of Manchester, was a noted belle of New Orleans in the fifties, and is still a good looking woman. The world has seen comparatively little of her since the death of her daughter, Lady Alice Montagu. The Dowager Duchess of Manchester was the pioneer of the many Anglo-American "alliances" which so interested society during the Victorian era, as she was the first American girl to marry an English peer.

Captured London with Her Beauty

The present Duchess of Manchester, Miss Zimmerman, has not yet made her debut in London. The picturesque and piquant Duchess of Marlborough, Miss Vanderbilt, is a very notable social figure with an individuality all her own. A beauty among the American peeresses is Lady Naylor-Leyland. As Jennie Chamberlain she made a great sensation. She is now a lovely young widow with a big son, who is a godson of King Edward. Another notable figure is Countess of Craven, whose parents are the wealthy Bradley-Martins of New York. The Countess of Essex, Miss Adele Grant, spends most of her time cultivating country hobbies and society sees little of her. Mrs. George Cornwallis West has the distinction of being the only American woman, who has ever renounced voluntarily a title she once held. New York was breathless with surprise when, as Lady Randolph Churchill, she sank her identity by marriage with a commoner and gave up her title for love. It is probable that she will be among the elect few invited to the coronation. Another American who will undoubtedly be singled out for that honor is Mrs. Arthur Paget.

Hunting Gullible Heiresses

Not only is a certain class of the English nobility taking advantage of the coronation to screw all it can out of foreigners in rental for town houses, but certain degenerate peers are not above using that event to barter their titles advantageously as the following advertisement in a leading London daily shows:

"An English peer of very old title is desirous of marrying at once a very wealthy lady—no objection to foreigner. Age and looks immaterial, but character must be irreproachable; either widow or spinster, not divorcee. A lady who is willing to purchase the rank of a peeress for $125,000 cash paid to her future husband, and has besides sufficient wealth left to keep up the rank of a peeress, will do well to communicate with the undersigned and arrange for a meeting. Any one who can bring about this desired arrangement by introducing me to a lady of the desired wealth will be handsomely reimbursed. Adress J. G. M. this office."

Making the Money Fly

Honolulu society has been very gay in the past few weeks. The return of Sam Parker and his bride, formerly Mrs. James Campbell, and Prince and Princess David Kawananakoa, set the Hawaiian capital all a-flutter. The old royal home at Pualeilani near Waikiki where once kings and queens reigned in barbaric joyousness is now the centre of gayety, for Prince David is lavishing thousands on entertainment. Princess Kawananakoa, Miss Abbie Campbell until her marriage a few weeks ago, has revived the glories of the monarchy. She drives in a magnificent coach, bearing the royal coat of arms, and with coachman and footman in the liveries of the Kalakauas—knickerbockered, silk-stockinged and slippered.

Shows She's a Democratic Princess

But withal the Princess is democratic, or rather neglectful of the dictates of fashion. Her intimate friend is Rosie Cunha, a half-white daughter of a Honolulu saloon keeper who stands all day in his shirt sleeves to wait on his customers, and who has amassed a half million dollars in selling rum to sons of missionaries. Her brother is "Fatty" Cunha, formerly at Yale and later at Stanford, and famous as a football and baseball player. "Fatty" is reading law, supposedly, but spends most of his hours on the beach at Waikiki where the subtle ginfizz is handy. Cunha and Prince David are chums and are usually together when the sensuous strains of the hula hula sound under the waving cocoa plumes in the moonlight, and the sinuous brown bodies of the soft Hawaiian maidens curve to the voluptuous airs.

The death of Albert Gerberding broke up one of the happiest households this side of heaven. The Gerberdings were a very devoted couple, and theirs was a true love-mating. They had but one child, a little girl, but by her former marriage with Mr. Bates Mrs. Gerberding had two sons. A picture of the younger boy was used as an illustration in his mother's juvenile book, "The Golden Chimney," that A. M. Robertson published a few months ago.

Latest Test in Society

The controversy as to who is who in New York society has started telegraphed articles this way that are unfair to some of those concerned. The correspondent expressed no doubt as to the prominence of Mrs. Willie Vanderbilt, Mrs. Ogden Mills and Mrs. Clarence Mackay to be leaders anywhere, not alone on account of their birth, their beauty or their wealth, but endeavored to prove that their husbands are not up to the standards of the wives. Now the fact is that all three of the husbands are college graduates, thereby satisfying even Mrs. Astor's requirements of a gentleman. They are all men who have traveled the world over and possessing wealth have had every advantage. As to their birth, young Vanderbilt is the fifth in line of great wealth, his mother a most refined and lovely woman. Mills' father is as well known as any pioneer who came to California: in building up his own fortune he helped build up this State. He is recognized in New York as an upright, shrewd and conservative man and is one from whom any family might be proud to be descended or connected with. He married Miss Cunningham, a lady of the greatest refinement and charm of manner. Her old Scotch father was the most successful of real estate investors in the early days, owning the land where the Examiner building, the Grand and Palace hotels now stand, and also the holding where the present Mills building is located. She therefore was a great heiress even in those days. Young Mackay was educated at college abroad and is a hard-working, successful man whose parents are well known, respected and admired. Instead of decrying these three young men it would be hard to pick their equals in any society. California ought to be proud that it can claim two of them.

St. Dunstan's Opened

The beautiful apartment hotel at the corner of Van Ness avenue and Sutter street is formally opened for guests today, with nearly a full house. The unique features presented by the management appeal to those who enjoy elegance and home comfort without the cares and annoyances of housekeeping.

A. J. Morrison, son of Charles Morrison, the well-known newspaper man of the Call's local staff, was married at Halifax, N. S., with Miss Willette Kershaw of St. Louis, Mo., on February nineteenth. The young benedict is an actor of much promise and at present is leading man and stage manager of the Harkins company, one of the biggest road organizations in the northeast. His bride is a member of the same company. Morrison started out in this city at Morosco's, and after cutting his eye-teeth made for the other side of the Rockies. He supported Joe Murphy and acted as his stage manager for two seasons and enjoyed great popularity in the middle west. He has been highly praised for his rendition of Gavin in "The Little Minister."

Well Qualified for his High Task

F. Marion Crawford, who was selected by the Pope to write his biography, well deserves the honor. His novels on Roman life are acknowledged to be the most accurate pictures of Italy's social side that have ever been given to literature. George Eliot's "Romola" is the only work that can at all be compared with those of Crawford, though Mrs. Humphrey Ward's "Eleanor" and Mrs. Voynich's "The Gadfly," are by many held to be their equals. Caine's "The Eternal City," and Marie Corelli's "Master Christian" do not rank the same from a literary point of view. Crawford has for years lived in Italy. He has a country place at Sorrento, the birthplace of Mrs. Harriet Beecher Stowe's heroine, "Agnes of Sorrento." His string of Roman novels deals with every phase of life in the Eternal City. The chronicles of the Saracinesca, the Corleone and Braccia, the Lauderdales, and others, have all the imprint of history. His earlier books, "Mr. Isaacs," "Dr. Claudius" and "The Roman Singer," though not such models of fine English as his later novels, are still among the most read works to be found in public libraries. His "In the Palace of the King," staged for Viola Allen, was more dramatic as a novel than as a play. He comes of a literary family, containing such members as Julia Ward Howe and her daughter, Maude Howe Elliott. Sam Ward, the most famous bon vivant and raconteur the United States ever produced, was his uncle.

"Mamie Ray got married yesterday."

A Work of Restoration

What the McPhee Machine is doing to Beautify San Francisco

The restorations in Pompeii and Herculaneum are of less interest to San Franciscans than those the McPhee Company is making in our own city. It is true there is nothing of great antiquity here but some of our buildings sadly needed restoration, for all that. The way the McPhee Company has gone about its work is interesting, and deserves a place in the annals of "What Machinists and Machinery Have Accomplished in the Last Decade." The McPhee machine was constructed primarily for the cleaning, under contract, of the United States Mint, which contract was completed in 1901. Later the machine was changed and improved and since then the company has completed contracts for the restoring of the Nevada bank building, the Pacific Mutual Life building, Mutual Life and others, the approaches to the Hall of Records, City Hall and other public buildinggs. In the accompanying illustration the machine is shown in operation on the granite steps of the City Hall. The lighter portion shows where the steps have been cleaned.

The company is now at work on the Bank of California, and this restoration is drawing the attention especially of old-timers, many of whom since the work of restoring has begun say that at last they begin to recognize the building as the famous old bank of early days. One year ago the Bank of California contracted to have the building repaired, on account of defective stone which was chiseled out and cement filled in. The building was then coated with a solution that changed its color, which was originally a greenish gray Angel Island stone, to a dirty black. The native color of the stone is now being restored by this wonderful machine, which by the way is a sand blast and air compresser run by gasoline and gin. The force of the sand blast cuts away the dirt and leaves the surface of the building cleaner than when first erected.

The next move of the machine, after the completion of the Bank of California, will be to clean the Fair mausoleum in Holy Cross cemetery, after which the Starr King building in Geary street will be freed from its crust of dirt, also the Fair building in Montgomery street. The company pays especial attention to the cleaning of the granite steps of private residences, and among the first of these to receive attention will be that of J. B. Stetson, corner Van Ness avenue and Clay street.

Daniel McPhee is the president of the company bearing his name, and James Sutton is the secretary. They are general stone contractors, with mill yard and office located at Nineteenth and Harrison streets; telephone Blue 661. They are members of the Builders' Exchange, 40 New Montgomery street, Box 235, and have been in the contracting business in this city about ten years. Among the building contracts they have successfully carried to a finish were the Emma Spreckels building in Market street, the beautiful Claus Spreckels residence in Van Ness avenue, the magnificent home of the William Irwins at the corner of Washington and Laguna, the M. J. Keller building in Market street, the Stockton post-office, approaches to San Jose and Sacramento post-offices, the Bank of Woodland, Yolo county, and scores of others. They are now completing the Emerson building in Sutter street and the Minnie Shotwell building in Eddy street.

With the Money Makers

The Pacific States Mining and Investment Company is selling shares in the Costa Rica Petroleum and Coal Company, of which Colonel Charles L. Pierce is president, E. Hugg, secretary, and which has among its directors James G. Maguire, Baron Molitor of Berlin, and Ludwig Schunemann, a Hamburg banker. Dr. Ernest Henrici, a geologist of Costa Rica, says that there is not enough petroleum or coal in Costa Rica to warrant the incorporation of a large company with the capitalization of the Costa Rica Petroleum and Coal Company. Henrici has written the Cologne Volkszeitung, a leading German newspaper, denouncing the company as one impossible of gain for the investor. He says: "I warn every one not to purchase the shares of the Costa Rica Petroleum and Coal Company, incorporated in South Dakota. There exist indications of petroleum in Costa Rica, but not enough to warrant the incorporation of a large company for exploiting the same, nor is there enough coal to pay working except on a small scale." He says the corporation cannot be made to pay and that the enterprise is not a Government affair. To prove his sincerity Henrici sent the Cologne newspaper his certificate of shares in the company, valued at $5,000 on the face, to give away or throw away.

The daily papers of San Francisco contain the following advertisement: "News of the excitement in Costa Rica over the discovery of great deposits of coal and petroleum is confirmed by Consul-General Tinoco, who has returned from a visit of investigation. He is convinced that the future of his country both as a source of fuel supply and in the development of manufactures is now assured. As to the construction of either the Panama or the Nicaragua canal the Costa Rican coal and oil will play a prominent part. Consul-General Tinoco says the coal is both anthracite and bituminous, and has been declared equal to the famed bodies of Pennsylvania, while the petroleum near Old Harbor is plentiful and of the paraffine base so much sought after. So convinced was he of the importance of the discoveries that while in Costa Rica he associated himself with the brother of President Yglesias and other prominent men, and purchased large tracts of coal and oil properties under fifty years' concessions. These he transferred to the Costa Rica Petroleum and Coal Company. The Pacific States Mining and Investment Company is the fiscal agent of the new enterprise, and has for sale a limited number of shares at $1 each.

Hints to Investors

Prosperity has made money easy and investments hard to find, especially for the small or moderate investor, seeking a fair interest on his cash. The extraordinary premiums commanded by Government bonds, and the excessive demand for gilt-edged State, county and municipal loans have forced those without big resources to look for investments in sound industrial enterprises. It is almost impossible now to buy United States Government or State paper, or first railway liens, except at an exorbitant advance. Convertibility is a most valuable property in any form of capital, and the buyer of bonds must decide for himself how much he can sacrifice in convertibility, and what added percentage of yield will compensate therefor. The utility of an investment is measured by the degree of means by which it may be exchanged for an equivalent of current cash. In choosing investment securities all these points should be considered in the order named:

1. Legality of issue and proceedings precedent thereto.
2. Security of principal, including assurance of clear liens on fixed property sufficient at all times to liquidate the loan and ample to insure redemption at maturity. Sinking fund clauses and retirement options are to be considered under this head.
3. Security of the increment, including assurance of income sufficient to maintain the pledged proerty free from impairment; to meet all current and contingent liabilities; to pay the full interest on all the bonds; to provide an equitable sinking fund for redemptions, and to provide a reasonable surplus.
4. Convertibility of the bond into cash money without loss of value, or probably at a profit.
5. Net yield on the principal sum (being greater than the rate specified if the bond be bought at a discount, and less if bought at a premium), also bearing a certain relation to all the preceding points.
6. The corporate credit of the emitting body, the sagacity and ability of the mangement, the nature of the basic industry, the conditions likely to affect that industry, the geographical position of the pledged property, its relations to the community, etc.

Unique Way of Floating Stock

The Red Cloud Mining Company of Los Angeles advertises extensively to sell its stock at 50 cents a share. Its mines are in Riverside county. Its advertisements state that the stockholders are owners of a large number of "engines, boilers and other machinery, a drug store, harness rooms, one hundred and sixty acres of desert land, of which forty acres are closed in by a barbed wire fence, and used as a pasture for the company's mules, a cottage, bunk house, corral, horses, mule burros, stages and wagons, a spring of soft water, and five acres of a vegetable garden." Its advertisements, however, do not mention its ore but make it plain that the company "does not allow liquor, beer, gambling or dance houses on the grounds." The prospectus states: "Our miners are all intelligent and gentlemanly. Every one who has visited our mines has been favorably impressed with the class of miners we employ. They are quiet and peaceable." One might think that the Red Cloud Mining Company, which is trying to sell stock in San Francisco, was disposing of an interest in its employes, and not in its mines. The company is not paying dividends.

The American Wireless Telephone and Telegraph Comany of Philadelphia offers shares at $8 each, the par value of which it sets down as $10, and with which 25 per cent. scrip dividends go from each of six sub-companies. The companies say they con-

Giving California a Bad Name

The Diamond Oil Company of the McKittrick district sold about $75,000 worth of stock, and has quit. The investors all have their stock. The company was promoted by W. O. Hilbish. The Oil Land Company took a lease on the land of the Diamond, and has also quit working, apparently. The Oil Land Company also sold stock. R. Matthews of Wichita, Kansas, bought stock in the Diamond Company. A letter from Matthews dated March 11th, shows how California's fair fame is smutted. He writes: "Dickens said: 'America has 40,000,000 of people—mostly all fools.' My judgment is: California has some 10,000 oil companies—mostly composed of scoundrels."

The Sunset Mining Company, with an office in the Chronicle building, of which G. W. Rumble is the head, and which was exposed as a fraud in Town Talk last week, is now being sued by Reverend D. D. Smith, who says he put in $12,500, and has gotten nothing out, except the two per cent. a month which Rumble pays out of his victims' contributions. Rumble's motto is: "Your money back—at the rate of one-fiftieth of your investment each week, until I get ready to fly."

A strong upward movement in the stock market was checked by President Roosevelt's announcement that he would instruct the Attorney General to bring action against the Northern Securities Company. Wall street would have had a tremendous boom, if President Roosevelt has not been so pronounced.

Hawaiian Sugar Stocks

Prospects for sugar dividends during this year are not promising. Those who hold these stocks as income earners need not expect much in the next year or two. Onomea will probably resume paying dividends in April or May, and possibly Makaweli plantation may begin paying again in July. But no dividends from the others listed on the San Francisco Stock Board will be paid in 1902. A year ago seven of these Hawaiian sugar companies were paying dividends.

The sugar crop last year was 360,000 tons, and is expected to equal 400,000 tons this year. The crop is turning out very well, but higher rates for labor, lack of rain some months ago, and the reduction in sugar have forced the plantations from paying dividends. If Cuban sugar is granted a reduction in import duties to this country of from 20 to 25 per cent., it will not materially affect Hawaiian sugar, and Hawaiian planters look hopefully for Uncle Sam to grant this reduction, fearing that if no concession is made Cuba the agitation for annexation will begin.

A reign of economy in the management of Hawaiian plantations is begun. High salaries have been cut down, and economy in milling introduced. These changes will tend to put back these companies on a paying basis within a year or two.

Last week's feature on the Stock and Bond Exchange was the announcement of the sale of a seat in the Exchange at $20,000, George F. Bowman selling his membership to Frederick Knight, son of George A. Knight, the popular attorney. The selling price is considered an excellent figure by local financiers, and is an admirable illustration of the growing importance of San Francisco as a financial center.

This is the Universal Report of All who see the Basket Making Machines of the Mergenthaler-Horton Basket Machine Company

ONE MACHINE DOES THE WORK OF TWELVE MEN

Hand Work Superseded and the Entire Fruit Basket Industry Controlled by These Marvelous Machines. The Stock of the Company Now Offered for Popular Subscription

What the cotton gin was to cotton growing, what the linotype was to typesetting, the basket making machine is to the fruit basket industry—a revelation and a revolution.

Two billions of baskets are required each year to market our berries, our grapes, our peaches and our other fruits.

These baskets are now all made by hand.

The total volume of fruit basket business at wholesale prices amounts annually to over eleven millions of dollars.

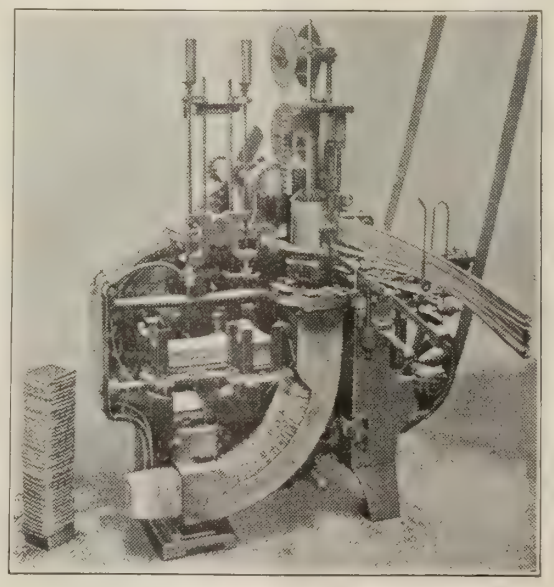
WHAT THE MACHINES SAVE

The yearly saving in labor in producing these baskets by the machines of this company, amounts to over two millions of dollars. Upon this substantial foundation the Mergenthaler-Horton Basket Machine Company builds and adds the profits now realized in the manufacture of these baskets by hand, amounting to nearly one and a half million per year.

To this sum can be added the saving in handling the raw material on a large scale, in round numbers three-quarters of a million dollars a year, making an estimated yearly profit of 40 per cent on its capital of ten millions.

STEADY INCREASE OF DEMAND

There are other justifiable additions to be made, because the demand for such baskets is increasing at the rate of 150,000,000 baskets per year in this country alone. Then there are great gains to be expected from providing an adequate supply of baskets to every fruit grower from the Atlantic to the Pacific by placing basket factories within convenient shipping distance of every fruit growing field. This will save the waste of fruit which occurs every year in many sections, and will add to the sum total of baskets used.



BERRY BASKET MACHINE
Present Capacity 12,000 Per Day

Then must be considered the inevitable increases of profit from administering this great business on a large scale and by having absolute control of it and of fruit growing enterprises which must use the baskets made by its machines.

But, putting aside every reasonable business gain to be derived from all sources except the one of saving of labor, the profits earned by the machines in making baskets to supply the present demand would be two millions of dollars, which go directly to the credit of the machine. These profits alone will pay 20 per cent. on the entire capital stock.

WHAT AN EYE-WITNESS SAYS

The following is an extract from the description of a gentleman who visited Painesville Ohio, and saw the machines make grape baskets:—

"FIFTY-ONE POSITIVE MOVEMENTS MADE WITH THE ACCURACY OF A CHRONOMETER, ALL WITHIN SIX SECONDS OF TIME, and all to turn out a simple little grape basket.

"The floor space taken up by the machine may be sixty inches by thirty inches. Into the perpendicular receiver the girl operator piles a hundred basket bottoms, and into the other receivers she piles sides and binding strips. The machine is loaded with stock, the lever is pulled, and presto, a bottom is transferred from under the pile and carried to the form. It has hardly reached the form before a side is in place, which, in turn, is met by the inside and outside top strips and the bottom strip, all of which are met with the simultaneously self-made staples, securing the pieces as the basket is made up. Side after side is added, each one fitting accurately to its place and being at once clinched home by the staples. All these movements are going on, and as surely as the second hand of your watch gets through the sixth second, a complete basket drops on the floor.

"The reaching out and grasping of a bottom and drawing it into place, the meeting of the bottom, the strips, the sides and the driving home of the upper and lower staples, self-made from reels of suspended wire, was something in mechanical precision necessary to see in order to properly appreciate. To see the semi-oval basket change pivotal centers and revolve so as to present every part to the fixed blow of the staples was what a machinist might term a mechanical dream. And when the last staple was driven, completing the basket, an arm descended and discharged it upon the floor, and a new basket to undergo in its turn a course of manufacture instantly took its place.

"We saw a basket stopped in the middle of its manufacture, a fresh side put in place with the hand of the operator, and the machine go straight ahead.

"Like Goldsmith's Village Schoolmaster:—

"'As we gazed our wonder grew,
How one machine so many things could do.'

"To see that hand reach out, and with a perfect, universal, joint wristed movement pick up those veneer sides one after another and put them in place with absolute accuracy, was enough in the old days of Salem, to have sent the inventor to the stake for witchery."

The Mergenthaler-Horton Basket Machine Company has not bartered away the control of its great machines to any syndicate, but it offers to every one, with a surplus hundred dollars or five hundred dollars, the opportunity to become a member of the great popular syndicate which is furnishing the needed capital for this magnificent enterprise. Every share of the company's stock is a voting share. There is no preferred stock, no bonds, no debts. The entire capital is made up of common stock, and all who become stockholders will have a voice in the affairs of the company.

SALES OF STOCK

The present selling price of shares of the Mergenthaler-Horton Basket Machine Company is fifty cents a share (par value, $1.00, full paid and non-assessable). Sales of shares at this price will be closed without notice.

In sending remittances for subscription all checks, drafts or money orders should be drawn to the order of Charles R. Barlow, Treasurer, and mailed to any of the offices of the company named below.

The full operation of the machines can be seen by all who will call at any office of the company. Mutoscope pictures illustrating the actual making of baskets by these machines are shown at the offices, where it is obviously impracticable to set up and operate the machines themselves. This gives a perfect moving illustration from photographs and will charm any one who will call and see the wonderful work the machines do.

SWEEPING BASIC PATENTS

The patents secured on these machines are those of Emmett Horton, which have been combined with the patent of Ottmar Mergenthaler, the famous inventor of the great Linotype machine. These patents are all absolutely fundamental and make an unshakable foundation for the great industry which the machines control.

The experimental and testing work has all been finished.

Over thirty of the grape basket machines are in operation at Painesville, Ohio, and each machine has a capacity of four thousand grape baskets per day. Berry basket machines may be seen at Elmira, N. Y. These machines have a present capacity of twelve thousand quart berry baskets per day and Mr. Horton, the inventor, who is constantly at work on the machines, to which he has devoted his life, has just completed an improvement which will multiply the speed of this machine by four. This seems almost incredible, but would not be so regarded by any one who sees the machines in actual operation.

The list of patents on these machines follows:

530,048, Nov. 27th, 1894.	635,725, Oct. 24th, 1899.
578,876, March 16th, 1897.	635,726, Oct. 24th, 1899.
587,734, Aug. 10th, 1897.	666,755, Jan. 29th, 1901.
635,374, Oct. 24th, 1899.	680,149, Aug. 6th, 1901.
635,723, Oct. 24th, 1899.	680,726, Aug. 24th, 1901.
635,724, Oct. 24th, 1899.	690,322, Dec. 31st, 1901.

No machines will be sold or rented.

EIGHTEEN DOLLARS A DAY FROM EACH MACHINE

An easy calculation of the earning power of the machines of this company is shown by the fact that each machine is capable of turning out a product upon which the net profit exceeds eighteen dollars per day, and by running two hundred days only in the year each machine should net the company thirty-six hundred dollars per year.

EARLY ADVANCE IN PRICE

Without any attempt at inflated estimate of values it is a reasonable statement that the increase of the market price of the stock of the company will, within a few months, double the money of the investors at the low price of the present offering, and from this time onward to par and beyond is as certain as any business proposition can be. Indeed, it is by no means unlikely that the stock of this company will prove as great a sensational money earner as any of the stocks of the great concerns whose stockholders excite the envy of all who are less fortunate.

The fullest information will be given to all inquirers at any of the company's offices, and it is not to be forgotten that the subscription list at fifty cents for one dollar shares may be closed at any time without notice.

The Machinations of Madge

As betrayed by her letters

New York, Dec. 8th, 1901.

My Dearest Charles:

I am in receipt of your flattering letter of the 3d in which you ask me to be your wife. How cruel it seems, coming as it were on the eve of my marriage to the General. Why could you not have been less deliberate? It does seem as if I were always just a little too late for the good things of life. And it has been so from the very first—that night of our meeting at the Assembly Ball. You can recall it, I guess. You were, you remember, engaged for every dance. And now after three years of society, I am in exactly the same position as regards the dearest man in New York. If you did love me all these weeks, months and years, oh, why did you delay telling me so till now? I presume you have heard of the General. He is neither young, good-looking, nor brilliant. A more unattractive specimen of the genus homo couldn't be found. Yet I'm to marry him on the 1st. The next day we sail on the Celtic. If you care to reach me by mail—and that seems to be the only way you can reach me now—address Grand Hotel, Paris. Your regretful Madge.

New York, Dec. 10, 1901.

Dear General:

How I did long for you last night! Why did you not come out? To think, too, that I canceled a dozen engagements with the hope of seeing and being with you, my precious own! Don't ever say again I don't love you. You know that I do. My life is one long thought of you and the days are all too short for the thinking. How perfectly I recall your first words to me down upon the rocks at Newport. That was when you called me "little girl." I was so overcome by the perfect manner in which you won me that I lay awake all that night, thinking, thinking. How can you ever say that you are old? Why, you don't look a day over thirty and as far as actions, a boy of twenty-one couldn't be more buoyant and gay than you, my own sweet love! I got a letter the other day from that shallow-brained Charlie Galloway. He actually had the nerve to propose to me. Think of it, dear. I never was so bored in all my life. Plenty of assurance, I think, and his wife been dead but a year! I settled him. I wrote him that it was quite out of the question —quite! Oh, love of my heart, how can I bear your absence much longer?

Your devoted Madge.

P. S.—I heard today that Mr. Galloway was booked for Europe and by a curious coincidence sails the very day we do on the Celtic. How horrid!

Grand Hotel, Paris, Feb. 15, 1902.

Mamma Dear:

I did what you wanted me to and here I am! A more perfectly wretched young woman never did draw breath. I can't help thinking you were just a bit too calculating when you formulated this matrimonial scheme, and I don't see how we are to profit by it, anyhow.

The General is a well-meaning old curmudgeon, but not half so rich as we all hoped and believed he was. If I had only known the true state of his finances, I should never have sold myself as I did. Even at the risk of offending you, Mamma, I should have called the whole deal off. Oh, how he bores me! He is old and ugly and cranky and cross. Never mind, though, Mamma dear, there's a silver lining here as elsewhere—in this particular instance being Charlie. You remember that very handsome blond you were so opposed to my loving? He is here in Paris today. Don't say it's sinful! you have driven me to it. Charlie says existence is intolerable without me and he is here I guess to stay. Don't worry about me, Mamma dear, and above all don't pray for me. Your prayers won't count now, anyhow, the damage is done. Madge.

Paris, March 12, 1902.

Darling Mamma:

It isn't often that the wheel of chance turns just to our fancy but in my case it finally has. The General is dead. He succumbed last night to an attack of apoplexy after one of those horrible drunks. I find by his will he has left me more than I ever dreamed of—a cool million. Charlie is so sympathetic. He says I can have him when ever I chose to, the dear! I shall sail at once for home. For the looks of the thing will be in deepest black, but in my heart, Mamma dear—the mourning is over. Mamma, you're a trump. Here's a bumper to you—and Charlie. Madge.

"I bought my wife a parrot today," said the first club man.
"And why a parrot?"
"So as to save me the trouble of talking to her."

The stronger don't always win the battle, according to a good many married men.

Easter Gowns Tell Their Secrets

"I've felt it in my feather-bones for a week," said the blue poplin, fidgeting uneasily on its hook.

"Sh!" cautioned the little velvet coatee, who was very good form.

"Hm!" sniffed the strawberry mousseline. "How do you suppose that hat, tied up there in a box and half smothered with tissue paper, is going to hear what the poplin says?"

"I knew Easter was coming," continued the poplin, "even before Celeste brought in the hat. I suppose—" But just then Celeste opened the closet door again, this time carrying a lovely berege colored gown, freighted with yards and yards of Russian lace. The maid moved the poplin back and hung the berege on its hook.

"Dear me," yawned the newcomer, "doesn't it seem good to stretch out! One gets so dreadfully cramped and mussed in those horrid boxes. I hope you don't mind my taking your hook"—this to the blue poplin. "You know we're related, so it's in the family, after all."

"Oh, I've got my family history down to a fine point," insisted the berege. "I forgot to introduce myself—'Samite' is my name. 'Looks something like poplin,' I heard a lady say, while I was still in the store. 'It's a modern edition of poplin,' the clerk answered. Poplin was the grandmother of samite!'"

"Is madame going to wear you on Easter morning?" timidly asked the gray crepe.

The samite shook its flounces disdainfully. "No, indeed! She's too swell to make a mistake like that. Only people who get their fashions from the Sunday supplements wear glad rags on Easter. The poplin may have a chance to make a 'positively farewell appearance' on that day."

"Oh, the rest of you needn't gloat over the poplin. Half of you will be relegated to Celeste's closet or thrown away to make room for all the new gowns the modiste who fashioned me is going to send Madame."

"You're good as new," complained a fluffy blue chiffon innumerable of ruffs and puffs, "but poor silly me, I've a scandalous tear in my train and all because a horrid man tried to kiss Madame at the Dolger ball. He was a married man too and ought to have known how to do it without pretty nearly tearing me off her back. But either Madame didn't want his caresses or she was afraid her husband might be near, for she drew back and he put his foot through my ruffle before he managed it. And then I thought he would scorch my shoulder straps when his lips happened to miss the dimple on her shoulder. I hope I'm not beyond repair."

"You're probably safe," said the spangle gown, in a hard metallic voice. "I'll be the first to go, though she only wore me once and that six months ago. It was the night her husband proposed to her. The old moneybags was terribly fluttered, but she was cold and pulseless. When he put his hands on her soft velvety arm I could feel her quiver with pain. He kissed her just once on the lips and when he left her, she bit them till a drop of blood fell on me just over her heart. She hates me, I know, for whenever Celeste suggests that she wear me, Madame shudders."

"Well, it's not your fault," said a pink velvet evening coat. "Personally I thought Madame never looked as stunning as that night. You remember I went in the carriage with you. The way you clung to her figure left nothing to the imagination. I remember I heard her mother say, 'If that gown doesn't fetch him, my love, nothing will.' It's base ingratitude for Madame to discard you after you helped her land the ogre."

"I should think that dowdy white organdie would be the first to go," whispered a mauve cloth.

"If they only knew!" thought the organdie. "She's Madame to them, but she's Miss Margaret to me. 'Margie,' he used to call her. She had me on the night he first met her, and after that she used to come and bury her sweet blushing face in my folds and tell me where they went and what he said. One evening she put me on and ran down to the end of the garden where he was waiting for Margie to ask her to marry him. But her mother wouldn't hear of it and one day Miss Margaret cried over me and said that he'd gone off to try to make a fortune big enough to win her mother's consent. At the end of the year she came to me again, but this time she didn't cry. 'He's dead,' she said, and laughed, but it was more horrible than tears. When she married the ogre I knew—"

Just then Celeste threw open the closet door to re-arrange Madame's clothes and the conversation abruptly ended.

STAGE

At the Columbia

With the exception of the scenic features and the central figure, John Storm, the present production of "The Christian" at the Columbia is not so strong as the one originally presenting the play here. That was a road company, too, and the present one is the original New York cast minus Viola Allen. We have had other cases of road companies being better than the originals—the first "Shenandoah" production here, for instance. But E. J. Morgan is a great John Storm. One forgets the irrationality of such a character in his remarkable grasp of the main points in Storm's disposition. Morgan is a wonderfully intense actor. Except poor Teddy Henley I know of no actor I have ever seen who can match him in this quality. He clutches your sympathies as only an intense actor can. The only part of his impersonation that falls short of expectation is in that scene with Glory where John Storm sacrifices his life principles at the woman's kiss. Morgan's idea of this seems to me too much like an impressionist's painting. There is not enough of good red blood in it. It leaves too much to the auditor's imagination. Elsie Leslie, not in the least the Glory Quayle of Caine, is still very charming. As yet she is too artificial to impress, for she still has some of the one-two-three of the dramatic school clinging to her. But she is as pretty a creature as one would wish to see, graceful and lovable. Her intelligence gives her a fine conception of the role but her youth and inexperience seem to keep her from giving full expression to her idea of it.

Honors for a Californian

Caro Roma, who has been prima donna of an English opera company now for some seasons, had the honor of singing before the King in London recently. Three times Edward VII visited the theatre, the bills being "La Fille du Regiment," "Lucia" and "Somnambula." San Franciscans who were present report that Edward appeared greatly pleased with Roma's singing and in the amusing music lesson scene in the second act of the "Daughter," he laughed and applauded heartily. Roma has any number of valuable gifts she has received from royalty and others. One is a pin that Queen Victoria gave her. Another, her latest present, was from the members of the company of which she is prima. It is a brooch in the shape of a ROMA, the Miss Roberts has the power of refining any role she interprets and her Zaza is sure to be something quite different from that of Mrs. Leslie Carter. Miss Roberts has played the part through the northwest and has won the critics all along the line. The Tacoma News calls her "unquestionably one of the great actresses of the day," and further declares: "Through five long acts Miss Roberts rises to continuously greater heights in her dramatic art and not once is there the least suspicion of a false note or a suggestion of a failure to interpret the difficult theme. * * * Her acting is natural, refined, vivid, intense and thoroughly artistic." It is only a little over two months now before Miss Roberts' season begins at the Alcazar and "Zaza" will be her opening bill.

Coming FANNIE BLOOMFIELD ZEISLER

Rialto Gossip from London

From London my correspondent writes me: Just now we are having a moral disturbance. There's to be a new opera syndicate backed by thousands of pounds which is to produce operas only on an operatic basis. They have been looking about for West End theatres. Each time ,however, when there have been papers to be signed there's thus far been a prima donna attached to the lease at the very last minute, and the capitalists have rebelled. They want a place where there is no "influence" behind the money part of it and where the company is free to engage its own sopranos. Things are desperate in the comic opera and musical comedy line as the dramas that draw are only patronized from the costume standpoint, to give Society a chance to copy the gorgeous raiment. The royal family are "doing" the theatres in great shape. It is nothing new, and scarcely worth a line in the papers, for the King to go to the play. Gillette has to move from the Lyceum to make room for Sir Henry Irving. "Sherlock Holmes" and Elliott's "Mice and Men" are the two big drawing cards still. Alice Neilsen's name does not yet appear in the list of Covent Garden artists; she may return home after Coronation.

San Francisco Agreed with London

A press despatch says that "in spite of its popularity in America 'The Girl from Maxim's' has utterly failed to be appreciated in London. Seldom has a play been so unmercifully criticised." It seems strange that such a piece as "The Girl from Maxim's" should have been permitted to cross the water with the idea of pleasing our English cousins. Unless the Londoners are much more coarse in their feelings than we are here anyone could have predicted a failure for "The Girl." In New York, where there is a large floating population eager to take in all shows good or bad, the worst things dramatic can have a go of several months. But the smaller cities wouldn't have "The Girl" at any price. In San Francisco it only ran a week and there were icicles all over the interior of the Columbia even during that brief run.

Sensational reports were sent out last week from St. Louis to the effect that Mrs. Fiske had met with a serious accident while playing at the Grand Opera House there. It was said that while she was appearing in "A Bit of Old Chelsea" a platform gave way and she was violently hurled to the stage, a distance varying in the accounts from eight to twenty feet. It was said that Mrs. Fiske struck upon her head and was stunned, that the audience was dismissed, and that she was removed to her hotel, where a physician announced that she would not be able to play for several days. This story was wholly a fabrication. No accident occurred.

Louis W. Buckley, who so successfully managed the late Fairyland carnival in San Francisco, is now arranging a street carnival for Bakersfield, to take place from May thirtieth to June tenth inclusive. While in some respects the carnival will be on the order of la fiesta, such as those given in California, otherwise it will be unique and original. Under the guardianship to Colonel Tim Spellacy, a well-known oil man, one entire block of ground opposite the court house will be devoted as an exposition and exhibition of the oil industry interests in Kern county. A well in complete operation, prospecting for oil, the latest appliances for showing the consumption of oil as a fuel, machinery, drilling for oil and other similar features of the industry, will be extensively shown on this tract of land.

So great has the success of "Foxy Grandpa" been at the Fourteenth street theatre, New York, that it is more than probable that Joseph Hart and his merry crew will shortly move into a Broadway theatre for the summer preparatory to a season at Manhattan Beach in July.

Joseph R. Grismer created the part of Judas in the much decried production of Clay M. Greene's "Nazareth" by the Lambs club recently. Mr. Grismer and William A. Brady control the rights of this spectacle.

Fred Belasco leaves for the East on the thirty-first for the purpose of meeting his partner, Sam Thall, in New York. They will secure new plays and people and will then return in time for the Florence Roberts season.

Attractions Next Week

Packed houses attest the appreciation of the public for the really magnificent productions Melbourne MacDowell and Florence Stone are giving at the Grand of the Sardou dramas. "La Tosca" this week is a great success. Next Monday evening "The Empress Theodora" will mark the third week of the Sardou plays. This play was produced here last year for the first time and was most enthusiastically received. It is one of the most picturesque of all the Sardou creations. The plot calls for the most sumptuous settings of any of Sardou's plays and Robert McGreer and his corps of scenic artists are working day and night on the scenery. The hippodrome scene will introduce the lions Nero and Juno from the Chutes.

Next week will be the sixth and last of "The Serenade" at the Tivoli. On Monday, April seventh, comes the Alice Neilsen opera, "The Fortune Teller," which was seen here with the soprano in the title role. This will be the first production at reasonable prices.

Mr. and Mrs. Sidney Drew will appear for the first time in several seasons at the Orpheum tomorrow afternoon, presenting their comedy success, "A Model Young Man," in which they have scored a great hit throughout the East and England. Homer Lind, operatic baritone, recently of the Metropolitan English grand opera company, will make his initial appearence in this city, with a strong supporting company, in a dramatization from the French, "Gringoire, the Street Singer," dialogue by Willard Holcomb, music by Julian Edwards. Two of Mr. Lind's solos, "I Do Not Care Who Makes the Laws So I Make the Verses" and "The Rhyme of the Razor," are said to be charming. The title role is that of a poet of the people, who sings his way into the heart of his lady love, and into the graces of King Louis XI. Fred Staher, banjo soloist, will also be hearrd here for the first time. Simon, Gardner & Co., Papinta, the Melani trio and Gorman and Keppler will vary their acts.

"The Christian" will go another week at the Columbia, the final performance to be given Sunday night, April sixth. E. S. Willard in his great production of "The Cardinal" comes next.

The success of "Little Christopher" has been so pronounced that it will be kept on for one more week. Extensive preparatins are being made for the coming great sensation at Fischer's, as on Monday night, April seventh, the famous Weber & Field's productions will be given a long season at this place of amusement. The entire original principals who are now playing "Fiddle-Dee-Dee" throughout the country have been secured to augment the present company, as has also Mr. Harry James, a well known leader, who for the past ten years has been identified with all of the Weber & Field plays. Among the newcomers are Maud Amber, a fine soprano who though a brunette is said to resumble Lillian Russell very closely in voice and manner; Kolb and Dill, who have Weber and Field's parts in all the road productions, and Barney Barnard, a comedian of the David Warfield order. There are also some new chorus girls, who have been imported expressly from Broadway, and who will surely make the chappies' heads whirl.

"Brother John," Martha Morton's successful comedy, will be the Alcazar's offering next week. George Osbourne will have the name part, that of a rich hatter who tries with his sister's smart life at Newport. For the week of April seventh a strong double bill is anounced when "Madame Butterfly," in conjunction with "The Great Unknown," will be presented with nearly the original cast. Juliet Crosby will play her old part, in which she scored such a hit last season. Posters anouncing the coming production of Charles Francis Bryant and Lotta Day Coleman's new play, "When the Heart Was Young," are to be seen about town.

"The Sleeping City," a drama of New York life, full of thrills, will be the Central's bill next week.

LETTERS

"The House with the Green Shutters"

From the endless stream of printed paper rushing from the overworked press one occasionally picks out a BOOK, and the day on which it happens is a day of rejoicing. The Book is not always a pretty tale of love and marriage, and the author is not always one whose name is known, but if there is meat and drink in his work it will make itself known and felt. "The House with the Green Shutters" would have been a notable production under any circumstances. For a first novel it is remarkable. We have been somewhat overburdened of late with stories of Scotch villagers, all douce and canny bodies, pious, sentimental and humorous. Their griefs and their joys have been set before us with such idealization that we have been hypnotized into a half-belief that Heaven and Thrums were but a short mile apart and the barefooted Scotch callant had but to show his face at the college at Edinboro', and prizes dropped into his hands like over-ripe plums. The minister has been set before us as the visible head of the church, and life has flowed on serenely to the end with few ups and no downs. We thought we knew our Scotch villagers as we know the humbler parts of our native towns, and we were content with our knowledge. Now comes George Douglas, and wakes us from our comfortable dozing. His Barbie is so diametrically different from the local ities of Barrie and Maclaren, that one could almost believe he had set himself the task of correcting the impression they have made by going to the other extreme and leaving us to come to a more correct vision by averaging both and finding the truth between them. It is difficult to determine which of the Gourlays, the father or the son, is really the centre of interest. Hero there is none, nor heroine, unless the dogged silence of mother and daughter be accounted heroism. The house with the green shutters is the visible, tangible sign of the prosperity of Gourlay the elder, and by its prominence and presence he flaunts his success in the faces of his neighbors. A hard, dull man, absolutely devoid of feeling, he has dominated the village and driven competitors from his field by sheer brute underbidding, even to the point of carrying goods for nothing until he has gained his point. Neat and methodical in all things, he has married a weak-minded slattern for the sake of her bit of dowry with which to enlarge his business, and the fly in his ointment in the years of his prosperity is the untidiness of his pretentious home. One can easily picture a community like Barbie, where the brighter wits and more progressive inhabitants seek fresh pastures, leaving at home only failures, the incompetents, the slow-witted and the sour-tempered. One can even imagine them taking their characteristics from Gourlay himself, just as children reflect their parents, and in time come to be their counterparts. Hating and fearing Gourlay, at the same time his neighbors had a sort of respect for him for the very brutality which brought him his success. Failure or downfall was never thought of with him. And it might never have come, could the old conditions have remained, but with the advent of the railroad, and the new methods of transacting business, quicker and shrewder brains soon undermine his monopoly. Then begins a dogged fight to hold on, but mere brute determination has no chance against the shrewder wit and natural business of a competitor, and little by little business falls off. Wild plunges and extravagant expenditures, many of them sheer bluff, help to eat into the fortune which has been supposed to be boundless. The family is kept in ignorance, and what hints they might have gleaned are set down to the surly ill-temper and natural fault-finding of Gourlay's disposition. The son, dull and weak by nature, spoiled by the foolish indulgence of his mother and the harshness of his father, has had what little he has learned literally thrashed into him. He is sent away to a high school in order to make as bold a front as others, and later, is sent to Edinborough to college, with a dim idea that an education can be bought like other commodities, and traded upon like any other invested capital. Hating books in any other form than that of silly novels, a taste inherited from the mother, the lad does little good. His natural inclination is to follow his father's business and what little preference he has is for home and familiar surroundings, yet abroad he must go and a scholar he must be at his father's command. Timid and nervous he yet swaggers and struts, on the strength of his father's supposed solidity. Possessed of nerves but without brains, with power to perceive but not to understand, and with an uncanny gift for "seeing pictures inside his head," and imagining all sorts of horrors, the young Gourlay, with the mind of a plowboy, set to wrestle with abstractions of mental philosophy, manages to distort the remarks of a professor in that science to fit his own ideas and to encourage him to applying whisky as a stimulant to such wit as he has. The end is not far off. Expulsion from college sends him home on the eve of the final collapse of the family fortunes. A quarrel with his father leads to murder. Insanity is the next chapter in the gruesome history, and the mother and sister, left alone in their misery, each, unknown to the other, stricken with mortal disease, make an end to the tragedy. The history of the House with the Green Shutters closes consistently, with ruin and death. There is not a single pleasant character in the whole book, from cover to cover, though the baker shines ever so little by contrast with the rest of the inhabitants to whom we are introduced. He occasionally has a gleam of humanity. With the others of the "bodies," the one form of humor which they indulge in is what they themselves term "a slap in the face," a knife turned in a green wound. With their quicker wits and sharper tongues, they bait Gourlay, and their malicious spite is not lessened by his repressiveness and lack of words to pay them back in kind. All the inhabitants of Barbie may not have been such as these, but the provost, the deacon, and the other worthies who met at the head of the brae to gossip and shoot their prickly arrows, are typical of a class to be found in any community where every one's affairs are known to all the rest, and where generations of the same families hand down gossip as an inheritance. This is a book that calls for reading. It will not find its place amongst the dainty trifles of my lady's boudoir, nor on the shelf for juveniles. Those who like to spend their tears on the woes of Angelina and her three-hundred-page journey to the matrimonial altar with her Orlando had best be warned off. Good people who want something soothing, with a pretty ending, will find nothing here for them, but to those who like a meal of strong meat, it is here. It has all the strength of Zola, without his muck and mire. [McClure, Phillips & Co.]

Antiseptic Barber without Soap. Why be lathered for a shave?

Among barbers improvement has been the watchword, and their leader, Mr. W. G. Seppich of the Russ House Antiseptic Barber Shop and Baths, at 217 Montgomery street, who it will be remembered is the originator of the antiseptic and license law for barbers of this State, has now introduced a new method of shaving without soap. It is antiseptic, clean and smooth; it will never burn or smart the skin. Shaving cups are no more used at the Russ House Antiseptic Barber Shop, where fifteen cents is the price of a shave. Altogether, fourteen artists are engaged in this establishment, likewise a manicure and chiropodist. Mr. Seppich takes great pride in his achievement and is glad to explain to all inquirers how his establishment is kept in antiseptic condition.

Mention Town Talk when getting a shave and you will be presented with a Pot of Cream Free

ARTISTIC PHOTOGRAPHY

For many years in San Francisco the name of Dames was one to conjure with in photography. It was San Francisco's loss when Mr. Dames departed to Oakland. There as well as here he at once took the lead. Today the firm of Dames and Arrowsmith, photographers, 1116 Washington street, Oakland, have one of the finest galleries and produce some of the most superior work in California. They excel in artistic posings and groupings, employing all the latest effects, and the results are simply perfect.

The Heinrichs

After an absence of four years Max Heinrich, the famous basso and pianist, and his daughter Julia, whose beautiful contralto voice created such favorable comment here, will return and give three recitals at Sherman & Clay hall, next Tuesday and Thursday nights and Saturday afternoon. Heinrich, erstwhile a noted actor, will recite on Tuesday night Tennyson's "Enoch Arden" which has been given a musical setting by the celebrated Richard Strauss. The latter will be rendered at the piano by Julia Heinrich. The second portion of the program will consist of songs by Arthur Foote, Horatio Parker, Schumann and others. Thursday night's program, which was given here in full last week, will contain compositions of Schumann, Schubert, Lalo, Leo Delibes, Henschel, Goring Thomas, Emil Bruguiere, Mackenzie, Gounod, Dvorak, and Schubert. The final program to be given next Saturday afternoon will be announced later. Reserved seats, seventy-five cents, one dollar and one dollar and a half, are now on sale at Sherman, Clay & Co.'s.

Strauss "Enoch Arden"

Richard Strauss' Enoch Arden is a musical composition of novel conception. Strauss himself has called it "Melodrama for the Pianoforte." It is in reality a series of descriptive tone pictures knit together by the wording of Tennyson's poem. The themes are of a clearly defined melodic nature. The listener catches first the roar of the sea dashing spray against the cliff-lines of Enoch Arden's village. Even now surely may be heard the overwhelming sadness of Enoch's fate swelling out from the instrument at the first mention in the poem of Enoch's name. One catches also the charm and gentleness of Annie, first in daintily playful cadence, then more deeply, portentously, as loneliness and poverty press close about. Annie's dream has the sweep of harps lightly flashing as from a vague golden dawn; after Enoch's death tones melt into tones, rise and glow.

Elaborate Wedding Music

At the home wedding of Miss Florence Neustadter and Walter Stettheimer, the excellent music under the direction of Cantor E. J. Stark formed a part of the ceremony and added much to the impressiveness of the affair. The choir of the Temple Emanu-El was present and an orchestra of ten instruments, including a two-manual pedal organ, assisted in the musical portion. Cantor Stark had arranged and composed words and music to a wedding hymn for chorus with soprano and baritone solos. Miss Daisy Cohn's beautiful voice, in connection with her artistic rendition, was quite conspicuous in the solo parts, and the entire ensemble work was of a most effective and inspiring character. Cantor Stark essayed the baritone solo in his usual artistic and intelligent interpretation. Mr. W. A. Sabin presided at the organ.

(Lines written on a five dollar Confederate bill, and picked up in the street of one of the Southern cities in 1865.)

Representing nothing on God's earth now;
And naught in the waters below it.
As the pledge of a nation that passed away.
Keep it, dear friend, and show it.
Show it to those who will lend an ear.
To the tale this trifle will tell,
Of Liberty—born of a patriot's dream;
Of a storm-cradled nation—that fell.

Too poor to possess the precious ones,
And too much of a stranger, to borrow,
We issued today our "Promise to pay,"
And hoped to redeem on the morrow.
The days rolled on, and weeks became years,
But our coffers were empty still.
Coin was so scarce, the treasury quaked,
If a dollar should drop in the till.

But the faith that was in us was strong indeed.
For our poverty—well, we discerned,
And this little check represents the pay
That our suffering veterans earned.
They knew it had hardly a value in gold,
Yet, as gold our soldiers received it;
It gazed in our eyes, with its promise to pay,
And every true soldier believed it.

But our boys thought little of price or pay,
Or of bills that were overdue;
We knew if it bought our bread today
'Twas the best our poor country could do.
Keep it, for it tells all our history over,
From the birth of the dream to its last,
Modest, and born of the angel Hope,
Like our hope of success—it has passed.

Music—Continued

With the Musicians

The evening of Chamber Music given by the Musicians' club on Thursday evening of last week packed the hall with a notably cultured and attentive audience, a large percentage being musicians, professional and amateur. The program was well chosen and given by picked musicians in a way that brought the evening's work up to a standard rarely excelled by any visiting organization that comes this way. In the quintet in E flat major, in Mozart's most characteristic vein, oboe, clarinet and horn were well sustained. Mr. Martinez was at the piano, his work running like a delicate undercurrent through the measures, never too prominent, yet always with precision and effect. Beethoven's exquisite serenade was adequately rendered by Messrs. Rodeman, Wismer and Fuhrer. Rodeman's flute rarely having been heard to better advantage than in conjunction with Wismer's free bowing. Assisting the club was a new vocal organization, the Polyhymnia quartet, composed of Mrs. Brown Dexter, Miss Una Fairweather, Messrs. Aspland and Barnhart, accompanied by Messrs. Fickenscher and Sabin in love songs of Brahms, a succession of quartets, duets and solos in eighteen sections, with all Brahms' absence of the stereotyped and a tenderness and sentimental melodiousness not always dominant in a Brahms number. The closing trio for piano, violin and horn, also a Brahms number, was marred by the too strident horn.

For a Worthy Cause

Great preparations have been made for the production of "The Bohemian Girl" and the minstrel entertainment to be given for the benefit of St. Dominic's church, next Tuesday evening. The affair will take place at the Alhambra, and as it is for such a worthy cause, the theatre is sure to be crowded. The opera will be sung by members of St. Dominic's juvenile choir, and a band of well-trained boys will give the minstrel part after the old-time style.

The twenty-fourth anniversary of Unity Lodge, No. 27, A. O. U. W., will be commemorated by the members with an entertainment and dance, to be given next Tuesday evening, April first, in Elks' hall, 223 Sutter street. An admirable program has been arranged.

CHEERING THE CONTESTANT.

Husband: The doctor says if I keep up this eternal race for money I'll break down before I'm forty.

Wife: Never mind, dear; keep it up, for by that time we'll have enough put away to afford it. — The Butler.

AFTER THE DIVORCE.

Mr. Popps: When were the suspicions first aroused that he had married her for her money?

Mrs. Popps: When she had to pay the minister. —The Footman.

She: Very often a woman's face proves her fortune.

He: Yes; and how often a man's cheek is his.

WHEN SHE LOOKED HER BEST.

Loquacious Visitor: (who had been describing her trousseau): You ought to see me in my going-away gown.

Hostess: I wish I could.

—The Maid.

"I see the Boers have won another victory and taken the British by surprise."

"That's odd. I shouldn't think anything would surprise them now."

SAVING HER REPUTATION.

Mrs. Buzz: I don't see how Mrs. Gayly can afford to wear so many expensive tips on her hat.

Mrs. Fuzz: Why not? Her husband is a waiter in Drinkand's.

OUR OPINION

Watterson's Absurd Attack

Colonel Henry Watterson's appeal for reorganization at the biennial banquet of the Virginia Democratic Association was an entertaining after-dinner speech, delivered no doubt in the characteristically fervid style of that distinguished Southern gentleman. It sounded well after the pousse-cafe, but the average reader free from the mellow influences of a Washington banquet is impressed with the absurdities only of the Colonel's utterances. No sane American looks upon the present occupant of the White House as the Man on Horseback intent upon becoming a military dictator. The average job-chasing Democrat may be eager to denounce President Roosevelt as a menace to Republican institutions, but sincere and patriotic representatives of the party admire him as an American and have confidence in his loyalty to his country. We may object to the principles of the Republican party without questioning the sincerity of Roosevelt. Up to date he has done nothing to cause alarm. On the contrary, he has made it apparent that he is not in sympathy with the sharks that thrived during the administration of his predecessor. He has nullified imperialism by his stand for Cuba's right to free trade. His action against the Northern Securities Company was the most effective attack on the Trusts that has yet been made. His attitude toward Wall street clearly demonstrates that he is free from the malign influences that cast discredit on the Treasury Department under Secretary Gage. It was the habit of Mr. Gage to relieve stringency in the money market, from time to time, by buying Government bonds. As a consequence the Wall street manipulators, in anticipation of Gage's action, used to buy up big blocks of Federal bonds, whenever there were indications of higher money-rates, and then sold their holdings at outrageously high prices to the Secretary of the Treasury. President Roosevelt has decided to discontinue that practice. He believes that he can keep the sea of finance smooth by different and less suspicious methods. Indeed President Roosevelt has been doing many things contrary to custom, but they are not of a character to warrant such attacks as that made by the blatant Watterson.

About Hero Worship

The New York Sun asks, "Are our women growing in the matter of hero worship?" The question was suggested by the frenzied conduct of a mob of maudlin females on the occasion of a recent concert by Kubelik, the Bohemian musician. Women have been hero worshipers from time immemorial, and there has not been much change in the manifestation of their admiration. Neither have they evinced a tendency to seek new gods. All heroes look alike to the sentimental female. The woman that enthused over the warrior of yesterday may be found groveling at the feet of the fiddler of today. The women that raged over Kubelik are full-blooded sisters to those that wove garlands for David after his justly celebrated conquest of the biblical bully. The intense emotionalists of the skirted sex that laid hands on Paderewski, the tawny Pole, were fired by the same enthusiasts that moved a mob of quivering worshipers to plant fervid kisses on the ready lips of Hobson the sailor. The whole sex has a predilection for thrills, and merely seeks in the adoration of some particular figure a romantic contrast to the routine of every day life. They are frenzied with love for the favorite of the hour and it matters not whether he be talented musician, bold and dashing soldier, handsome actor or muscular prize-fighter, he appeals with equal strength to the emotionalists of the sex. There has been no evolution in the matter of hero worship. Women are no more susceptible to the influences of the exceptional man today than they were a thousand years ago, but perhaps the twentieth century woman is a trifle more demonstrative and bolder as a consequence of her greater independence.

Charms Must Not Be Fictitious

A decision renderd by the Supreme Court of Iowa the other day is fraught with warning to fair femininity. It is a decision which may go a long way toward discouraging suits for breach-of-promise, for if the Supreme Courts of other States should decide to follow the reasoning of Iowa's high tribunal then it would not be so easy for artful plaintiffs to recover judgment against their erstwhile wooers. It is no trick at all under our chivalrous code, as usually interpreted, for a dashing damsel or a demure maiden to obtain a verdict from the average sympathetic and impressionable jury, but if the law enunciated by the learned jurists of Iowa is to prevail then it will avail jilted maidens nothing to beguile susceptible jurors. The plaintiff in the Iowa suit was Jennie Amsler. Her recreant wooer was William Strong. William fell in love with Jennie's glorious, silken tresses. They were of a nut-brown shade and rippled luxuriantly over her shoulders. William's weakness was pretty hair, and Jennie's gleaming strands entwined his heart. He wrote sonnets to her hair, and confessed naively that his fancy was caught in its ravishing tangles. One day in the ecstasy of his passion he proposed and was accepted. Pending the solemnization of his vows he regaled his friends with panegyrics on the beautiful nut-brown hair until one day a young woman—an envious one, no doubt—hearing William apostrophizing Jennie's bewitching locks, exclaimed nonchalantly: "Yes, Jennie has beautiful hair. And why shouldn't she, considering what she paid for it?" These remarks were of course innocently uttered, for the young woman was Jennie's bosom friend. But Iago never said anything that cut deeper into the heart of the jealous Moor. Straightway William visited Jennie and asked her bluntly if her hair was her own. Candid Jennie, unaccustomed to the equivocating methods of her sisters, confessed that the nut-brown hair was false. William stormed out of the room declaring the engagement off. Jennie sued for breach of promise and obtained a verdict from a kind-hearted jury with the assistance, no doubt, of her nut-brown hair. But the Supreme Court has set aside the verdict, and the gist of the decision is that the plaintiff's hair having won the defendant's heart, and the said hair not being indigenous to the scalp of the owner, the engagement was procured by false pretenses; verdict for defendant, and plaintiff assessed for costs. There is no doubt of the justice of the decision. It is seldom that weak man is won by the mental endowments only of a woman. Her physical charms usually appeal to him first. It is cruel and unjust to take advantage of his inability to penetrate the mysteries of her toilet. Marriage is, among other things, a contract, and neither party to it should be induced to enter into it by misrepresentation.

Literary Diet of the Young

One of the favorite discussions of the hour in literary periodicals is the question of what children read and what profit the libraries are to them. There seems to be an idea that books are like "pink pills," to be administered in doses, whether they are needed or not. It would seem as a corollary to all that has been written on the subject that what children most need is some sort of guidance on the right shelf. After they have read through a certain strata of juveniles they are at sea, and it is right here that the guiding intelligence of parents should take hold. Boys naturally like adventure, and having no one to point out to them the next step, they take to detective yarns, when they ought to be at Scott and Dumas, and would if they were not timid about attacking "big people's books." Girls gravitate to the Duchess and her style for the same reason. Children not only read the wrong kind of books, but they read altogether too much. The specializing of literature for children, though good in theory, has done infinite harm in practice. Not only have whole libraries been written down to what is supposed to be their intelligence, but a large number of the classics have been simplified or "Bowdlerized" for them. This, in plain English, usually means that the author has been eliminated and the story re-written so that it is only a story. There seems to be a general fear that the modern child will be discouraged by the sight of a solid page. It must be broken up by paragraphs and conversations, and made entertaining. It must be put into such shape that it can be hurried through with and the book returned to the library for exchange. This kind of thing is quite in keeping with the surface scratching of modern educational methods. There is no time to settle down to anything, but the child must learn to take a hasty snatch and run. A prominent educational journal, in one of its recent numbers, devoted space to the exposition of a method for working out problems involving board measure. In the course of the explanation it was naively remarked that "if the children have forgotten that they raise tenths to hundredths by multiplying both terms of their fraction by ten," "if they have forgotten that two-fourths or four-eighths equal one-half," etc., they should be reminded. There it is. If they are unaware of such simple and obvious facts it is because they never knew them. They have never learned that two and two make four, and they have no business, or rather educators have no business, to be dragging them through problems in board measure by main strength. Attempt less and do more. Babies in the receiving classes are stuffed with "Hiawatha" and expected to understand it. Literature, so-called, is fed pretty much after the manner that the famous Squeers administered treacle and brimstone, and children are as apt to be fond of one as the other. It is an over-true picture which Kipling painted, when "Black Sheep," having learned through many tribulations, to stammer through his first reader, laid the book aside with the resolution that he would never read any more. The modern fashion of "studying authors" is enough to discourage any one, and small wonder there will be if children go wide to avoid any book or writer mentioned in school. Gerald Stanley Lee says the modern idea seems to be that if the average child cannot be taught a classic, he must be choked with it. The same remark is to be applied to reading. Instead of letting the child grow up to books, and read as naturally as he eats or plays, because he wants to do it, he is made to read. If he cannot take the book as a whole, it is condensed and boiled down, and administered in tinctures, extracts and capsules. Instead of the mind growing to the book, the book is fitted to the mind. Libraries do as much harm as good to children, and in the way that they are permitted to devour fiction without guidance, they might as well be turned loose in a druggist's laboratory, with permission to taste and handle in the same free style. Children are not apt to suffer by free access to expurgated editions of the classics. It is the exceptional one who is precocious enough to understand even the plainest statements, and they are more than apt to drop the subtleties as stupid. They are injured by the weak draughts of "children's editions," and by the wretched style of the books that are put into their hands as unobjectionable because they are the products of some ministerial hack writer, or are published by some religious house. One pernicious form of children's literature is the "Children's Page." It is not necessary to enter into any description of its style or contents, since any one with curiosity enough to investigate the subject has the material close at hand. One result of this department has been to crowd out of existence the many excellent juvenile monthlies which were a delight and a real help to the last generation of children. Another, and a very grave consideration, is that we have now a generation of newspaper reading children. They begin with the children's page, but they do not end there. Week by week they extend their researches, until they are eager to devour the scandals of society and the sensations of crime. At a very early age they become initiated, and they demand their spiced diet. Children read too much in quantity, and of the wrong quality. They have access to too much print, and what they need is to learn to digest more of what they read, not to read more. One book in a week is ample literary diet in addition to school work. One a month is better still.

The Saunterer

Poniatowski of Saumur

Under the constitution of the University Club a man is not eligible to membership who is not possessed of the qualification which Mrs. Astor declares to be essential to all who desire to become gentlemen. But I have begun to think that, perhaps, Mrs. Astor is not so exacting as people have been led to believe. This thought suggests itself by reason of the fact that I have learned that the University Club places a very liberal construction on the term, "college education." Looking over the catalogue of this gentlemanly club the other day, I came across the name of Prince Poniatowski, than whom there is no more high-toned gentleman from Dan to Beersheba. The university from which he is accredited, according to the catalogue, is located in the town of Saumur in France. I had never heard of that institution, but upon learning that the Prince had been educated there, my curiosity was aroused. Being aware of the Prince's high attainments in the science of finance, I thought that perhaps the old world college of Saumur was an institution devoted to the training of men in the fine art of organizing syndicates. I consulted the Columbian Cyclopedia, and much to my surprise, learned that the Ecole Militaire de Cavalerie of Saumur makes no pretensions to promoting mental culture.

A Noble Smithy

The specialty of this old world institution is horsemanship. But it is an historical school, and one from which any cultured gentleman should be proud of having graduated. Its diploma proclaims the fact that a graduate of that school is skilled not only in horsemanship, but also in the art of shoeing a horse or making a saddle. And I doubt whether there is another member of the University Club who is possessed of those accomplishments. The Militaire de Cavalerie was founded in 1825. It was organized for the purpose of training non-commissioned officers for the French army with a view of having the best methods of riding, saddle-making and shoeing introduced into the cavalry regiments to which graduates were assigned. The classics are tabu at Saumur, but having taken the course there a man should have no trouble in becoming an expert polo player, and that is one of the highest accomplishments of Mrs. Astor's school of gentlemen.

The Club's High Standard

But according to the constitution of the University Club no person is eligible to membership who has not spent at least two years in a college of recognized standards. I have been informed that the course at Saumur is taken in one year. So the probability is that the case of Prince Poniatowski is an exceptional one, and that he was admitted because of his exceptional accomplishments. Such is my conviction, for I know that a few years ago, a very popular member of the Pacific-Union Club was rejected by the University Club because it was thought that Santa Clara college of which he was a graduate was not entitled to rank among the high-grade institutions of learning. I believe this view has been changed since, but I refer to the incident by way of evidence of the altitude of the club's directors. Having admitted the Prince on his Saumur diploma it is evident that mental culture is no longer the touchstone of eligibility at the University Club. You cannot become a member unless you have Astorfied as a gentleman, but you are thrice welcome if you are a Prince and a rider.

To Abandon the Stage

Miss Frances Joliffe has decided to retire from the stage, and the Joliffes of San Francisco are jubilant. Miss Frances has not been disillusioned. She has had no unpleasant experience before the footlights, and she has had no occasion to regret her determination of a few years ago to carve out a theatrical career. But she could no longer stand the pressure of home influence. Her histrionic ambition was distressing to her relatives, and they sought in every way to dissuade her from going on the stage. But she refused to be sidetracked. When it was publicly anounced that she intended to ornament the drama there was great surprise in local social circles.

THE STANDARD FOR CHAMPAGNE QUALITY IS

Her Brief Career

Her sisters had made such good matches that everybody wondered why she had not been inspired to emulate them. In view of the family connections that had been established, it looked easy for Frances, but the prospect was somewhat vague and being a girl of considerable independence she resolved to make her own living. For a short while she played small parts at the Alcazar, just for experience, and later on she joined Madame Modjeska's company. She has toured through the East and has met with some measure of success. From the talent she has displayed there is no doubt that she could maintain the independence of bachelorhood for life on the stage, but she has heeded the pleadings of her sisters. She is now living with some friends in New York but will return home in a month or two. There will be great rejoicing in Pacific avenue over the return of the prodigal sister.

Greene and His Play

Judging from the storm of protests that startled the members of the Lambs' Club in New York when they produced Clay Greene's Passion Play, the probability is that the playwright will change his mind about utilizing his Santa Clara college inspiration for commercial purposes. It was unfortunate that Greene was ever persuaded by manager Brady and actor Grismer to put his Passion Play on the road. He wrote that play for the Jesuit Fathers of Santa Clara, and he was originally imbued with the idea that it should never be produced outside of the walls of the college where the inspiration came to him, and in the propitious atmosphere of which he did his noble work. It was the hope of his friends that the play would become identified with the religious institution and attract thither annual pilgrimages. But the astute Brady and the mercenary Grismer, keenly alive to the possible capacity of the play as a money maker, prevailed upon the author to produce it on the professional stage, and the presentation by the Lambs' Club last week was in the nature of a "feeler."

Morse's Suicide

The only objection that the church has to the Passion Play is that when it is used for commercial purposes it is likely to soon become a travesty on the episodes in the life of Christ. It is repugnant to religious people with a fine sense of delicacy that the dramatization of the story of the life of Christ should be used to stimulate the flow of coin into the coffers of people who, perhaps, may have little sympathy with the theme, and who would not hesitate to have the most sacred characters impersonated by persons of unsavory reputation. But a Passion Play produced as was "Nazareth" at Santa Clara college is more effective than a thousand sermons. Salmi Morse wrote his Passion Play for gain, and he went to a suicide's grave. And so strong was the feeling of resentment that the production of his play aroused, that it was suggested that his suicide was the result of remorse.

That Gracie Shain Story

A few weeks ago the dailies told the story of the marriage of Gracie Shain in the East, and of her recently achieved success in Broadway. I am reluctant to spoil a good story, and in this instance to do so is very unpleasant, for I am always ready to enthuse over the accession of Californian girls to the heights of fame and to rejoice over their attainment of happiness. But in the case of Gracie Shain there is no need of painting fanciful pictures of her achievements either theatrically or matrimonially. The erstwhile society girl and Tivoli chorus favorite is bound to strike "pay dirt" some day, and it is not extraordinary that she should meet with reverses. She has talent, beauty and a bewitching manner, and I am confident that she is destined to charm the chappies of Broadway before she is much older.

He is a Gentleman of Leisure

But the fact is that she has not yet begun to push Lillian Russell for first place honors. She is not threatening to come under the wire with Edna May. True, she did rise above the chorus in "The Telephone Girl" company, but that was a road show and the part was a small one. And it was while with that company that she found a husband. True it is, too, that he is a member of a good family, but unfortunately he is not a first quality member. He is a gentleman of leisure and scorns work. His parents were willing to support him in idleness, but unwilling to support a daughter-in-law too. They particularly draw the line at a stage divinity. Now it happens that Gracie Shain, like a good and dutiful daughter, is supporting her mother, and she has found it too much of a task to assume the burden of a gentleman of leisure. She is now a member of the chorus of "The Belle of Broadway," and the salary is not large enough to warrant indulgence in luxuries. Latest accounts are to the effect that Gracie has wearied of her matrimonial experience, brief though it has been.

She is a Smuggler

Smuggling is a fine art in this country. One does not have to go into criminal circles to find that a person may be regularly employed as a smuggler and yet be regarded with respect. A Californian writing to me from New York states that some days ago he met a very charming woman at the home of a friend, and that after a few minutes' conversation he learned that she was employed at a high salary by the most fashionable and celebrated ladies' tailor in America. Her duties consist in accompanying, periodically, a buyer employed by the house, to Paris, and returning with high-priced gowns and millinery goods which she represents to be her wearing apparel, and thereby evading the customs' duty. She stated that she never had any difficulty in landing the goods. She merely represented that she had worn them, and she generally arranged them in such a manner as to give them the appearance of having been worn. She related that a gown had been sold that week for nine hundred and twenty-five dollars which she had smuggled into New York. It was purchased in Paris for three hundred dollars.

Cortelyou a Genius

It is rumored in Washington that there is likelihood of George B. Cortelyou being promoted by the President to a fine Federal position. I am of the opinion that President Roosevelt is too shrewd to part with the services of George B. Cortelyou. It would be no easy matter for the President to find a worthy successor to his suave and popular secretary. It was during the illness of Mrs. McKinley in this city that the name of Cortelyou became familiar to the people of the United States. But the people, officials and newspaper correspondents of Washington had known him for a long time. They have long recognized him as a genius in his capacity as secretary to the Chief Executive of the Nation. He is peculiarly adapted by nature for the position which he holds. It is his duty to act as a buffer for the President, and he never loses his head and never says or does the wrong thing. He is constantly in the lime light of publicity and he meets, every day, public men of all grades, and to everybody he is uniformly courteous. Though the incarnation of loyalty to his chief, he is the friend of correspondents whose newspapers are the implacable foes of the Administration. He knows how to differentiate the newspaperman and the paper he represents.

His Duties

Mr. Cortelyou was a stenographer in the Post-office Department when President McKinley selected him for his assistant secretary. He could not have picked a man better qualified for the trying duties of the office. As the assistant to John Addison Porter, who, by the way, was unfitted for the position of secretary, he looked after all the public business of the Executive and had complete charge of his private affairs, too. He has proved himself equal to every emergency, and when Roosevelt succeeded Mr. McKinley, the new President was quick to appreciate the value of Cortelyou's guidance and advice. Only the other day the newspaper fraternity hailed with delight the new rule at the White House to the effect that in future Mr. Cortelyou shall give out the news of Cabinet meetings, obviating the necessity of running after each member to beg for just a few hints. Cortelyou is among other things an accomplished musician and a musical critic. He is one of our public men who is destined to play an important part in the affairs of the nation.

A Tiger Hunt

Mrs. Linda H. Bryan and Miss Mabel Toy were the participants in an exciting alligator hunt during their recent visit to Mrs. Felton, mother of the former, at her beautiful home in Mazatlan, Rosario. There were five of the party, the men being Mr. Hoag, Dr. Moore, formerly of the U. S. A., and Stewart Rawlins. The lagoons were explored and two alligators were killed. One measured eleven and a half feet. The other was smaller. The skins are being tanned. On another occasion a shark six feet long was captured about four miles out in the ocean. The ladies were in Mexico two months, and returned for Easter.

Now for Miss Harvey

Among the new crop of buds in our swim for next season is the elder daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Downey Harvey, who will be a veritable plum for some enterprising young beau. She is not only gifted by nature with personal attractions, but will possess golden charms, being co-heiress with her sister to the fortune left her father by his aunt, Mrs. Donahue. Miss Harvey has been educated at an Eastern convent, passing occasional vacations at home. Whether it is that the genial Downey and his wife regard our Californian methods of bringing up girls as too breezy, deponent knoweth not, but their two daughters have passed most of their girlish lives the other side of the Rockies. There is wealth on both sides of Miss Harvey's family. Her mother, who was Miss Sophie Cutter, is a daughter of Mrs. B. B. Cutter, formerly of Sacramento, who inherited the entire property of her brother, the late L. L. Robinson, which was part of the F. L. A. Pioche estate. Robinson's lack of memory when the French litigants sought an accounting in the settling up of said estate became a matter of notoriety at that time.

And Downey has Wealth

However, Robinson won out, and upon his death, when his own heirs began squabbling for his property, his sister, Mrs. Cutter, proved victorious and entered into possession of his wealth. Mrs. Harvey is her mother's sole heir, the eldest daughter, Mary, familiarly styled "Tot" by her friends and society generally, having been drowned while bathing at their country home on the Sacramento river some years ago. The occurrence was particularly sad as the young girl was just blossoming into womanhood, and, report said, was engaged to the well-known dentist, Dr. W. J. Younger, then a widower. On Downey Harvey's side there is not only the money bequeathed him by Mrs. Donahue, but he will no doubt share with his half-brothers, Peter and Walter Martin, the wealth of their mother, Mrs. Eleanor Martin, he being the son by her first husband, "Old man Harvey" of Southern California.

A Novel Picnic

Apropos of the statement made in one of the dailies, that when Mrs. George Crocker was Mrs. Rutherford she was known as the best swimmer at Monterey, I recall a frolic in which she figured at that interesting watering place. A party of Del Monte guests decided one day upon enjoying a raft picnic, and they went swimming to the raft, each laden with some article for the spree. Mrs. Rutherford, Miss Anna Head and George Crocker each carried a bottle of champagne, Charles Crocker bore on his head a huge cake, Miss Hattie Crocker had a salad in her care and Miss Bonynge a packet of sandwiches. Some of the gentlemen of the party took glasses and wooden plates, but the race was won by General Barnes, notwithstanding the fact that his burden was a bale of blankets. Having arrived at the raft, the party wrapped themselves in the blankets and proceeded to enjoy their feast amid the admiring plaudits of the crowd upon the beach, and after a rest and a smoke they all swam back again to the shore.

Didn't have her Switch On

A friend of Mrs. William G. Irwin telephoned to the home of that lady the other morning and was answered by the butler.

"I should like to talk to Mrs. Irwin," said the friend.

"You can't talk to her for a little while," said the butler.

"Isn't she up yet?" asked the friend.

"Yes," replied the butler, "but she hasn't got her switch on yet."

The astonished lady didn't learn until Mrs. Irwin talked over the wire that the butler meant the telephone switch.

Her Oft-Deferred Debut

Poor Florence Breckenridge! Her friends are agreeing with what she said a little while ago, that she will be a gray-haired woman ere her formal debut in society is made. There seems to be a fatality that the event which all young girls anticipate with such delight should in her case be so often deferred, for as frequently as arrangements are contemplated for her coming out party either serious illness or a death in the family causes a postponement. When her mother married Fred Sharon, Miss Florence was legally adopted by her grandmother, Mrs. Lloyd Tevis, who it is now feared is on her death-bed. Should the old lady pass away it will result in again putting off Miss Breckenridge's debut hitherto deferred by the deaths of her grandfather, Lloyd Tevis, her brothers, Harry Sharon and Lloyd Breckenridge, and her uncle, Hugh Tevis.

Those Lenten Feasters

The consensus of Roman Catholic opinion as expressed by many of its members in regard to the lax observance this year of the penitential period by church people, and particularly by that conspicuous Catholic, Mrs. Martin, is that Town Talk's comments were justified. But if Mrs. Eleanor Martin did give lunch parties on fast days of her church, the feasting was not confined to members of the Catholic church. Ladies in the Episcopal church were guilty of backsliding where a lunch or tea, dinner or dance was the lure. Even women who have lent their voices to the week-day choir and posed as shining lights in at least two of our foremost churches have been noted among the partakers of Lenten hospitality. Two of the ladies are both well known as devotees of wealth and position, and it is therefore not strange that they should have put their duty to their (rich) neighbor before their duty to God. The whole thing resolves itself into this—it was not fashionable this year to "keep Lent." Voila tout.

The Van Ness Avenue Parade

The O'Connor girls gave a tea on Holy Saturday and that certainly capped the climax of Lenten diversions. Next year, perhaps, its coming will not even be noticed by smart society. If it had not been for the Mardi Gras ball "to close the winter's gayeties" Lent's arrival would scarcely have been noticed this year. Its presence was soon forgotten; but on Easter Sunday those who had purchased the inevitable spring bonnet recalled the fact that the day was propitious for exhibition purposes. And, by the way, the circumstance suggests that the church parade would be a good thing for the churches of San Francisco. There is no doubt that the Fifth avenue parade in New York every Sunday forenoon stimulates religious fervor on the Sabbath in that city. It is a pretty custom, that of parading the broad avenue after church, and it is one of the great attactions of the metropolis. It is the day for the frock coat and silk hat—every man's long suit—and it is the day on which women wear their prettiest street gowns. I should like to see such a parade as that of last Sunday on Van Ness avenue become a permanent institution.

Tempest in an Alameda Dancing School

There is a new dancing school in Alameda and they refuse to admit Jewish children to the classes. It seems rather late in the day for such intolerance, but Alameda is greatly excited in a teapot tempest way over the matter. Some of the smartest people in Alameda society attend the synagogue and of course they see no reason why their offspring should be discriminated against in a dancing school. It is this same absurd out-of-date intolerance that caused the management of the Hotel Rowardennan to exclude Jews from that hostelry a year or so ago, and that aroused much comment in the papers.

The Persistent Blackball

The Pacific-Union Club is experiencing a reign of terror. The black-baller is rampant, and he is "pilling" his victims in a manner that is causing much uneasiness among those that have the interests of the club at heart. Within a recent period two men of unquestioned honor and of exceptionally high social standing have been pilled at the Pacific-Union, and their fate has struck terror to the hearts of many that contemplated application for membership. One of the gentlemen is a member of some of the most exclusive clubs in the United States, and there was absolutely no objection that could have been urged against him. And a circumstance that reflects serious discredit on the club by reason of his blackballing is that every one of the eleven members of the Election Board had promised to vote for him. It requires three blackballs to reject an applicant, and there were three in the box when the vote was inspected.

The Supposed Ringleader

The persistent blackballing has threatened to disintegrate the club, for some of the most prominent members have been talking about resigning. President Byrne, I have been told feels very much chagrined over recent happenings. Just at this time harmony is most desirable. The club is preparing to erect a home of its own, and those interested in its welfare are anxious to increase the membership, but with rumors in circulation about indiscriminate blackballing men are reluctant to be led to the slaughter. Fortunately, the annual election is close at hand and the probability is that certain members of the Election Board will be retired. One man is suspected of being the ring-leader. He is one of the oldest and most active members of the club. He once occupied a salaried position in the club and the club is his home. If he be ousted from the new Election Board the two gentlemen to whom I referred will probably be proposed for membership again. They have many friends in the club whose indignation is at a white heat.

Widespread Discussion

It is seldom that the affairs of the Pacific-Union Club become the subject of public gossip. Such incidents as the blackballing of applicants for membership are most religiously kept from the ear of the outer world, but the persistent pilling of late precipitated a scandal which has become the subject of discussion among the clubmen of the city. The situation has become positively critical, and if it were not for the approach of the annual election there would surely be many resignations. The action of the blackballers is regarded as purely malicious and has been denounced as most cowardly particularly in the case of the gentleman for whom eleven members agreed to vote.

On Easter Morn

New gown and old hat, or old gown and new hat seemed to be the order of costuming last Sunday. Few even of the most modish wore entire new suits. It was like the "something old, something new" of the brides. Mollie Thomas McMullin and Daisy Van Ness wore gowns alike save for the trimmings. They have had them some time, those black velveteens polka-dotted with white, and they are immensely becoming. Mrs. McMullin wore a white chiffon hat, relieved by a bit of black velvet. She is the prettiest young matron in society and not even the dash of the Hopkins-Taylors is so alluring as Mrs. McMullin's quiet manner.

Argument Against Marriage

The "old guard" are saying they are better off unmarried. They base their assertion on Mrs. Walter Dean's case. Emilie Hager was the picture of health before her marriage. Since then she has scarcely known what it is to feel well. First, her husband's illness required her constant attendance at his bedside, and she never seemed so strong after that confinement. Then came the stork's visit and the mother's life hung by a thread after that for some weeks. She has never fully recovered from that illness.

Inherits Her Father's Spirit

One of the most industrious workers for the success of the sailors' entertainment on Thursday night was Ardella Mills. Miss Mills is a second edition in energy of her father, W. H. Mills, and she also takes from him her executive ability. She can plan and, what is better, carry out her plans with wonderful success. Miss Mills is not a beautiful girl, but she has a pleasing face and her manner is unaffectedly cordial. She was a pupil at a public school and believes in carrying the democratic principle into society. Nobody could ever call her a snob, but there are a few snobs in her set.

What will He do Next?

Since Parker Whitney appeared in feminine attire at the Spreckels' bal masque some of his friends look upon him as another Harry Lehr. They are waiting for a "next" from him that will eclipse the other startling episode, but as yet nothing has occurred to dim the brilliancy of the female impersonation. Young Whitney is said to be much epris with a society girl about four times his size.

Champion Match Maker

Once upon a time Mrs. W. J. Younger—the stout dentist's second wife—held the banner as champion match-maker of the city of San Francisco. Mrs. Younger made splendid matches for her stepdaughters, and long since, with only one left unmarried and that one from choice, she retired on her laurels. Now comes a rival champion in Mrs. Monroe Salisbury, who has launched so many on the sea of society, losing neither prestige nor money by her chaperonage. Mrs. Salisbury may worthily smile at her image in the mirror when she cons over her victories, particularly the ones that gained husbands for her daughters. Margaret Salisbury, whose engagement to Danforth Boardman was announced this week, has the same good luck that befell her sister, who married young Alexander Keyes. Neither had a bit of a dowry and neither was beautiful beyond the common standard. Nice, ladylike, pretty and good girls both, and that was all. But one married young Keyes with his good fortune and better expectations, and the other is engaged to a society bachelor of like eligibility.

Better than Waffle Flipping

Mrs. Keyes' tea for her sister, Miss Salisbury, was the official medium for announcing the engagement that has long been discussed over the tea-cups. It is said Mrs. Salisbury is very much pleased with the prospect of Danforth Boardman as a son-in-law. Apropos of their marriage people are remembering that it was at a tea given by Mrs. Boardman that Mrs. Salisbury first announced her intention of going to Nome. No amount of urging could wheedle her mission from Mrs. Salisbury, but she whetted curiosity by announcing that she herself would do the work, while all her "daughter" had to do was stand around, look pretty, and ring a bell. Probably if Margaret had gone along and held up her end Papa Salisbury's waffles would not have fallen so flat. However, a Salisbury-Boardman alliance is better than flipping waffles hot from the griddle for hungry miners.

Now that Mrs. Salisbury has married off both her daughters so well, she may turn her matrimonial powers on some of her nieces. There are several of them in the clan who might not be averse to mingling blue blood with yellow gold. Heretofore Mrs. Salisbury has conserved her energy for her own daughters, but now she may take the rest of the connections closer under her wing. When the two Scott girls lived in the California-street boarding-house with the Salisburys they appeared to be kept in the background. When Mary Scott married a lawyer and went to San Jose to live, it was thought that she had silvered her cloud at last, but financial disasters tripped on her heels the moment they left the altar. When things grew too leaden, she decided to go on the stage, and resuming her maiden name, was exploited by Frawley a couple of years ago. It is said that her husband exhausted his vanishing means for her theatrical debut. I believe she is now in the East.

Shocked by Their Host

The latest unique occurrence at the Bohemian Club has provoked no end of comment. There was a dinner at the club the other night, at which a young man of enormously wealthy connections presided. At its close the host proposed that they all shake dice to determine who should pay for the meal. Some of the "Dear Harries" of the club are very much vexed over the occurrence. They have denounced the conduct of the host as outrageous and have even pronounced him a cad. But there is another side to the story. It is that the young man did not know he was regarded as the host. His friends say that the dinner was an informal affair, and that it had been suggested by the young man at the dinner hour that it was time to eat, but that being a stranger here he did not know that some of the members of the party expected him to pay for their food. It appears that there are clubmen who are ever on the alert to be treated as guests when in the company of a millionaire. But it is unfortunate that such a matter as the club dinner should be discussed so freely beyond the portals of the club. The more I hear of club gossip the stronger grows the conviction that the clubs of San Francisco are fast becoming the exclusive rendezvous of bounders.

She's a Heart Breaker

Mrs. Bessie Blitz-Paxton is in New York studying music under Edouard de Reszke, the great basso. I have heard that he has fallen in love with her voice. Mrs. Paxton has had many people fall in love with herself. I have heard that she was engaged to Colonel Fred Crocker at the time of his death, and that she had the romantic experience of receiving an offer of marriage from the ebullient General Antonio Ezeta, ex-President of San Salvador. He fell in love with her voice and proposed through an interpreter.

Debut of an Heiress

A new beauty and heiress has been put upon the market in Honolulu, writes a correspondent. She is Alice Campbell, sister of Princess David Kawananakoa and daughter of Mrs. Samuel Parker. She made her debut several days ago, in a new Parisian gown at the Moana hotel. After the champagne was uncorked, Sam Parker made a speech and all but announced the engagement of the debutante. He would have revealed the name of the happy man had he not been squelched by his wife. Since Sam's marriage he and Prince David have been going a merry pace in Honolulu. The Parkers have moved into their magnificent Emma street mansion.

When Mills Entertained a Duke

If any one thing could more than another emphasize how the possession of great wealth for years will improve the tastes and ideas of our rich parvenues, it would be the little incident in the life of a present multimillionaire which occurred on the occasion of the visit paid our coast by the Duke of Manchester many years ago. The Duke who was the grandfather of the present holder of the title was, with his son, Viscount Mandeville, touring the State for the benefit of the latter's health and naturally was extensively entertained by our rich bankers and capitalists generally, among them being D. O. Mills and M. S. Latham.

Feared He'd Soil the Furniture

Mr. Mills had furnished his country house at Millbrae regardless of cost, even the bedroom chairs being of gilt and sky-blue satin. His Grace of Manchester was the guest of Mr. Mills while en route to banker Latham's Menlo Park villa and was shown his apartment for the night amid all the glitter and glare of such splendid upholstering. Next morning when asked by his host how he had enjoyed his slumber, he replied, "To tell you the truth, my dear fellow, your furniture was so awfully fine I had no end of a time finding a spot whereon to put my old clothes, as I actually feared to soil the satin of your chairs by doing so." Club men and others who met his Grace will not be astonished at his fearing to spoil nice furniture with his dirty garments, as the clothes he wore during his stay here were ancient and slovenly in the extreme. He appeared at the opera one evening in a ladies' box, clad in a travel-stained suit and a gray flannel shirt.

A Record Beater in Fresno

A Fresno woman can claim the championship for speedy work in the matrimonial arena. Margaret Moore is one of the handsomest young women in the raisin city. She is about thirty years of age and the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. J. C. Moore. Her first husband, Louis Augustine, died in March of last year. He was of an excellent family, Portugese descent, and was interpreter at the court of Fresno. Two months after his death Mrs. Augustine married George Gay but their married life was short as in December the Reaper called him. The widow Gay has just married Jacob Martin, and as this makes her third husband within the year I do not think any San Francisco hymeneal record can beat that. Mrs. Moore-Augustine-Gay-Martin has one child, a little girl of three.

A Mother's Fears

It is whispered that one of the sons of a wealthy woman who has not long been a widow is causing his mother a great deal of anxiety owing to his attentions to a dashing young woman who is not in the same exclusive set. He has been paying his devoirs in that quarter for so many months that the mother is fearful the matrimonial bee may roost in his bonnet. The young man has a bungalow at Monterey and spends much of his time there with his charmer peopling the perspective. Several months ago Mamma became so alarmed that she hit upon the plan of lassooing her boy and casting him within the spell of a society girl to whom he was once devoted. At that time his father was still alive, and having married money himself, was keen for daughter-in-laws with plump dots. This young lady could not toe his financial mark, but the affair languished without any parental extinguishers and died a natural death. When the fond mother feared that her boy was burning his fingers elsewhere she began to stir the ashes of the old affection to see whether a spark of love could be kindled. Not meeting with any encouragement from her son she went to the girl herself and asked her to try her winning ways on her son. The girl frankly asked her whether she expected her to marry him if she succeeded and the mother said that "she didn't like to see her boys marry but if there was no other way she would have to be content." The good lady was probably too rattled to realize that this was not very encouraging but as the girl was then secretly engaged to a New Yorker and is now in the East with the wedding day calendared for the near future, she took it good-naturedly—and it made a rare story to entertain her intimates.

A Hospital Story

Last month the wife of a young professor died, leaving four children, the eldest of them a little girl of six. This little girl wanted to send her mother a valentine and every day during the three weeks that the latter was away at the hospital the child would ask if St. Valentine's day had arrived yet. Finally, the time came and she sent the valentine, but the mother was dead when the missive reached the hospital. They put the valentine in her coffin.

A Romantic Marriage

The widow of a prominent German resident was the heroine of a romantic marriage celebrated recently. She was over seventy years of age and by no means attractive, but she married a man of wealth, a farmer in one of the northern countries. It appears that this man loved her when she was a girl and when she married another it was a heart blow to him. He never loved another and when he heard that his first love was a widow he made haste to press his suit. And though she had passed the three score and ten period she accepted him and joined her heart and wealth with his.

When Etta met DeKoven

Reginald De Koven, the composer, is one of those educated gentlemen for whom Mrs. Astor has a high regard. In his case, however, a college education failed to tone down certain snobbish traits. But Etta Butler, the vaudeville star, gave him a lesson in politeness the other day which it is to be hoped he was able to appreciate. Etta Butler is a San Francisco girl, who believes that a successful actress is the peer of any writer of catchy music. The story of her meeting with De Koven was told me by a Californian now sojourning in New York. It took place in the office of Ben Teal, the theatrical manager. Mr. Teal introduced them. Mr. De Koven had his hat on and a cigarette in his mouth. He removed neither the hat nor the cigarette, but bowed and proffered his hand with an air of condescension. Miss Butler overlooked the hand, turned to Mr. Teal, and said, in a somewhat indifferent tone, "I wonder why it is, Mr. Teal, that whenever an actress meets a man in a theatrical manager's office he usually has a hat on and a cigarette or a cigar in his mouth." And paying no further attention to De Koven she proceeded to discuss a business matter with the manager.

Two Oaklanders have an Adventure

Two of Oakland's inner circle, sisters, who are too far gone in years to be dubbed even by courtesy bachelor maids, closed up their big house in Eighth street some time ago and went abroad. They have slathers of money, but are too fast bound to convention to get much enjoyment out of it. They are in Italy now and one of their friends who met them in Rome writes me that they had an odd adventure there recently. They were going through the streets when a band of jolly maskers, who were taking part in a carnival and "making Rome howl," saw the two staid maiden ladies. In a spirit of fun two of the most dashing of the merrymakers stepped forward, doffed their plumed hats and each took a lady by the arm. Along the street and into the midst of the rollicking carnival crowd they hurried them, showering confetti on their heads and singing burning Italian love songs into their unwilling ears. After a few minutes the jokers lifted their plumed hats once more and disappeared, while the two maiden ladies fled, terror stricken, to the safety of their hotel.

Johnny Lawson said Good-Bye

The last person to say good-bye to the Wells-Oge party was John Lawson, the polo player and Blingum swell. It is not often that Johnny Lawson honors any but heiresses with his distinguished attentions, for he is a member of that great firm, Balfour, Guthrie & Co., and down at Blingum they look upon that firm with the same degree of respect with which a cockney regards the House of Lords. They think every British merchant is a nobleman in disguise. And the average British merchant is amused at their adulation because he knows that at home he is only one of a numerous middle class. Mrs. Henry Scott is one of those that have great admiration for the blood of the British middle class. Johnny Lawson was devoted to Mary Scott for a time, but when little Mary Crocker put on long skirts she received his attentions. Miss Oge is now on his list, and she is a dowerless girl. Perhaps she should feel complimented.

Mrs. Urquhart Lee was instructing one of her classes in parliamentary law the other day. They were holding a dummy meeting and a well known club woman was presiding. After calling the meeting to order she turned to the secretary and said. "The secretary will please read the seconds of the last meeting."

A McAllister Selling Wine

There appears to be a strong affinity between blue blood and wine. Harry Lehr was a wine agent when he was a leader of New York society, and now "Judge" Ward McAllister, son of the organizer of the 400, is engaged in the same business. "Wardie" has succeeded to the job held for many years by Harry Veuve, who drank so much of his own wine that he is now an invalid. Harry is going the way of all good, active members of the Pacific-Union Club. To eat and drink yourself into a state of florid bloat is the proper thing at the Pacific-Union. That was what Fred Crocker and Russell Wilson did, and the former is now one of the gods of the club. The members always bow reverently when passing Fred Crocker's image in the club. He was their ideal gentleman, for he had contempt for his liver. When he died Horace Platt wrote a touching eulogy of him in which he told of deceased's pure life.

The War of the Artists

Art is long and time is fleeting. San Francisco, the Paris of America, repeats what her older and more beautiful sister did years ago. We are to have a second clique of painters and sculptors, showing their wares separately from those of the time-honored group who have made the exhibition at the Hopkins' an annual treat. They will hang their work this month in Sherman & Clay hall and challenge the criticism of their more staid and stouter brothers to the brush and tool. In Paris only a few years ago they divided as here, and formed the New Salon. To it went the majority of the artists who had not lived out honest ambition and ability, and they made it a most brilliant gathering. They had long suffered from the petty jealousies, the favoritism and mercenary spirit of the old school, and they rejoiced in the freedom and fairness of the new. Alexander Harrison and John Sargent—two of America's greatest representatives in the old world—chose the New Salon. Here the insurgents of the brush hope to accomplish much good, too. They purpose helping the seekers after the true and beautiful who have been crushed under the heel of the despots of the big house on the hill. They say that they will rid the younger and broadening generation of painters of the Matthews' incubus. It is curious how long they groaned under the Blind Boss, how many insults they took and sweated under, and it is a marvel that some of those who have trod the weary path to the Real have not fled to the flesh pots under the merciless and unfair goads of the dictator of the Art Institute.

An Autocratic Dictator

According to the gossip in art circles, Matthews is at the bottom of all the squabbles among the art folk. He is always at sword's points with those at the Hopkins' who have any independence of soul. Once Joullin taught there. Matthews harassed him so he rushed away and registered an oath before the Bohemian owl never to send a canvas to the hill again. John Stanton and Matthews hate each other cordially. Matthews loves to takes a smash at Stanton's work in the presence of the pupils who look to Stanton for guidance. All must bow before the boss. They call him blind because he sees no imperfection in anything he does himself. But he is hypercritical of the work of others. That is one of the idiosyncrasies of genius. But there have been women at the school who have been shocked by hs peculiar badinage and who retired in consequence. He once said to a woman of culture who paints well, "You paint like a sausage." Another he commanded to arrange her palette after his fashion, as though the mere detail of paint on the board had aught to do with art. Be his slave, his flatterer and sycophant, say the insurgents, and one may be sure of advancement and having one's pictures prominent in the annual exhibitions. It is Matthews who manages the juries who sit on the offerings of the artists.

Objected to the Framing

Not alone the Hopkins' has stifled or tried to stifle the real in art by the absurdities of faddism and the laughable littleness of dilletantism. Not long ago the Sorosis—the fashionable club of women with a large admixture of tabbies and poseuses—had an exhibition. Among those invited to send pictures was Miss Marion Drewe, an Australian artist of much talent and experience. Not long a resident of San Francisco, but with a deal of note in Sydney and London, she welcomed the invitation and dispatched two of her best canvases. She got them back with the following letter:

N. W. Corner
Page and Laguna Streets.

Dear Miss Drewe:

The pictures you sent to the Sorosis were not the ones you promised me, and it was found impossible to properly adjust them on account of the framing.

Yours sincerely,

Elizabeth Tallant Brice.

Miss Drewe's Reply

Miss Drewe was chilled but urged to smiles by the ridiculousness of the plea. What have frames to do with pictures? In Paris some of the best pictures hang in the salon in bare wooden bindings, guiltless of paint or gilding. The great masters seldom frame their work pretentiously. They leave that to the buyers and the clan who look for gorgeousness and not art. Miss Drewe penned the following in reply to the Sorosister:

Dear Mrs. Brice:

Replying to your letter of Sunday, if my memory serves me right, my work at the time you called at my studio, was all at Sacramento, consequently I could not have promised you any particular two pictures. The sea scape passed the "National Gallery of New South Wales" and was hung on the line at the "Grafton Galleries," London, in almost an identical frame. The picture of blossoms was accepted and hung at the Society of Artists, Sydney.

I am sorry that after being asked by the Sorosis Club to let them have two of my pictures that they were unable to hang them. Yours sincerely. Marion Drewe

The pictures refused by the Sorosis passed in the same frames the council of the Society of Artists of New South Wales and then the directors of the National Gallery. Four pictures by Miss Drewe were hung on the line in this widely-known exhibition. But her frames did not suit the finnikiness of Sorosis.

Why Matthews Rejected a Picture

When Miss Drewe's pictures went before the jury at the Hopkins' for the present exhibition there, a marine was voted against which had hung in the Grafton Galleries in London. Matthews was told it had been admitted there, and demanded proof. Asked why he blackballed it, the Blind Boss said:

"Oh, she has two pictures in anyway."

The intelligent hanging committee at the Hopkins' took Miss Drewe's picture which had been accepted and skied it—put it up where the cobwebs collect in a corner while mediocre ones by favorites were given preference. A leading London paper said of this picture: "Miss Marian Drewe's 'Wet Evening' is careful, intelligent and very true. What she has done is ably and truly done—the wet road, the grays of stone, pathway and sky, the artificial lights just perceptible in the scarcely darkened day are well valued." But Miss Drewe had no pull. There are a dozen good artists who had as lief hang their precious canvases in the Spreckels' market as send them to be judged and probably hidden away by Matthews and his potgang at the Hopkins'. That is why we have a new salon here, and it is why we need one.

"She's fortunate in having a husband easy to please."
"I always thought him hard to please."
"You forget that he married her."

Osteopaths are Coming

The vogue of osteopathy is become more pronounced every day, and its devotees now include some of the most prominent and cultured people in the country. The State Association of Osteopaths is to meet here in August, and there will be fully three hundred exponents of the science in attendance. The San Francisco Osteopathic Association met at the California College of Osteopathy Wednesday night last, and elected Dr. A. C. Moore, of 204 Sutter street, President, Dr. A. G. Madden, Vice-President, and Dr. C. S. Richards, Secretary and Treasurer.

All Fools Jinks at the Press Club

The Press Club is doing something in the jinks line these days. A few months ago the club gave a ladies' jinks that was sired by Captain Barnes and on Tuesday night another was given with Judge Hebbard in the chair. The piece de resistance of the program was supplied by the Hawaiian sextet, which sang and played on the native instruments. Little Kathleen Parlowe played the violin, Homer Lind came over from the Orpheum and sang one of the beautiful "Gringoire" songs, Nathan Landsberger played, Arthur Cunningham sang one fine song and had to sing again as did also George McBride, Mrs. Wilbur G. Zeigler recited, Mrs. Jack Wilson sang and there were other things by professional and amateur talent. It was a very charming bohemian gathering with a representative audience of newspaper men, artists, musicians, lawyers and merchants, with their wives and daughters, cousins and aunts.

McNab's Ambition

The new officials of the street railroads company have solemnly declared that they have no intention of supporting a political bureau. And the politicians about town are speculating on the length of time it will take for the new officials to reconsider the matter. Railroading and politics are very much akin these days in all the large cities of the country. A political campaign is as essential to the success of a railroad enterprise as a general superintendent. It is already being whispered that that astute politician, Gavin McNab, is after the job of political manager. I have noticed that he has been spending a deal of time in the company of some of the new officials. He has entertained them at dinner and has brought them into cheek-by-jowl contact with representatives of the judiciary. Gavin would be better than a raw hand at manipulating affairs in the interest of a railroad company for he has friends at court, not to mention the city's executive body.

Their Political Program

And Gavin, by the way, could kill two birds with one stone if he were at the head of the street railroad's political bureau. Such a bureau would give him great prestige and strength as a political boss, and just now he is in need of both. He is anxious to control the next State Convention and with a big railroad corporation behind him he would have considerable influence. The Democratic politicians are no longer despondent. With Gage as the State candidate for Governor, and his party divided and quartered, and some of its most influential representatives eager to knife him, the Democrats have been decidedly cheerful and hopeful. The so-called reform element dominated by McNab has already agreed on the details of the campaign. J. C. Sims, the ex-chairman of the State Central Committee, has started out to secure delegates from the interior, while McNab has decided to devote his attention to those from San Francisco and neighboring towns. It is agreed between them that if Sims secure more than McNab he shall be nominated for Governor, but that if McNab shall make the better showing he shall have the privilege of designating the nominee. It is understood that he is for Franklin K. Lane but that he may switch to Barney Murphy, who was elected President of the Monticello Club the other night, an honor of little worth since it was once enjoyed by job-chaser Jim Booth.

His Name was Perkins

Senator Perkins is working tooth and nail to have Colonel Chamberlain's report suppressed and his friend, General Long, saved. The Perkins' and Requas are old friends. Hence the Senator's interest. I heard a story the other day which was suggested by the Senator's habitual practice of taking both sides of the fence simultaneously. A friend of Perkins was on a Pullman dining car one day and he asked the colored waiter what kind of soup he had.

"Consomme and oyster, sah," was the answer.

"Which is the better?"

"Both are good, sah."

"What fish have you?"

"Salmon and smelts, sah."

"Which do you recommend?"

"Both are good, sah."

"Good heavens, is your name Perkins?"

The waiter confessed that it was his name, and he appeared greatly surprised that the man should have guessed it.

They Shy at a Dentist

The announcement of the engagement of Sophie Pierce and Dr. Brownell did not make a great hit in the swagger set, for dentistry has not yet been permitted to take rank with the aristocratic professions. Its divorce from the barber's trade is not sufficiently remote to warrant its admission to polite society. Dr. Younger broke in but that was because he charged exorbitant prices for his mechanical work, and society felt that his skill as a financier was entitled to recognition even though it was exercised through a vulgar medium. But yet Dr. Younger was never really "it" here. So the Pierces hesitated for some time before the peril of introducing a dentist.

Dunphy's Farewell

The menu card for the farewell bachelor dinner given by Charles Dunphy at the Palace hotel just before his matrimonial plunge has fallen into my hands. Its cover was ornamented with the colored picture of a ballet dancer in the conventional decollete attire. One might infer that the picture was intended to symbolize Mr. Dunphy's abandonment of the diversions that had been most alluring to him, but I know that his preference was polo ponies. It was quite a cosmopolitan gathering at the banquet. This was the list: Adam Andrew, Colonel Burns, Frank Carolan, William Cluff, Ed. Denigan, Ed. Doudlin, Tom Driscoll, Willard Drown, W. Dryber, W. D. Duke, Robert Dunphy, W. H. Dunphy, Clarence Follis, William Gutzkow, Walter Hobart, Al. Kaufman, Judge Kerrigan, John Lawson, Robert Mean, J. J. Moore, Dan Murphy, Prince Orloff, Major Rathbone, P. Rossi, Harry Simpkins, James Sweeney, Dick Tobin, Ed. Tobin, Joe Tobin, Ollie Tobin, Lieutenant Von Winnischgratz, Clarence Waterhouse, Tom Williams, Parker Whitney, William Wolff.

Wood's Prospective Promotion

General Leonard Wood, who is spoken of for a major-generalship, was for ten years under General Miles and other famed commanders in Indian campaigns. He was a surgeon before going into the army, and is a thorough soldier and tactician. When the Rough Riders were getting ready for the Cuban warfare General—then Colonel—Wood's experience provided many valuable hints in the preparation. Though Roosevelt and Wood are such warm friends they are not at all alike in disposition. San Franciscans feel a particular interest in General Wood because of his wife who was one of the Condit-Smith girls and a niece of Mrs. Andrew McCreery.

A correspondent tells me that it was an error to give the authorship of the famous sea poem, "Tacking Ship Off Shore," which was published by request in Town Talk two weeks ago, to a seventeen-year-old girl. My correspondent contends that the author of the poem was an Episcopal clergyman of New York city. He became familiar with sea terms through visiting the hospital ships.

Another Blingum Wedding

It is not at all unlikely that the match already hinted at as among the possibilities by society at Blingum will become an accomplished fact, in which case one of the most brilliant affairs in the line of nuptials will unite two wealthy families whose business connection has already existed for years. What a charming union it will be.

Handsome Robinson Reilly

The guests at the Hotel Richelieu have been quite excited the past week by the arrival at the hostelry of two beautiful women, the lovely widow of poor Hugh Tevis and Mrs. Genevieve Goad-Martin-Reilly. The former made but a brief stay, but the latter and her husband have taken rooms for a prolonged sejour. The guests were divided in opinion as to which beauty bore away the palm, but there was no rival to the good-looking Robinson Reilly himself, who seems to have captured the fancy of our fair dames, his physique being, they declare, "simply adorable."

The Decollete

Washington society was evidently as much impressed by the decolletage of Countess Marguerite de Cassini at her recent fancy head-dress dinner, as were the guests at the Phelan dinner to the Walter Martins by Kate Clement's scant shoulder drapery. "Squire Kate" has never spent much time trying to hide her charms but this season she has outdone herself. Now that the out-of-town hegira has begun the question of showing bared shoulders in a hotel dining room is once more on the rug. The majority have decided in favor of transparent yokes and I doubt whether Del Monte will see many decollete dinner frocks. The Hopkins girls even in the days of their buddom wore low-cut dinner gowns at the hotel. Other girls took the cue, and Eastern visitors were shocked to see our maidens thus attired in public. As a matter of good form, rather than compunctions of modesty, this season will not be one of decollete gowns.

The Nuttalls and Rosenstocks

The death of Mr. Rosenstock was such a sudden blow that his family are completely prostrated. His daughter, Mrs. Nuttall, will of course go into retirement and during her period of mourning where, oh, where will society find the sauce piquante for its formal dinners? Ever since the daughter of the house of Rosenstock married into the Nuttall family, Rosenstock pere et mere have edged away from the "chosen people" and are now boxholders in the smart set. Neither the Castles nor Colonel Hecht's family ever occupied the position that the Rosenstocks enjoy. It was natural that as Mrs. Nuttall, the daughter should be received and affiliate with her husband's people, but such marriages do not always wed the entire family to society. However Mrs. Rosenstock is almost as clever and very much more beautiful than her daughter. With subtle tact and finesse she followed in the wake of Mrs. Nuttall's success, until she gradually gained the seats of the mighty. Mrs. Nuttall's specialty is repartee, not sugar-coated stings, but witty verbal sparring. She is much sought after as a dinner guest. The Nuttalls had a luncheon planned for Tuesday, the very day that Mr. Rosenstock dropped dead of heart failure.

Smoking in Society

If at Mrs. D. J. Murphy's suggestion cigarettes are served with culturine at the ladies' clubs, the good dames will only be openly confessing what many of them have long practiced under the rose. Cigarette smoking is almost as general among our society women as it is in New York. We are still too puritanical—which always spells provincial—to include My Lady Nicotine at a formal dinner party but she is a welcome guest at luncheon or afternoon tea. People have grown acclimated to a smoky atmosphere in London, Paris or St. Petersburg too long even to pretend to be shocked. Mrs. Will Crocker was almost the first society woman here to make no secret of the fact that she enjoyed a post-luncheon puff. An amusing story was given tongue by a nurse who was employed to take care of Mrs. Sperry while she was ill at her daughter's house. The nurse was a thoroughly competent person in the sick room, but she had an idea that all morals not cut on her pattern were strictly on the bias. One day she happened in the dining room after luncheon and found Mrs. Crocker and the Princess Poniatowski still at the table blowing dainty wreaths of smoke ceilingwards. The nurse was petrified with astonishment, and disdainfully shaking her starched skirts she flounced back into the sick room and almost sent Mrs. Sperry into a relapse by "serving notice" at once. When Mrs. Sperry demanded her reasons the nurse declared that she would not stay under a roof contaminated by such women as her daughters. This sounded so ominous that poor Mrs. Sperry was relieved to hear that the cloud was only tobacco smoke. Instead of denying the soft impeachment to Mrs. Grundy Mrs. Crocker ignored the affair until a razor-edged dame gave her a slash on the subject at a luncheon. Then Mrs. Crocker took the weed by the holder and boldly championed it. Since then the custom has become so general as to no longer excite commentary in the ton. As long as you know where and when to smoke it matters not how much.

Therese Likes the Weed

Perhaps of all the girls in the smart set, Therese Morgan does the best imitation of a little chimney. At a fashionable tea last season at which Therese assisted, a select coterie of guests were entertained by her dialogue with two matrons who are known as "Prunes and Prisms."

"You're not looking well today," said Madame "Prunes."

"Oh, I'm all right," answered Therese, "just a bit nervous, that's all."

"Did you ever try putting your feet in running water for ner—" began Madame Prism, but Therese punctured her advice with this daring request:

"All that I need is a puff at a cigarette to set me in tune. If you'll take my place at the punch bowl and let me slip away I'll—" If Miss Morgan wanted to shock the dames she certainly succeeded, for they still sniff the air when in her presence, eager to catch some telltale truant odor.

The Fad in London

But while society negatively approves of smoking behind its own Turkish hangings, it is doubtful whether smoking rooms will ever be introduced into our women's clubs. The average club woman is not built on the lolling, languid lines, nor would she court the peace and quiet a siesta with a cigarette invites. In London a woman's club without a smoking room would be regarded as a curiosity. But the women over there do not gulp down such large chunks of culture at a session and the smoking room is more frequented than the lecture hall. A local jokesmith once started the rumor that the staid, conventional Century Club had a "smoking den," and the daily papers hurried out reporters, but before they could sprinkle salt on the tail of the report it exploded. From the indignant denials hurled by the members of that club it is not likely that Mrs. Murphy's suggestion will ever be warmly received there.

Twenty-five Years an Editor

The dean of San Francisco editors, John P. Young of the Chronicle, rounded out on Tuesday an unbroken quarter of a century of service for that paper, most of it spent in the managing editor's chair. His record stands alone in this part of the country, so far as I know. When he joined the Chronicle staff in 1877 Mr. Young had already won a spur or two in the arduous field of his choice, having labored with distinction as city editor of the Washington Chronicle, long since defunct, and on the Washington corps of the Chicago Times in the days of the brilliant Wilbur F. Story. Charles de Young was quick to appreciate the ability of the newcomer, and sent him up to the legislative session of 1877-78, on his maiden assignment of importance. Immediately after his return Mr. Young took his present place as the chief of Mr. de Young's editorial force. The anniversary was made the occasion of some pleasant remembrances by the Chronicle people, who sent out to Mr. Young's house in the morning a handsome silver and china after-dinner coffee service and some flowers, with a letter which told him how much the men and women under his command appreciated his ability and his fairness. When he reached his office Mr. Young found it filled with cut and potted flowers and greenery. This was the tribute of Business Manager J. B. Eliot, who has been associated with Mr. Young through nearly all his long term of office. Not least among the things that made it a pleasant day for the Chronicle's chief was a cablegram from Mr. de Young, now in Rome, heartily expressive of his congratulations and good wishes.

In the European Swim

Surely Miss Helen de Young, the debutante daughter of Mr. and Mrs. M. H. de Young, was born under a lucky star. Just out of a convent, keen with an all-round education and alert with plenty of intuitive appreciation, she is making the acquaintance of the most interesting people of European life and seeing the things not vouchsafed to all travelers. For all this, she is looking forward with delight to coming home within the next few months. Side by side with accounts of the unusual happenings in her life, are those of her progress in driving four-in-hands and pictures of the fun she is going to have at San Rafael in summer, handling the ribbons that will guide the best ponies in her father's stables. To a capacity for enjoying the pleasures that come her way, Miss de Young adds the ability to write about them and her correspondents in this city count themselves in great luck. One of the best descriptions she has sent tells of the celebration of the twenty-fifth anniversary of the elevation of the Pope. For this great service, Miss de Young, with her parents, had seats that commanded the best possible view of everything that made that day memorable. She writes of a few days at Monte Carlo, where they met Mrs. John W. Mackay and Madame Melba; of being entertained in Rome by Adelina Patti and her handsome young husband; and of the ambassador's ball in St. Petersburg and the cordial attention bestowed by Minister and Mrs. Charlemagne Tower. For the Italian trip Miss de Young had the additional pleasure of the company of her sister Constance. So much of pleasant interest was happening that Mr. de Young telegraphed to the convent in Paris for the younger sister.

England's Big Show

An occasional correspondent writes me from London that perhaps we may see England's Big Show at the Orpheum for there is talk of introducing the biograph machine at the Coronation ceremonies in the Abbey. "There is to be a terrible crush here," says my correspondent, "and now the Executive Committee of Arrangements is talking of curtailing the services. The Litany is to be cut down, and not only the Communion Service but the Commandments dispensed with, while the anthems, treated as a sort of chorus, are to be edged in here and there when other business is being pushed forward. Changes of this sort, say some of the kickers, may shake not only the Church but the Constitution."

Napoleon's Show Caricature

The proposition to introduce the cinematograph at the Coronation is a good one. No previous event of the kind has ever been correctly recorded. For a long time after the splendid Coronation of the first Napoleon the only thing that conveyed any sort of an idea of the ceremony was Gillray's caricature, a work of fancy, which depicted the Emperor, the Empress and attendants as a set of guys. The charming Josephine, for instance, appeared as a dowdy woman, whose train was borne by three old hags, one of whom had a black eye. Some of the illustrations that circulated in France at the time were equally extravagant. One engraving represented the Emperor kneeling to receive the crown. In reality Pius VII sat as a mere spectator while the imperious Corsican crowned himself.

Josephine's Relatives may be There

It is more than likely, by the way, that some of the descendants of the Empress Josephine will appear at King Edward's Coronation. Her son, Eugene Beauharnais, married a Princess of Bavaria, and his sons and daughters made great matches with leading royal houses whose representatives at the present day are quite numerous. They include Prince Charles of Denmark, nephew and son-in-law of King Edward and Queen Alexander; also, Prince Max of Baden, the husband of Princess Marie Louise of Cumberland, Queen Alexandra's niece. Their ancestress, the frivolous yet fascinating Josephine, was a magnificent figure at the Coronation of Napoleon. She wore on that occasion a long-sleeved robe of white satin embroidered in gold and silver, edged round the hem with gold embroidery and fringe. The bodice was adorned with clusters of diamonds. The court train of white velvet was also embroidered with gold, and her heavy mantle was of purple velvet covered with gold bees in embossed work, with a gold bordering of laurel, olive and oak branches, and it was lined throughout and bordered with ermine. On her head was a high diadem of gold, amethysts and diamonds. She retained the whole mass, ornaments, robings and all to dine alone with the Emperor on the night of their coronation day. A few years later the crown of the divorced Josephine was worn by her successor, Marie Louise.

Tardy Justice from Uncle Sam

A three-line dispatch from Washington appeared in the daily papers the other day telling of the introduction of a bill in Congress directing the Secretary of War to compute the pay and allowances of the late General Fitz-John Porter between the years 1863 and 1886 and pay the amount to the soldier's widow and children. There was a tragedy in the few words that told the news. Who was General Fitz-John Porter? He was the Dreyfus of the American army, although he was not finished off as the unfortunate Frenchman was. Porter was dismissed from the army January 28, 1863 "and forever disqualified from holding any office of trust or profit under the Government of the United States." It was at the second battle of Bull Run that he was alleged to have disobeyed orders on the field of battle. General Pope was sorely beset by the Confederates and at 4:30 in the afternoon sent an order to Porter to attack Jackson in the flank. The order was not delivered until after dusk, too late to execute, even if Longstreet and Jackson had not been between Pope and Porter. It was a disastrous day for Pope, and it was only what Porter did that saved him from utter rout. However, Pope charged Porter with disobedience of orders, wilful and deliberate. Party feeling ran high at the time. McClellan had been relieved from the command of the Army of the Potomac; Porter was a McClellan man and the adherents of Pope claimed that the general had refused to aid Pope for the purpose of ruining him. Porter was helpless and he was cashiered. With the aid of Confederate reports of the battle he finally brought home to the mind of General Grant the injustice that had been done him, but it took twenty-three long years for him to clear his name and reinstate himself in the army. He died last year, a broken-spirited old man.

7,000 Shareholders
Now in Basket Company

Steady Growth of "The People's Trust." Over One Thousand New Subscriptions at 50 Cents per share Written During the Past Six Days.

Par Value of Shares, $1.00
Full Paid and Non-Assessable

More than one thousand new subscriptions to the capital stock of the Mergenthaler-Horton Basket Machine Company at 50 cents a share were made during the past week.

There are thousands more contemplating purchase of these shares.

To these persons and to the public and to the present shareholders the officers of the Company renew their positive declaration that no subscriptions at fifty cents a share will be accepted beyond the limits of the present allotment, and that this allotment is sufficient only to accomplish certain steps in the well defined plans of the Company's directors.

The price of the next allotment will not now be announced, but it will be a substantial increase.

It may take effect at any time without notice, although notice will be given if possible.

Nothing is more certain than that the present movement in the purchase of shares in the Mergenthaler-Horton Basket Machine Company will carry the price of these shares steadily upward, as is just and right, and distinctly to the benefit of every shareholder.

The steady growth of interest in the great business proposition which this company presents justifies the judgment of its officers, who refused the offers of syndicates and opened their lists for popular co-operation

When before has such a strong proposition ever been offered to the general public on such fair terms?

The secret of the unprecedented success of the popular subscription plan for these shares is in the inherent commercial strength of the fundamental structure of the Company, and in the universal verdict that the offering to the public was fair and equitable. The notable features of this presentment are:

NO UNDERWRITING SYNDICATE.

This presentment is based upon a proposition absolutely controlling an industry of which the present and immediate

PROFITS ARE OVER $4,000,000 A YEAR, an industry the volume of which is increasing so rapidly that in seven or eight years

IT WILL BE DOUBLED

Consider a moment what absolute control of such an industry means.

It means that the laws of supply and demand in that industry are wholly within the province of such control, regulating the prices which rule for the product of being the

PRESENT SELLING PRICE OF SHARES

FIFTY CENTS A SHARE

Par Value $1.00. FULL PAID AND NON-ASSESSABLE

Subscribers to the stock of the Mergenthaler-Horton Basket Machine Company may send or bring their subscriptions to the office of the Company, 507 Examiner Building, San Francisco. Checks, drafts and money orders should be drawn to the order of CHARLES R. BARLOW, Treasurer. No subscription accepted for less than 50 shares.

FACTS THAT COUNT

The actual yearly demand exceeds Two Billion Baskets.

Value at wholesale, Eleven Million Dollars.

The net profit on this volume of business last year was $1,387,000.

The Baskets were all made by hand

Each Mergenthaler-Horton Company machine does the work of twelve men.

The saving in labor by the use of the Mergenthaler-Horton Basket Machines amounts to more than TWO MILLION DOLLARS ANNUALLY

This gives earnings for the company of OVER THREE MILLION THREE HUNDRED THOUSAND DOLLARS, OR OVER THIRTY-THREE PER CENT ON THE ENTIRE CAPITAL ON THE PRESENT VOLUME OF BUSINESS

The machines may be seen in operation at the Robinson Basket Company's factory, Painesville, O., where over thirty are installed; at Elmira N. Y.; at the machine shops of Emmett Horton, one of the inventors, and at Sodus, N. Y., where they are also in operation.

The practical working of the machines is now shown in every office of the company.

The company will not sell or lease its machines, but will equip and own and operate basket factories all over this country.

DOUBLING THEIR MONEY

Follow the steps taken by the Mergenthaler-Horton Basket Machine Company and it will be seen that every step has been in exact accord with its announcements. Early shareholders now see their shares double in value. New subscribers will see their shares double in value, and still the limit of price for these shares will not be reached, because just as surely as the Linotype Machine pays its shareholders twenty per cent on ten millions of capital just so surely will the Automatic Basket-Making Machines, which save three times as much labor as the Linotype, earn dividends which will make the shares of the Mergenthaler-Horton Basket Machine Company sought for at prices which are beyond present computation.

Seulement, Par Hasard

Well, yes, I made a trifle out of it. Grandmamma? Oui, vraiment, why not? Then, yes—if you promise not to tell, you shall have it all. I will tell it as I know it, and the parts that I only fancy happened I will put in as if I had been there myself. Tres bien, voila!

Transport yourself to one of the most charmant menages in Paris, entourage the most magnifique, tres Americaine like the young woman who inhabited it. Georgia Briggs, tall, brunette, rich and independent, of age to do as she pleased, frank, boyish manner, generosity the most profound—but you know her.

I did not—then. Apres? Well, you will discover that for yourself later, when I've finished. In Miss Briggs' French flat, beside herself, was her maid. No chaperon? Why, certainement. The maid was the chaperon, a woman of years definitely above forty, and of virtue the most incorruptible. Never was Americaine more sought after than Miss Briggs. She went in the best society, both French and English, and could have married anybody she pleased. But she cared for no man, not in that way. "My old friend Winn is enough masculine society for me," she said, "and I'll be chained to nobody." There was never any talk of an engagement between her countryman and herself. They were good comrades, "pals," as Miss Briggs called it.

They used to drive together in the Bois, or ride when inclination pointed that way, and they read the same books and went to the theatre together. Miss Briggs was so well-known in Paris, and her independent nature so well understood, that no one said a word about her or even harbored an ill thought of her. Winn was un homme intelligent, un homme of clubs, a—what is it you call it?—good fellow. I knew him very much as Miss Briggs knew him. He called often chez moi, and he knew all the girls in the "Seminaire de Madame Psyche." Zou-Zou, Lulu, Pompon—he had their names at his tongue's end, and they all called him "Monsieur Mignon." As for anything more than the acquaintanceship—well, you must not believe all you hear.

Miss Briggs was as happy and care-free a girl as you could find in all Paris when her cousin "Tootsy" Fearon looked her up. "Tootsy" was an old pal of mine. I had known him in New York before my expatriation. With years he had become absurdly conventional, and one of the first things he said to Georgia Briggs was that she must no longer live in Paris without a chaperon.

"If I'm old enough to manage the fortune my father left me," said Georgia, "I'm old enough to know how and where I shall live."

Tootsy heaved a sigh.

"Oh, my dear, you haven't lived in the world as long as I have. You don't know what evil tongues are abroad."

"Evil tongues perdition!" returned Georgia, who always used strong language when she was excited. "Do you mean to say I can't run my flat in Paris as well as if I were at home, and that my dear old Margaret, who was my mother's maid before I was born, is not enough protection for a woman of my age? Tootsy, go and pray for your own sins. I can manage mine. I respect your great age—but, well you must let me alone."

But Tootsy Fearon never would let anything alone in which he had made up his mind to be interested. He went on to London, but he wrote several letters home in which he placed before Miss Briggs' American relatives the danger that young woman was in from wicked Parisians, but more than anything else from her own independence—and Winn.

Absurd, vraiment, but that's how it was. The next steamer brought over an avalanche of letters from New York, Chicago, Baltimore, Washington, even San Francisco and Tucson—the whole clans Briggs and Fearon with their branches said their little say to Georgia Briggs. And the burden of their letters was, "You must really not go about so much with Dicky Winn."

Georgia, at first amused when she read the Reverend Lysander Fearon's sermon disguised as a letter, was disgusted when she came to Mrs. Templeton Briggs' solemn warning to girls who persist in flying in the face of Providence and refusing to marry. Then her disgust turned to anger as she ran through the budget which ended in Grand'mere Briggs' affectionate appeal to her dear dead son's little Georgia, to come home and act like any other Briggs, get married and settle down.

Then the girl had a good cry, half drawn from wounded feeling and half anger. Then she summoned her pride to her aid, and then her good sense came to the surface. She threw the whole set of letters into the fire, put on her habit and went out for a ride with Winn.

That girl had the consciousness of virtue to uphold her. Pauvre petite! in spite of this, she could not help feeling a trifle of embarrassment when she thought of the ideas her own people had conceived about her. Sometimes she was nearly on the point of telling Winn all about it, and then laughing that heavy weight off her mind. But something withheld her from this.

Mais le finis was on the way—the hand avenging, the implacable Dame de Propriete. On to Paris swooped the grand' mere of all the Briggs' and Fearons, a lady tres grande with much strength of will and a tongue—ah, even I know what that tongue can say! It was hard on poor Georgia, a little bit cruel to pauvre Dicky Winn. They were such friends, and now they can no longer be that. Oh, these meddlers, these tabbies, these women whose virtue is so tremendous that they must have everybody else conform to their rules of morality. God knows we can't all be molded in the same fashion.

One day Dicky Winn came into Madame Psyche's seminary.

"I want Rose," he said, "I must see Rose right away."

I went to him and he burst out with a great story in which the names of Georgia, Mrs. Briggs senior, the maid, Tootsy Fearon, himself and all sorts of others were mixed up in such shape that I couldn't understand a word. Finally I comprehended that I, and I only, could save poor Georgia Briggs from an awful fate.

"You see it's that damned grand'mere," said Dicky. "She pitched into me and said I was a despicable cad and all that sort of thing, and the upshot of it was we went right up with her before our American chief, and she fetched in a reverend—and that's the whole blamed business. Georgia Briggs is Mrs. Dicky Winn and she doesn't love me nor I her. We were the best old pals that ever was, and never a word of love passed between us, I swear to you, Rose. And now, to get even with the old cat and do as near the right thing as I can, too, Rose, I want you—"

But I haven't lived among the nimble French wits for ten years for nothing. I was on to the whole little play at once. Do you not remember the Vanderbilt affair—how easily it was arranged?

Vous comprenez, it was only a ruse du theatre that on that very day I was seen driving in the Bois with Dicky Winn. We dined together and—well, he did not go home. Our little reve d'amour—fancy the horror of Madame la grand'mere!—lasted a fortnight. Mrs. Winn went home—so shocked at her husband's infidelity! A divorce—certainement. Would you not have predicted it—and me covered with diamonds bought with Georg—no, I meant Dicky Winn's money!

This little trip to the States is doing me a world of good, though it is something rather annoying to be pointed out everywhere I go as "La Femme"—the woman in the Winn divorce case.

Georgia Winn is free and lives in London. She could not bear to face the tongues of Paris, those tongues that never frightened her when she was a girl, careless and fearless and happy. Dicky Winn is in Mexico. Isn't this the worst managed universe in the world that would let the arch conspirator, the heavy villainess and the sub-villain go unpunished, while the poor heroine and hero suffer to the end. Madame la grand'mere and Tootsy Fearon were congratulating themselves the other day on their clever management of Georgia's affairs, and saying what a good thing it is that she can go anywhere now because she is a "Mrs." —The Co-Respondent.

Fannie Bloomfield Zeisler

Fannie Bloomfield Zeisler, the great pianist, who made an impression on her previous visit five years ago that no pianist who has visited this city since has succeeded in effacing, will give a series of four recitals at Metropolitan hall under the direction of Bouvier & Greenbaum. No artist that has appeared here has left more admirers than Mrs. Zeisler and demands for reservation of seats are already coming in. Since her previous visit here, Mrs. Zeisler has made a most successful European tour, and has just completed engagements with the Thomas and Fritz Scheel orchestras. The dates for her concerts in this city will be Tuesday and Thursday nights, April fifteenth and seventeenth, and Wednesday and Saturday matinees, the sixteenth and nineteenth. Complete programs can be obtained at Sherman, Clay & Co.'s, where the sale of seats opens next Thursday morning. The scale of prices will be seventy-five cents, one dollar, one dollar and a half, and two dollars.. On Friday night, April eighteenth, Mrs. Zeisler will appear at the Unitarian church, Oakland, and on the twenty-second at Stanford university.

"It was fortunate for Jonah that the whale had a cold," remarked the Youngest Member of the Bible class.

"The Bible does not tell us that the whale was so afflicted," said the Old Maid who prided herself on her familiarity with Holy Writ.

"But then," said the Youngest Member, "such is my interpretation of the story for it appears that the whale coughed Jonah up."

A Modern Optical Firm

The ideal of a twentieth century optical house is that of the Haskell & Jones Company at 243 Grant avenue. This is an excellent location and the store does not suffer in comparison with the other handsome establishments in the vicinity. The new store is beautifully fitted up, the interior fittings being of green-tinted polished wood very restful to the eye. The fitting room is well lighted and contains all the newest inventions and appliances known to the modern optician. Nothing but optical goods is carried by the firm. Both members of the firm are well known here, Mr. Haskell having for many years been a partner in Haskell and Muegge, wholesale jewelers, while Mr. Jones is known as one of the most expert opticians in this part of the world.

"They say the better your underwear the worse your morals," observed Edith.

"Then I must be a model of virtue," returned Haidee, as she showed a glimpse of forty-nine-cent petticoat and five-pairs-for-one-twenty-five hosiery.

Of Interest to Art Lovers

Two great paintings by Santos Gonzales, a Philippine artist, who for fifteen years studied in Madrid, Rome, Paris and Munich, will be placed on exhibition for the first time in this country at the Maple room of the Palace hotel, beginning next Monday and continuing for a week. The larger canvas, named "The Surrender of Manila," measures fourteen by thirty-four feet without the frame, and is a beautiful study of both the American and the Spanish soldier. The Spaniards, beaten and crestfallen, are represented marching across the Bridge of Spain toward the walled city. The characteristic palm trees, the rough road, prominent and picturesque buildings and even the dust in the atmosphere are wonderfully portrayed. The smaller picture, "Saluting the Wounded," shows Colonel James Smith raising his hat to salute a wounded man. Behind him are the glorious columns of the First California. A new frame, twenty inches wide, has just been imported from Milan for the larger picture. The Maple room will be open from ten o'clock in the morning until midnight, daily, and the price of admission will be fifty cents; children, twenty-five cents.

The Greven Operatic Society

The fifth operatic concert given by the pupils of Joseph Greven promises to be very interesting. Judging by the success of former concerts, there will be a large audience gathered in Sherman, Clay & Co. hall next Tuesday evening. The operatic selections will be sung in costume, with scenery and all accessories. These concerts are excellent as practice for Mr. Greven's pupils, as they inspire them with confidence in their ability to appear before the public. Mr. Greven has some fine voices under his training.

The Colonial quartet—Mrs. Mary Carpeneto Mead, Mrs. Elizabeth Fonda, Miss Grace Marshall and Miss Xena Roberts—sang at the musicale at the Hopkins on Thursday evening, under Henry Heyman's direction. Other vocal numbers were by Mrs. Louise Wright McClure, Miss Stella R. Schwabacher, and Miss Ruth Weston. Miss Frances Wertheimer, pianist, and Benjamin Tuttle, violinist, also contributed to the program. Mrs. Gerard Barton was the accompanist and Emil Cruells was at the organ. The final concert of the spring exhibition will be given next Thursday evening.

Hawaiian Commercial and Sugar Company

On April ninth the Hawaiian Commercial and Sugar Company will submit at the annual meeting of the company the report of the crop of 1901. The total amount of sugar produced was 26,524 tons, of which 23,724 tons were sold at an average price of $77.61 a ton. The average expense of production was $11.59 a ton. This leaves the average net price received for each ton of sugar $66.02, making the net returns for the entire company $1,566,076.57. There was a loss of weight in shipping of .888 per cent. When the report was drawn up there was 1,000 tons of sugar in the coolers at the plantation, and 1,800 tons of sugar were carried over into this year. As against last year's average price of $77.61 a ton, the present price is about $72.50. However, wages are somewhat lower, which partly offsets the shrinkage. The labor situation in Hawaii is clearing somewhat. A great many Japanese are being brought over to work on the plantations. Negros, Porto Ricans and South Sea Islanders, all of whom have been experimented with, have proved failures. Only the Asiatic seems able and willing to work in the sugar fields. While Japanese cannot be set down in Hawaii from Japan, under contract, still there are available many thousands. They demand higher wages than was paid before annexation, when Japanese were worked under contract, but wages have have been lowered considerably since the first excitement due to the abrogation of all labor contracts in Hawaii by the fact of annexation to the United States.

The Market Street Deal

Now that the holders of the Market-street Railway stock have been paid off by the United Railroads of San Francisco, the new Eastern syndicate, which bought 228.95 miles of street railway here, there will be offerings of the stock of the new company. The United Railways Investment Company owns the entire outstanding capital stock of the United Railroads of San Francisco. The capitalization of the United Railroads will be as follows:

General first mortgage 4 per cent. 25-year gold bonds	$35,275,000
Reserved for underlying liens ($14,591,000, less $4,725,000 to be discharged by operation of sinking funds under existing mortgages) and future betterments, improvements and acquisitions..	$15,275,000
To be issued in part payment for the stocks of the general companies and for $1,600,000 cash to be used for the betterments and improvements..	$20,000,000
Preferred stock, 4 per cent and not more, cumulative, preferred as to dividends and capital.....	$20,000,000
Common stock	$20,000,000

The income above 5 per cent on the common stock will be reserved and applied as a sinking fund for the payment of the bonds or for the improvement of the property.

Combined operations of the several companies for the year ended Dec. 31, 1901: Gross earnings, $5,125,883; net earnings, $2,065, 925; total net income, $2,083,155; interest on bonds, $723,200; mortgage sinking fund, $84,000; balance surplus, $1,275,955. Deduct: Interest on proposed issue of $20,000,000 4 per cent bonds, $800,000. Surplus under plan, $475,955.

Brown Brothers & Co., as "managers," are given the right to the absolute control of the bonds of the United Railroads of San Francisco until Feb. 1, 1903, and may offer said bonds at public issue or private sale at any time prior to said date, at the best price obtainable in their judgment, not to be less than 90 per cent of the face value thereof, together with accrued interest. The banking firm is to receive a commission of 1 per cent. upon the par value of said bonds that are sold, together with brokerages and other actual expenses of sale. The firm is also to have the right to retain possession of all the capital stock of the investment company until the plan of purchase is fully perfected.

Interest Payable in April

Semi-annual interest will be paid on the bonds of the following local corporations in April: Geary-street Railway 5s; Hawaiian Commercial and Sugar 5s and 5½s; Los Angeles Railway 5s; Los Angeles Lighting 5s; Los Angeles Pacific Railway 5s; Northern Railway Company of California 5s; Omnibus Cable Railway 6s; San Francisco and San Joaquin Valley Railway 5s; Sierra Railway of California 6s; Southern Pacific Railway of California, Series A, 1905, 6s; Southern Pacific Railway of California, Series B, 1905, 6s; Southern Pacific Railway of California, 1906, 6s; Southern Pacific Railway of California, 1912, 6s; Southern Pacific Branch Railway of California 6s. In addition quarterly interest will be paid in April on U. S. 4 per cent, 1907, bonds.

Local bank clearings in March were $116,296,567, against $93,111,435 for March, 1901. For the first three months of the year they amount to $310,482,711, against $263,322,258 for the same time last year. The heavy bank payments in settlement of the Market-street Railroad sale swelled the clearings last month.

The California Title Insurance Company has withdrawn its offer of $60 per share, and a dividend of 2 per cent. per annum to stockholders of the San Francisco Gas and Electric Company in an effort to secure an option upon a majority of the capital stock, as an insufficient number of shares responded to the proposition within the allotted time.

The Makaweli Sugar Company has elected the following directors for the ensuing year: S. T. Alexander, H. F. Allen, I. Strassburger, W. Gregory, W. G. Cooke and W. M. Alexander. S. T. Alexander is president, H. F. Allen, vice-president, W. M. Alexander, treasurer and George M. Rolph, secretary. The Makaweli Company is interested in the Hawaiian Sugar Company, which is credited with making 13,056 tons of sugar last year. The net earnings amounted to $284,651.21, and on December 31st, 1901, there was a total surplus of $102,521.64. Dividends were expected to be resumed by this time but the low prices prevailing for sugar and the high cost of production in the Islands have caused the directors of the Makaweli to request the directors of the Hawaiian Company not to resume dividends until a large surplus has accumulated.

A Dull Oil Market

The flurry in the Oil Exchange which was apparent last week has subsided and the market is again reported dull with more sellers than buyers. Values for almost all shares have eased off to some extent, especially those for Sterling and Sovereign which bounded up rapidly with the announcement of large contracts for Island delivery. Many shares of these stocks, however, changed hands, but sales at the easier prices were less brisk than during the flurry. Litigation has been begun before the Superior Court which involves directly and indirectly oil lands valued at $20,000,000, testing the legality of acquiring claims and pending the decision trading in certain shares, especially those of the Kern Oil Company, against which the suit is naturally directed will be naturally small. Other companies that will be affected by the suit are the Four Oil, the Elwood, The Grand Central, the Kansas City and the Aztec.

Sales on the Oil Exchange last week were 74,957 shares, valued at $33,326, the leading sales being as follows: Aztec, 1,000 shares; California Standard, 1,775; Independence, 8,000; Junction, 1,000; Petroleum Center, 13,800; Lion, 5,050; Monarch, 6,350; Monte Cristo, 1,700; Oil City, 1,600; Sovereign, 8,950; Reed, 1,200; Occidental, 2,665; Sterling, 14,550.

Gossip on Change

Bonds have been the attractive feature on the Stock and Bond Exchange during the past week and transactions have been of good value at sustained prices. Numerous railway bonds have changed hands at good rates and several large lots of Sacramento Electric, Gas & Railway bonds were placed. The latter bonds ruled strong with $98 bid but holders stood firm for $98.75. In general securities business was quite active and prices generally ruled steady. Spring Valley Water Company shares were in good light with buyers and there was some little inclination to speculate. Several large sales were consummated and the stocks ruled firm at about $92.75. The official announcement that dividends would again be paid beginning with this month have made the shares quite desirable. No further news relative to the threatened friction with the fishermen in the North has again brought the shares of the Alaska Packers' Association into favor and quite a few transactions were recorded at from $160 and $161. Sugar stocks continued quiet and values varied but little. Early in the week Hutchison developed some little strength and sold at $12. San Francisco Gas and Electric was quite weak, declining from $43 to $42, but subsequently recovering to $42.75. The weakness was attributed to the action of the California Title Insurance and Trust Company in declaring off the deal suggested in its circular issued some time ago. It will be remembered that on behalf of certain parties the Company asked shareholders to deposit their stock with the Bank of California, receiving therefor $60 per share, with dividends at the rate of 2 per cent per annum, until the deal was closed, providing sufficient stock was subscribed. As less than 1000 shares were deposited the deal was declared off. Market-street Railway stocks were strong at $100 bid, but there were no offers to sell. Prospects for a good fruit yield and an excellent market for canned stock has strengthened the shares of the California Fruit Canners and prices were somewhat higher at $102.

On Tuesday semi-annual interest amounting to $1,517,600 was payable on bonds of railroad corporations listed on the Stock and Bond Exchange, including $906,525 by the Southern Pacific Railway of California; $118,775 by the Northern Railway of California; $150,000 by the San Francisco and San Joaquin Valley Railway; $105,990 by the Southern Pacific Branch Railway of California, and $93,925 by the Los Angeles Railway. On April 12th the Sierra Railway Company of California will pay interest amounting to $19,260 on its bonds.

The unofficial statement of the Oceanic Steamship company for the period from February 18th to March 18th shows disbursements amounting to $128,472.28, of which $12,141.39 is on account of cost of the steamers Sierra and Sonoma, and $104,861.08 on account of repairs to the steamer Mariposa. The total amount now due J. D. Spreckels Bros. & Co. by the company is $815,936.22, but from this may be deducted $109,626.95 for amounts due on mail contracts, coal on hand, etc., leaving a net overdraft, amounting to $706,299.27. —The Financier

Nothing more refined or charming could possibly be imagined in vaudeville than Homer Lind's little musical sketch "Gringoire" at the Orpheum this week. It is such a dainty arrangement of song and story as Lotta gave us upon her last appearance at the Baldwin. Julian Edwards has written some very effective music for "Gringoire" but it is Mr. Lind's delicate interpretation of the songs that wins attention. His voice is a baritone of admirable quality and well trained.

Tied Her Notes with Blue

The society girl who used to occupy her time sending mash notes to E. J. Morgan has not been in evidence this season. But her infatuation was a real one in its day. She addressed the actor as "King Haughty" and always rolled her notes as if they were a sweet girl graduate's essay. Then she tied a blue ribbon around them. But all the art was wasted on the actor. He never opened the notes but would toss them over to his wife. Morgan is very much in love with his present helpmate and she with him. His trouble with his late wife was about alimony, an old question revived for the divorce was a matter of a good many yesterdays.

Who Mrs. Morgan Is

Gretchen Lyons has been Mrs. Morgan for a long time. Those who fancied there was anything more than a stage friendship between the chic Gretchen and Ernest Hastings, when the two were members of the Alcazar company, erred in their surmises. Last summer, when Morgan was with the Frawleys at the Grand, he and his wife had apartments in Powell street near Geary and those who visited them then called them the turtle doves, they were so happy. Gretchen Lyons' other matrimonial affair was not so congenial. Lucius Henderson was her former husband. Gretchen is playing the leading woman part in "Soldiers of Fortune" at the New Savoy in New York. She is said to be the embodiment of Richard Harding Davis' charming Hope. Bob Edeson is the leading man in the company. Miss Lyons expects to go to London for her vacation but unless her "Darling Jack," as she calls Mr. Morgan, goes, she will forego her desire. Her father is a noted English actor and a friend of Sir Henry Irving.

An Opportunity Lost

If the management of "The Christian" had but known it, instead of putting on a very inadequate understudy as Glory Quayle during Miss Leslie's illness, the stage manager would have looked up a local star to play the part. He would not have to look far, either. There is a young matron in this city who once had an ambition to shine on the stage. Her husband did not like the idea but he humored her desire as far as to go to New York with her, and during the several months of their residence there she studied in a famous dramatic school. She took physical culture, fencing, expression, dancing—everything indeed to fit her for her intended career. And among the parts she studied was Glory Quayle in "The Christian." The young matron did not fulfill her ambition. It was about the time that the stork was out paying visits and since then she has been occupied with domestic and parental cares. But what a chance was lost in her not knowing the part of Glory Quayle was to let for a limited period. She is as pretty as Elsie Leslie, clever and well up in her art, and it would have been an admirable if brief chance to show what she could really do.

Eleanor Haber is studying at the Stanhope dramatic school in New York with view to a stage career. Miss Haber's recital here before her departure for the East is remembered as a most scholarly and interesting exposition of her talents.

Joseph Kilgour's wife having sued him for a divorce there is a chance for some other well dowered young woman to win the handsome actor's heart and hand. Kilgour was the pet of the women during his Alcazar engagement and there was much weeping and wailing when he went away. His wife was a Chicago heiress and Kilgour himself was a society clubman before he became an actor.

Mabelle Gilman is as much a matinee idol as Henry Miller or Faversham. The giddy young girls go wild over her. A correspondent writes me from New York that she rode down in a car the other day with a bunch of girls who had just been to see "The Hall of Fame." They fairly raved over Mabelle Gilman and one of them ended up with, "Well, she's a mighty sweet thing and has such grand eyes!"

I wonder if Mortimer Snow of the Aubrey stock company in New Orleans is the same Mortimer Snow who used to act in San Francisco? Snow of New Orleans has just married Adelaide Warren, the Inez of Viola Allen's production of "In the Palace of the King." Mortimer Snow who used to act at the old Grove street theatre and later at the Alhambra married Mollie Stockmeyer of the Tivoli chorus, after she divorced young Turner. The Turner marriage was a romantic one, an elopement, but after Hymen made his innings Cupid got lost somewhere.

Mrs. Ward's "Eleanor" has been dramatized, or is just about to undergo the operation. Anthony Hope's "Pilkerton Peerage," somewhat after the style of the "Dolly Dialogues," is said to have been a success on its first presentation.

In the Easter number of the St. Louis Mirror appears a pretty story by Hobart Bosworth, entitled "Cuchillo de la Muerte." Mr. Bosworth is a son of William Bosworth, the organist of this city, and is an actor who has achieved pronounced success in Eastern companies.

A Change of Management

The Hotel Mateo at San Mateo changed hands on the first of the month, Messrs. Wrenn and Spaulding being the new lessees. Mr. Wrenn, who is so well known through his position of cashier of the California hotel, has had years of experience in the hotel business, and this insures success in his new undertaking. Many alterations are being contemplated, including an entire change of domestic service. The grounds are to be beautified in many ways. It is said the management intends to have the dining-room surpass that of any hotel on the coast as regards menu, service and table appointments. The club-house has a fine bar and adjuncts in the way of shuffle-board, billiard and pool tables and bowling alley.

Business men and women whose lines are laid in the downtown district are glad to avail themselves of the convenient Puritan Dining Room at 413 Market street. The specialties of this restaurant, of which E. J. Clinton is the manager, are pure foods and ideal service.

Attractions Next Week

It is a long time since San Francisco has had such a splendid offering at the theatres as next week's bills promise. The visiting attraction will be E. S. Willard in "The Cardinal." This fine English actor has not been seen here in years, and he then presented "Judah" and "The Middleman." He is a quiet, intense actor of wonderful power and magnetism. His season here will be for three weeks. The opening play, "The Cardinal," is by Louis N. Parker, with scenes laid in Rome of 1510. The second week "The Professor's Love Story," a very charming play by Barrie, will be given. "Tom Pinch" and "David Garrick" will be given the third week. This is one of the most important engagements that the Columbia has had for a long time. The prices for Willard will be at the New York standard: two dollars, one-fifty, one, seventy-five, fifty and twenty-five cents.

Melbourne MacDowell and Florence Stone will present Sardou's "Gismonda" at the Grand next week. There are many who consider Miss Stone's portrayal of this heroine the greatest in her repertory. MacDowell's Almerio is also one of his best roles. The Sardou dramas will apparently never lose their grip on audiences here. Every night there is a big house at the Grand.

The hallmark of novelty and New York will be on "Fiddle Dee Dee" which Fischer's will introduce to us next week, the first time of a Weber & Field burlesque in San Francisco. The management of Fischer's has secured not only the sole rights for the plays, but contracted for the artists who have made them so successful in New York and throughout the country. "Fiddle" ran during the entire time of the Pan American exposition, and for two years at Weber & Field's music hall in New York. There are two travesties in it, one on "Antony and Cleopatra" and the other on the "Florodora" sextet. Maude Amber, a famous beauty and singer, Barney Bernard, the Hebrew and German character actor, and the comedians Kolb and Dill, have arrived from the East to play the principal parts. Among the new specialties are the Rosey Posey girls, the Mexican dancers, the shirt waist (girls) boys, the manicure girls, the gendarmes, Hoffman Barr's string of beauties, the wonderful acting St. Bernard dog.

A revival of the pathetic little one-act drama "Madame Butterfly," David Belasco's dramatization of John Luther Long's story, will be the feature of the Alcazar's bill next week. Juliet Crosby's exquisite characterization of the role of the poor little Japanese wife is one of the most artistic things that was ever done on a local stage. She will again have the name part. "The Great Unknown," a Daly comedy, will be the curtain raiser. It is an adaptation from the German telling of an unlettered but ambitious mother who, fancying herself a literary genius goes to Paris that she may find herself in the company of her equals. Her husband and children use drastic measures to cure her of her folly, their medicine being successful. "When the Heart was Young," the new Bryant-Day play, will be produced on the fifth of May.

Something far above the average vaudeville act is "The Yellow Dragon," the "strange adventure in one act" by George R. Deane to be presented by the Sidney Drews at the Orpheum next week. The play takes for its keynote Kipling's "An' the dawn comes up like thunder, outer China, 'crost the bay," and is filled with Oriental mysticism. Mr. Drew will have the role of a United States Secret Service agent and Mrs. Drew will be Mrs. Flood, an American woman in whose home the adventure occurs. Marie Wainwright in a new romantic comedy by Theodore Kreamer, "The Lady and the Clock," will be a star attraction. The Clipper quartet in a sketch "Uncle Eph's Dream," and James H. Cullen a novel monologuist and parodist will be novelties. Homer Lind, Fred Stuber, Papinta, Gorman and Keppler will remain over. The original English Pony ballet of eight dancers is coming.

The Tivoli's next attraction, "The Fortune Teller," was one of the successes of Alice Neilsen's starring season. The leading role of course calls for much "birdie" singing, in which Alice Neilsen excelled. It also calls for a good many changes of costume in the soprano. The contralto and baritone have good parts and there is opportunity for three comedians to distinguish themselves. It requires a large chorus. The Tivoli company should make a great deal out of it.

LETTERS

Mrs. Atherton's "Conqueror"

Advance sheets have been issued of Gertrude Atherton's "The Conqueror," and the book turns out not to be a biography of Alexander Hamilton, but a novel pure and simple. Later on, the word goes, she will fulfill her original intention and compile a biography of Hamilton. In the meantime, the novel can reap the benefit of the boom in semi-historical works, and possibly give its author a fortune. She has put quite modern thoughts and words into her characters' mouths and though these prove startling at first they need be no more so than Winston Churchill's imaginary conversations of Paul Jones, Pitt, Lincoln and others. For instance, in one chapter Mrs. Atherton makes Hamilton say he would not care to be Chief Justice, for he would "be bored to death. Can you fancy me sitting eternally and solemnly in the middle of a bench, listening to long-winded lawyers?" And later he says: "I know, and you know, that my greatest gift is statesmanship; my truest, widest knowledge is in the Department of Finance; moreover, than that nothing has so keen and enduring a fascination for me. I could no more refuse this invitation of Washington's than I could clog the wheels of my mind to inaction. It is like a magnet to steel. If I were sure of personal consequences the most disastrous, I should accept, and without hesitation. For what else was the peculiar quality of my brain given me? To what other end have I studied this great question since I was a boy of nineteen—wild as I was to fight and win the honor of the field? Was ever a man's destiny clearer, or his duty?" Mrs. Atherton's book has naturally brought Aaron Burr into prominence in connection with her hero. Burr is evidently to be the historical character of the present moment. We have already had "Blennerhassett," in which Mr. Pidgin undertook the task of trying to bring about at least a review, if not a reversal, of judgment. Mr. Pidgin will shortly publish another, a pure romance, in which he will set forth what might have been had Burr's scheme of settlement succeeded. And now Messrs. A. S. Barnes are to publish "The True Aaron Burr."

Philadelphia has a local Society of Authors, recently established, of which Dr. S. Weir Mitchell is the first president. Dr. Mitchell long ago established a reputation in his profession. His poems and novels rank well up, and now he is writing short stories, which are appearing in the monthly magazines and being widely copied in the weekly and daily papers. Dr. Mitchell is long passed three score and ten, but he writes as vigorously and in as modern a spirit as the youngest and latest recruit to literature. Some one has pointed out the similarity between him and the Autocrat, who also did all things well, and refused to grow old with years.

One of the surprises of the season for English book dealers is that religious books, which usually sell well during the Lenten season, have been dead stock. Most probably people are looking beyond and concerning themselves with coronation matters. The changes necessary in the prayers and other services since they have a king instead of a queen to defend the faith may have resulted in the purchase of so many new books of common prayer that the "religious money" has been exhausted and there was none to spare for special books of devotion.

It was only a question of time before the horseless carriage and its owners and advocates would enter the field with a periodical of their own instead of being content with an occasional column in the magazines and weekly papers. The time has come, and the New Centaur, edited by George B. Gallup and Malcolm W. Ford, made its initial bow with the March number. The table of contents consists of club notes, technical articles, society and fashion articles and matters of general interest to motorists, interspersed with poems and short stories. Such names as Robert Barr, Clinton Scollard, Will M. Clemens and Malcolm Ford will give a hint as to quality.

The Uncut Novel

Librarians of London have taken a sensible stand on the subject of uncut novels, and the patrons of the libraries are upholding them. Hereafter, no novel which is not ready to be read without the task of separating the pages will find room on the shelves. Heretofore it has been supposed that only works of permanent value such as contained information not to be dispensed with, were entitled to the privilege of making

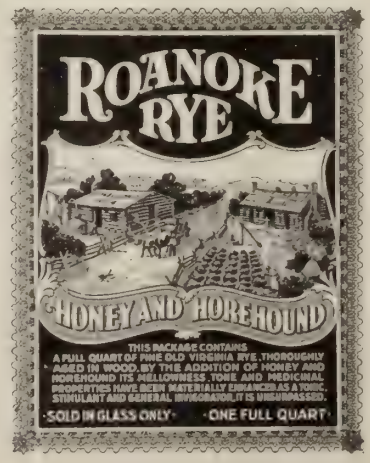
Techau Tavern...

The most artistic, best lighted and ventilated place of its kind in San Francisco. . . . . For luncheon, dinner or after theatre parties one may be sure of getting excellent service, choicest of oysters and all sort of refreshments. And while enjoying comfort and the artistic surroundings one is entertained by the strains of sweetest music, where Techau, the proprietor, is constantly in attendance to assure patrons satisfactory and prompt service as he always has done in former establishments conducted by him. . .



readers earn their right of way, but of late, the novel has usurped the privilege of the more important works, and this, in spite of the fact that too frequently the works of fiction do not pay for the trouble. There may be artistic compensations for the ragged edges of uncut books, but to the ordinary mind they are best described by a paraphrase of Mark Twain's comment on Wagner's music. They must be prettier than they look. Add to the inconvenience of cutting one's way through a book, the irritation which results when invariably some of the pages are jagged, and the invariable gathering of dust on the rough edges, there is the general effect of untidiness, and it is little to be wondered at that elderly people, accustomed to the older way of doing things, object to accepting unfinished work, as they not unjustly term the ragged volumes. It is a slight matter for publishers to trim the edges of their volumes before they are put into covers, and the only excuse for not doing so is the possibility that some purchasers may prefer to place the books in bindings of their own, in which case, as in that of magazines preserved for binding, the additional margin will add to the appearance of the book when finally finished. But the average novel of the day does not merit even a paper cover, and few, if any, will ever receive a new dress. Even if they were worthy, or likely to receive it, there is no reason why a whole edition should be turned out rough finished. As is the practice with magazine publishers, a limited number could be placed on the market with uncut edges and purchasers could choose which they preferred. The uncut book was once a distinctly English institution, and it was said that the reason therefor was that our Cousin John feared that if he bought cut books, second-hand copies, or at least, copies that had been read before would be foisted upon him. Be that as it may, there will be general rejoicing if the uncut novel is to be seen no more.

Scribblings to Friends

Apparently there is never to be an end to epistolary literature. Madame Maurice Sand will be the next "authoress," with the correspondence of her mother-in-law. As George Sand herself burned all of the Chopin letters, and the family of Alfred de Musset has intervened with an injunction there is the satisfaction of knowing that everything will not be turned inside out for the benefit of the gaping crowd. There is something positively indecent in the way that private correspondence is made free to the world, and one cannot but feel that both the publishers and the reader are lacking in a sense of honor. One could imagine them listening at keyholes, rifling desks, or resorting to the steam of the teakettle in order to loosen the flap of an envelope that excited their curiosity. In theory, it is the litertry form which is supposed to attract readers, but in fact it is the hope of coming upon some secret, more or less salacious, which attracts the majority of people to these collections of letters of the illustrious. The extensive use of the telephone will be a blessed thing if it helps to put an end to the hoarding of chance notes and unimportant communications, in order that they may be disposed of later on for coin of the realm.

Maeterlinck, the Belgian dramatist, is soon to marry Mademoiselle Leblanc of the Opera Comique, and the marriage is to be celebrated in England in order to escape the tiresome formalities in force on the continent. One is not called upon to either warn or advise the bride to be, nevertheless, I can recall some curious and decidedly unpleasant consequences of this same desire to escape continental formalities. The "irregularities" have been strong weapons in the hands of husbands who have chosen to repudiate wives. We are told that the "prospective bride has not yet published anything; but she is engaged on a study of the psychology of women, which M. Maeterlinck believes will make a sensation when it appears." Is that the roseate view of the ardent lover, or is it merely going to be case of "marrying into literature"?

Albert Bigelow Paine has broken the record in having published three books within two months. That is the publication record. Nothing is said concerning the time it took him to write them.

Horace Annesley Vachell, once of California, will soon publish another novel, "The Shadowy Third."

The Heinrichs

Not since the Henschels have we had such highly finished work as the Heinrichs, father and daughter, gave us this week in their two charming song recitals. The first evening's program was something of a novelty, Tennyson's melodramatic poem "Enoch Arden" with a musical setting by Richard Strauss. Mr. Heinrich showed his diversified gifts in his reading of the poem which was given with great pathos and tenderness, every phase of human emotion being brought out with a touch vivid yet always exquisitely refined. In his vocal work he again showed that rare polish and intelligence that placed him beyond comparison with any but the Henschels, whom vocally the Heinrichs go beyond. His accomplishments are a delight and seem so a part of himself and his singing that one could not think of the singer and instrument but as a perfectly blended whole. Miss Julia Heinrich's voice is of a pleasing, sympathetic quality bordering on a mezzo, and her style and enunciation are admirable. She has gained in poise since her last visit here. Both artists received a warm welcome on Tuesday evening. On Thursday another fine program was given and there will be a matinee today at which all the best in their repertory will be sung.

At the concert given recently by Madame Abbie Carrington (Mrs. Emlyn Lewys), soprano, Miss Mary Carrington and Mr. Emlyn Lewys, pianists, the program rendered was of a very high order. Madame Carrington, who has had operatic experience as prima donna under the management of Strakosch, Mapleson, and others of like note, sang the scena and aria, "Ah Perfido" (Beethoven), aria from Boito's "Mefistofele," "The Dewdrop" (Rubinstein), "Understood" (Pfefferkorn), "Song of Sunshine" (Goring Thomas), "The Loreley" (Liszt), "Sandmanchen" (Brahms), and "The Erl-King" (Schubert), covering a wide range of voice and subject. The piano numbers were: Prelude, C Sharp Minor (Rachmaninoff), Menuet (Dreyschock), "Liebestraum" (Liszt), "Soiree de Vienne No. 6" (Schubert-Liszt), Mr. Lewys; "Kamennoi Ostrow" (Rubinstein), "Le Papillon" (Lavallee), Etude, C Sharp Minor, Op. 25, No 7 (Chopin), Tremolo, Etude de Concert (Gottschalk), Miss Carrington; Polonaise, A Flat (Chopin). Though it is but five months since Mr. and Mrs. Lewys came to San Francisco they have thoroughly established themselves in that short time. Madame Carrington's time is fully occupied with her engagements.

The production of "The Bohemian Girl" for the benefit of the exterior painting and interior decoration of St. Dominic's church was such an enormous success that it is to be repeated to fill the demands of those unable to secure admittance on Tuesday night to the Alhambra theatre. The opera was sung by St. Dominic's junior choir and choral union and there was a juvenile minstrel performance by St. Dominic's junior Christy minstrels.

Grothwell Musicale

The musicale at Miss Henriette Grothwell's studio on Saturday last was a pronounced success. There were over seventy-five people present, crowding the rooms to their utmost capacity. The singing of Misses Hazel Leszynsky, Emma de Boom, Celia Zinnen and Bertha Herzog showed careful training and conscientious study. The program in full was: Duet, I Waited for the Lord, Mendelssohn, Miss Zinnen and Miss de Boom; Murmuring Zephyrs, Jensen, Miss Zinnen; Ich grolle nicht, Schumann, Miss de Boom; Chanson Boheme, Carmen, Bizet, Miss Bertha Herzog; Berceuse from Jocelyn, Godard, Miss Leszynsky; My Heart at Thy Sweet Voice, from Samson et Dalila, Saint Saens, Miss Zinnen; Calm as the Night, Bohm, Miss de Boom; L'ete, Chaminade, Miss Leszynsky; duet, Two Tuscan Folk Songs, Carraciolo, Miss Zinnen and Miss de Boom. Rumor has it Miss Grothwell will very soon allow some of her pupils to appear upon a semi-public occasion.

Fritzi Scheff is said to be about to embark in comic opera, in a work written expressly for her. Fritzi should make a delightful comic opera prima donna if one judges by her Muzette in "La Boheme" and her Cherubino in "The Marriage of Figaro." She is all life and magnetism and she always seemed too giddy somehow for grand opera. She has all the qualities necessary for success as a comic opera star.

Georg Henschel is busy on a Requiem in memory of his wife. It will be sung in Boston and Breslau.

Willis E. Bacheller has a studio in Carnegie hall, New York.

How the Popular Song Happened to Be Written.

The death this week of Dr. Thomas Dunn English, representative of the Newark, N. J., district in Congress, has brought to light the story of how he happened to write the song, "Ben Bolt," which had such a vogue when resurrected by Du Maurier in his "Trilby." Dr. English is now seventy-six years old, and "Ben Bolt" was written in 1843. N. P. Willis and George P. Morris, who had revived the New York Mirror under the title of the New Mirror, asked English to send in a sea song to the paper. English wrote a song, which he was dissatisfied with, and in its stead wrote four a half stanzas of "Ben Bolt," to which he added the first four lines of the rejected sea song. The song was copied, parodied and replied to in English papers and finally its author had Dominick May of Washington set it to music. This setting was not successful and English wrote one himself, but the one that is generally used, and which became instantly popular, was composed by Nelson Kneass, a young actor, who was a brother of the United States District Attorney at Philadelphia. Kneass introduced the song in a play in which he appeared, and sang it from city to city. The words and music were first published by Peters of Cincinnati. But Peters objected to the lines:

"Don't you remember the school, Ben Bolt,
With the master so cruel and grim,
And the shaded nook in the running brook,
Where the children went to swim?"

on the ground that modest women would be shocked at the idea of children going in swimming. These lines of his own composition were substituted:

"With the master so kind and so true,
And the little nook by the clear-running brook,
Where we gathered the flowers as they grew?"

Peters sold more than sixty-thousand copies of the words and music. Kneass' setting was adapted from a German melody.

Dr. English is not an Englishman, as many fancy, but a native of Philadelphia. He was graduated doctor of medicine at the University of Pennsylvania and also called to the Philadelphia bar but has mainly pursued authorship and journalism.—The Reader.

OUR OPINION

The Spectacular Miles

General Miles is once more in the glare of the calcium. Indeed, one might suspect the General of preferring the calcium's glare to the cannon's mouth. It is certain that he has courted one more than the other. His friends tell us that he is the victim of political jealousy, and that he has been purposely kept in the background. But the fact is that General Miles has never been in the background. He is always in the forefront, not of battles, but of other things. By a strategic marriage he achieved a political and social position of vantage that bespoke exceptional generalship, and as a consequence obtained the position of Lieutenant-General, Commander of the Army. He never did anything of a military character to entitle him to that exalted position, a position previously held only by men who had demonstrated their ability to command armies. General Miles has been very lucky. True he was not permitted to exercise his prerogative of commander of the army during the Spanish war, but he was not heard protesting loudly against being held in Washington. If he had made as much fuss over that as he has lately been making because of the President's refusal to send him to the Philippines he would undoubtedly have been sent to Cuba. He was content to take command of the expedition to Porto Rico when the war was over, and now that the work in the Philippines is nearly done he appears to be anxious to go to the Orient and get the glory that is due to others. We have no doubt that General Miles would gain distinction in the Philippines. He did in Arizona, though Lawton did the fighting. He has been credited with the capture of Geronimo who surrendered to Lawton, and it has even been said that he won the battle of Santiago though he was in Washington when the Spaniards laid down their arms. Notwithstanding all his good fortune Miles appears to have many grievances and they are of such a character as might suggest that he is anxious to pose as a martyr. Next year he will reach the age limit and drop to the retired list, but it seems to be his purpose to force a row with the President and the Secretary of War so that they may be compelled to retire him meanwhile for the good of the service. Then his friends could boom him for the nomination for President on the Democratic ticket. There are many influential politicians who think that the name of Miles is a good one to conjure with. And at present a candidate for the Democracy is very much in demand. But the politicians in Washington are sadly in error if they are of the opinion that the country regards Miles as a hero. The country believes that Miles has been unduly humiliated but it knows that he has invited humiliation, and that he is a man of invincible egotism. He is the greatest military demagogue that this country has produced.

America's Gambling Hell

Every little while a story comes over the cable about the big losses sustained by some American millionaire at Monte Carlo or at some other gambling resort in Europe. Seldom is anything heard of the doings of our plutocratic gamblers in this country, but there are gambling hells in America that receive the patronage of our most distinguished citizens and that do a plethoric business. Money comes very fast to the pockets of our captains of commerce, but the play in Wall street is not exciting enough for them. They require diversion and quick action, and at the roulette tables of Saratoga they get both. William C. Whitney, ex-Secretary of the Navy and street railroad magnate, is one of the most daring gamblers in the country, and there are members of the Belmont, Vanderbilt, Gould and Astor clan that hazard large sums on the turn of the wheel at Saratoga every summer. The Saratoga Club is the one place in New York where gambling goes on without interference of any sort, except an occasional perfunctory visit from a constable. Seasons are short and highly profitable. The owner of the Saratoga Club privilege is Richard A. Canfield. A few days ago he was offered three hundred and fifty thousand dollars for the clubhouse, furnishings and good will. The offer is not regarded as extravagant. The coming season promises to be the most prosperous of all the years of high rolling there. Extensive improvements at the Saratoga racetrack, larger purses and the personal interest in affairs shown by William C. Whitney and other rich patrons of the turf will attract to Saratoga more men, women and money than ever before. Canfield's club is credited with a profit of two hundred thousand dollars for its seven or eight weeks of activity last summer. This sum was won by the roulette tables. The faro bank lost thirty thousand dollars. It got the play of the experienced plungers who wouldn't dream of putting their checks down at the wheel. In consequence of the open gambling at Saratoga that place becomes, every summer, one of the fastest resorts in the world. More vice is crewded into a few weeks there than can be found in any similar resort in Europe. But one seldom hears of any protests from the reformers in New York. Governor Odell is aware of the Saratoga hell but he has not interfered although charges have been made against the sheriff of the county who winks at the gamblers for a handsome consideration. The preachers may denounce polo playing on Sunday but they refrain from comment on the gambling evil at Saratoga. And now, as the wealthy New Yorkers demand recreation over a longer season of the year, preparations are being made for the establishment of a swell gambling resort in the heart of the metropolis. A house in West Thirty-third street close to the Waldorf is now being fitted up and is to be the most magnificent gambling palace in America. The plant including decorations and gambling devices will represent an investment of two hundred thousand dollars. It is estimated that with the patronage that is expected the house can pay a hundred per cent a year on the sum invested. Perhaps the people of New York will welcome the new institution in the hope that it will foster home industry.

Discrimination Against Boys

On the night of the first of April some thirteen youngsters who were skylarking on their way home from school, under the delusion that the day gave them special privileges, were arrested, taken to the city prison and detained over night. The same thing happened on the other side of the bay, where some misguided youths had imbibed the impression that on that one day in the year all laws were suspended. No doubt the youngsters were obstreperous, and some measure of restraint was called for, but they would probably have desisted had they been requested to do so. In any event, the lads who were on their way home from night school were young breadwinners, employed during the day, and however annoying their tricks, a point might have been stretched in their favor. Had they been University students instead of night school boys, no fault would have been found. They might have got drunk, annoyed pedestrians, taken possession of the street cars, disturbed a theatrical performance, stolen signs, removed gates, and acted the tough generally, and it would have been "so funny" that only the curmudgeons would have dared to object. It would have been "college spirit," not hoodlumism. The same kind of thing is carried on wherever there is an "institution of higher learning," and full-grown men, endowed with all the rights and privileges of citizenship are permitted to deface public and private property, commit burglary, and conduct themselves like candidates for the penitentiary, but the fact of their connection with a college protects them from any interference. Quite recently some of these gentlemen at one of the Eastern colleges cut an oil painting of Mrs. Agassiz from its frame and attached it to a telegraph pole to flutter as a banner till it was whipped into rags, and no effort has been made to apprehend or punish the perpetrators of the vandal prank, who were only "college boys." There is no necessity to enumerate more, or to go afield in search of examples, for we have plenty at home. Police are loth to make arrests, and the judiciary are lenient when they are forced to take note of the misdemeanors of these favored classes, giving as an excuse that they "hesitate about blighting the career" of a young man who may be about to enter into professional life. It is a pity that their hesitation cannot be exercised for the benefit of the children who come before them, younger in years and experience and without the training which life, if nothing else, has supplied to the men of twice their age. The pandemonium let loose on our streets on New Year's eve during the last few years is enough to have demoralized the little boys who probably have witnessed the unrestrained antics of men and women, and have seen the newspapers given over to the laudation of the carnival. Between carnival and college spirit, little wonder that children are misled, and that they feel entitled to their share of sport on All Fool's day. If we are to have discrimination, let it be in favor of those who may be presumed to be acting from ignorance and thoughtlessness, not for those who are receiving special benefits and ought therefore to be under special obligations to the State.

More Culture Needed

In the College of Physicians and Surgeons of the Columbian University there is agitation for imposing a hard and fast rule as to general education among the students of medicine. Some of the trustees are said to be in favor of making the possession of a degree in arts a necessary preliminary to the study of medicine. They contend that a man who purposes to doctor his fellows should have had a wide training in liberal studies before he begins preparation for his professional career. This matter has frequently been the subject of discussion in this part of the country. We have a College of Physicians and Surgeons through which a barber or plumber may pass in a few years without any education except such as may equip him sufficiently for the administration of pills or the sawing of a leg. If all medical students were required to have at least the rudiments of a good education there would not be so many charlatans in the world, and there is no doubt that if the standard of mental culture were raised in the medical profession physicians would command greater respect and confidence than they now enjoy. And that the success of a physician frequently depends on the confidence he is capable of inspiring there is no doubt. An uncultured medical student is unfit to become the highest type of the profession of medicine. If a degree were the entrance requirement of all medical colleges many worthy men would be barred, but the good resulting therefrom would far outweigh any injustice that might be done.

"I die tonight," I wrote her
To make the sum complete;
In a fortnight how she started
To behold me in the street.

II.

Yet, pistols make a horrid mess,
And daggers I despise,
And I am poison-proof since I
Drank poison from your eyes.

So am I forced this life to live
Nor for its end make moan,
And since you cannot see my death,
I yet may see your own.

Life is the lesser evil:—

The Saunterer

His Softer Side

When the revelations were made the other day of the large sums of money due the estate of the late C. P. Huntington from persons who had enjoyed the bounty of the railroad magnate great was the surprise of those who were wont to quote his famous utterance about the impossibility of ever tracking him by the quarters he dropped. Sandbagging politicians and leg-pulling journalists were well aware of the generosity of Senator Stanford, but the reputation of Huntington as a "good thing" was somewhat circumscribed. The side of his character revealed by the inventory of worthless promissory notes belonging to his estate was unknown to the great mass of chronic and expert borrowers in this neck of the woods. But Huntington was never so available as Stanford. The latter was always accessible to flatterers in need, and to those ready to bend the pregnant hinges of the knee he was ever grateful, and quick to exemplify that thrift does follow fawning. Huntington, however, was generous only to those who could be of some benefit to him or who possessed qualities that appealed to his admiration.

The Magnate's Quarrel

Both Huntington and Stanford played such important parts in the development of this State, and figured in so many episodes of national as well as local interest that I should not be surprised if some day a competent raconteur decided upon publishing the story of their connection with some of the remarkable and thrilling events that have become of historical importance. A great deal that they did in connection with their railroad enterprises and in shaping the politics of the State for their own ends was of a nature that required secrecy and consequently the stories of many of the episodes have been garbled. Only the other day I heard a new version of the story of the quarrel between Huntington and Stanford over the turning down of Senator Sargent. The story with which the public is familiar is that Stanford deceived Sargent by pretending that he was not an aspirant for the toga, and that he got into the fight and elected himself with the aid of the funds of the railroad company.

Sargent Wanted Money

Stanford has been severely condemned for his alleged treachery to Sargent, and he was being denounced the other day when I heard the other side of the story. It was told by a newspaper man who was thoroughly familiar with all the incidents leading to the introduction of Stanford to the Senatorial fight and culminating in his election. Indeed, he was one of the dramatis personae. According to his story Stanford had no intention of becoming a candidate at the time that Sargent announced his determination to make the fight, but the railroad magnate was in no sense bound to give precedent to Sargent because the latter subsequently declared that he would not enter the race without the aid of the railroad company. In fact he demanded two hundred and forty thousand dollars from the company with which to elect a legislature and buy votes. It was then that Fred Crocker, Creed Haymond, Henry Vrooman and others determined upon persuading Stanford to become a candidate. Crocker was an enthusiastic Stanford man. He thought as much of Stanford as he did of his own father, because, when he was a boy and his father sought to educate him as a railroad man by requiring him to work as an ordinary train hand, Stanford interceded in his behalf and showed a deep interest in his welfare. Haymond and Vrooman were interested in Stanford through selfish motives, but at any rate they decided upon persuading him to run.

Public Opinion Manufactured

And to carry out their purpose they resolved upon a bit of strategy. In their opinion it was necessary for them to appeal to the old man's vanity—to make him believe he was the people's choice. They took Colonel John P. Jackson, who was then editor of the Post, into their confidence, and as he was an admirer of Stanford he agreed to assist them. A Stanford boom was started in the Post. Prominent citizens were interviewed, but only those who were friends of Stanford, or who were eager for his friendship, and of course they proclaimed him the right man for the job. Those interviews were sent to every railroad organ in the State, and within a few days the Stanford boom had attained large dimensions. Finally, Senator Stanford was interviewed, and he declared he was not a candidate, but of course if the people wanted him, etc., he would not deprive them of their choice. Meanwhile, Creed Haymond was working the railroal's political bureau for all it was worth, and overtime too, and as Tim Hopkins, then Treasurer of the company, was a Stanford man, there was no difficulty about paying the bills. By the time the Legislature met Stanford had the fight won, and the egotistical old chap actually believed that he was the people's choice until some years later, when Huntington called his attention to the vouchers. The man who tells this story is the one who began the "molding of public opinion" in Stanford's behalf.

Why They were Fond of Her

When the will of Hugh Tevis was opened his relatives were amazed and shocked to find that he had appointed his eighteen-year old widow the guardian of his daughter. The supposition was that he would not have done so had he expected to die so soon. The relatives of the girl expected trouble but the young widow graciously agreed to surrender the child to her grandmother, Mrs. Boalt. And it was this graciousness that has made her husband's relatives so fond of her. But little Alice is so much in love with her "new mamma" that she wanted to stay with her.

Why She Fainted

H. L. Baggerly, sporting editor of the Bulletin, is a modest chap and easily shocked. He figured in an episode on the Oakland boat, while returning from the races, the other day, that played havoc with his nerves. A woman who was sitting near him, reading a paper, suddenly threw up her hands, exclaimed "Great heavens!" and fell into a faint. Baggerly rushed for whisky, and when he returned found the woman staring at the headlines in the newspaper over the death notice of a prominent citizen.

"Was he a relative of yours?" asked Baggerly, sympathetically.

Sobbingly the woman replied, "I was his mistress for five years."

And Baggerly blushed.

Byrne Roasted Matthews

Though I was the first to call attention in public print to the Matthews incubus at the Hopkins Institute of Art I have no desire to claim the credit of its discovery. Some weeks ago J. W. Byrne who is now Vice-President of the Institute proclaimed at a meeting of the directors the existence of the evil. And he referred to Matthews on that occasion in rather severe terms. He declared that it was somewhat remarkable that the Institute's hired man should be given so much sway. He referred to the fact that Matthews occupied rooms in the building for which he paid no rent, and he declared that though the artist was merely an employe of the Institute he seemed to have more authority than the directors. He warned the directors against permitting Matthews to continue the arbitrary methods which had proved so distasteful to such artists as Joullin, Stanton and Dickman. No heed was paid to the warning, however.

Therefore He's Objectionable

A member of the Pacific-Union Club has taken me to task for my comments of last week anent the blackballing of two applicants for membership in that organization. He suggests that perhaps the men that cast the blackballs had good reason for doing so, that they had probably heard something derogatory of the character of the men who were "pilled." I have no doubt that they did. They were probably informed that the young men lacked dignity and repose and that they are entirely too Democratic in their tastes and habits. I happen to know that this objection was urged against one of the young men in the Bohemian Club. He is of aristocratic lineage and is destined to inherit great wealth, but he does not appear to appreciate the fact. He has none of the airs of the plutocratic snob, nor does he affect the manners of the parvenu which are so often confounded with the hallmark of gentle breeding.

The Neutral Man

I still insist that indiscriminate blackballing is discreditable to any organization in which it is indulged. It is quite often the result of petty jealousies, generally of a business and occasionally of a social nature. To blackball a man in a club is to impose a stigma on him because his rejection implies his unworth, but in the majority of instances men have not been barred from membership in clubs or fraternal societies on account of any shortcomings or by reason of their unfitness to associate with those already in. The neutral man is the one that has no trouble in joining clubs or lodges. By the neutral man I mean the fellow who spends most of his time trying to avoid issues. When asked for his opinion he withholds it until he has had time to measure its possible effect on his individual interests. He is the most amiable fellow in the world. And the neutral man is the chap that likes to express his sentiments beneath the rose. The blackball is his favorite weapon. Club life has its pleasant features but it involves the unpleasant inconvenience of being forced into contact occasionally with people one should prefer not to meet. And you cannot avoid meeting such people even in our most exclusive clubs.

She was a Friend of the King

The news comes to me from London that Lady Naylor-Leyland, who as Miss Jennie Chamberlain was such a noted beauty, is contemplating marrying a man younger than herself, an officer in the Guards. Society over there is saying there must be more than a spice of romance in the affair, as by the will of her late husband the widow, in case of her re-marriage, will lose most of the fortune she now enjoys and be left in possession of only her jointure. Lady Naylor-Leyland is not unknown in San Francisco where with her father and mother, Mr. and Mrs. Chamberlain of Cleveland, Ohio, she passed the greater part of the year 1877. From here the family went to Europe where Miss Jennie's beauty attracted the notice of the Prince of Wales. One evening at a ball in London, His Royal Highness sent his Equerry to say to Miss Chamberlain that he wished to dance with her. "If the Prince wants to dance with me," said she, "let him come and ask me." This startling innovation upon Court ceremonial had the effect of fanning the flame of the Prince's admiration. Some said the young lady hunted him down, if such a remark could be applied in such a case. One thing however was certain, at whatever Continental watering place the Prince of Wales sojourned there also were to be found the Chamberlains—at least the mother and daughter. The father returned to Cleveland. Miss Jennie was at different times said to be engaged to the Duke of Montrose and other members of the English nobility, but in no case did her fortune seem large enough to the prospective grooms to justify the desired "arrangement." Finally, she became the bride of Sir—then Mister—Naylor-Leyland, the rich son of a wealthy shipowner, and to her influence with the Prince 'tis said her husband owed his social and worldly advancement in Great Britain.

Reminiscences of the Old South

Florence Davis, grandniece of the President of the Confederacy, is not the only one of that family to become a bread-winner. When the family fell upon hard times, Jefferson Davis' daughter Winnie was one of the first to show what she could do as a worker. She wrote articles for the North American Review and other magazines and managed to aid the family exchequer not a little by that means. In Jefferson Davis' immediate family were four children, two boys and two girls. Willie, the youngest, died of diphtheria, and Jeff. Jr. of yellow fever. When the President of the dismantled Confederacy resided in Memphis he had a position with an insurance company and his family of course moved with the smartest set of that city. But the company died, and after that the Davis' income was like those of so many Southerners after the war, a mere problem.

Feud between the Davises and Pillows

Memphis was at that time the home of many prominent ex-Confederates—Isham G. Harris, General Browne, General Forrest, General Pillow and others. General Pillow was the only one of these who was not on friendly terms with the Davises. Owing to a disagreement that dated back to the Mexican war, General Pillow refused to permit his family to speak to the daughters of Jefferson Davis. Old Memphis people now living in San Francisco recall this social feud, and how charming were Maggie and Winnie Davis and their friends, the nieces of old Admiral Semmes. At a ball given by one of the Memphis patricians, Winnie Davis refused to dance in the same set with General Pillow's son. Miss Florence Davis, who is to make her dramatic debut in Opie Reid's "The Starbucks" in New York during the coming season, is said to resemble her cousin Winnie very much in disposition. She is a very pretty girl with much independence of spirit and lots of pluck.

Stanford to have a New Teacher

A distinguished divine, in the person of Rev. Dr. Heber Newton is to be added to the faculty of Stanford University. He resigned the rectorship of All Souls' church, New York, to accept the position of special teacher in the university. Dr. Newton has been for many years the most striking figure among the Episcopal clergy of New York. His religious views have frequently disturbed the repose of the Episcopal church. In 1884 Bishop Potter was urged to discipline him and a movement was started by the Rev. Dr. De Costa to have him tried for heresy. It was in consequence of the controversy that followed, that Dr. De Costa became a convert to the Roman Catholic church. Bishop Potter merely cautioned Dr. Newton against giving occasion for discord. Several years later several clergymen petitioned for an inquiry concerning Dr. Newton's teachings, but nothing came of it. Since then he has been left free from interference, though he has modified his teachings in no way except to make them the more open to the objections which had provoked the agitation for his trial for heresy. His religious views have no longer the charm of novelty. They have dealt principally with conclusions of the so-called "higher criticism" of the Bible.

Diverting his Brother's Business

It is not unusual for one man in business to avail himself of another man's enterprise. Some men thrive upon the theory that all is fair in trade. Such appears to be the theory of Frank Mayerle. His brother, George Mayerle, of the German Optical Institute, is one of the best known opticians in San Francisco, and by his skill and judicious advertising has established a business of great value. A short time ago his brother Frank opened a store adjoining that of the German Optical Institute at 1071½ Market and by featuring the name of Mayerle has managed to divert a portion of George Mayerle's trade. Of course the indignation of George Mayerle is great but he appears to have no redress. Notwithstanding the proud boast of the legal profession there are wrongs that have no remedy.

A Joke on Otis

Brigadier-General Harrison Gray Otis, editor and owner of the Los Angeles Times, is ramping and roaring in the Times' magnificent building. He and the Times have been made the butt of one of the broadest and most pointed hoaxes ever perpetrated in the West. Otis is conceited. As a fierce assailant of all labor unions, of the Catholic Church, and of every person and interest which opposes him or the Times, the hero of the Rubicon has established a reputation for innocuous but spiteful diatribes against all who are not his supplicants or friends. There has been a bitter fight between the Times and the Herald, and the Times has continuously picked flaws in the policy or conduct of the Herald. Now the Herald has put up a job on Otis, and sold him out effectually. One of the men on the staff sent the Times the following poem, which Otis took for a compliment on his stiff course in general affairs, and which was printed in the editorial columns of the Times in big type:

HARMLESS ASSAULTS.

To the Los Angeles Times

No barking curs disturb your pose serene,
Or turn you from the pathway you would take,
Malice and envy ruffle not your mien,
Nor useless diatribes your forces shake.
Let glittering sophistry its poison spread,
And let subservient tricksters basely slave;
The rock above the ocean's angry bed
Remains intact despite the warring wave.
So shall traducers war on you in vain
And fruitless efforts make your heights to reach;
Their losses shall be ever to your gain,
And strew, alas, the journalistic beach.

D. T. A. F.

The Editor Shocked

Otis was especially gratified by the poem, and took it for a fine appreciation of his ability and the Times' success. But now the Herald, the hated contemporary of the Times, publishes the poem from a different point of view, showing that Otis is set down as an ass in his own paper.

The newspaper world of Southern California is laughing heartily over the success of the Herald man's scheme, and orders have been given by the Brigadier-General to destroy every copy of the paper on which hands can be laid.

The Stork Appears

The yellow journals are overlooking some splendid material for their Sunday Supps. The news comes to me from Washington that the stork has been seen hovering over the White House. Not a single yellow journal has mentioned the fact. Yet the circumstance of the bird's proximity to the White House is fraught with great interest, and should suggest to the fertile brain of the average yellow journalist a large variety of subjects on which to expatiate. When young Teddy had a bad cold some months ago, it was deemed a sufficient excuse for the publication of his football breeches. With the lanky bird in the shadow of the White House surely we are entitled to a view of the cradle which is to receive his burden and of the baby clothes that are being made, and to some information as to the date of the expected visitation. Of course, it is possible that the stork is merely making one of his occasional bluffs, but an interview with the bird as to whether his intentions are honorable is surely not beyond the range of saffron-hued journalistic enterprise. If the bird confirm the suspicions that have been aroused, then perhaps Mr. Hearst will start a guessing contest as to whether it is to be a girl or a Rough Rider. Later on we shall have interviews with the nurse and the doctor, and hourly bulletins as to the infant's temperature and the mother's appetite. The correspondents are no doubt preparing for a busy season.

He was only a Drummer

In these ultra busy days events only of great moment are permitted to halt the wheels of commerce. Our merchant princes and captains of industry are reluctant to check the flow of coin into their coffers, and when a death occurs in the family of one of them it must be of a very near relative to cause the closing of doors and the shutting down of business in respect to the memory of the deceased. But some of our merchant princes are not devoid of tenderness of feeling, nor are they insensible to the respect due faithful employes. The exceptions are rare, however, and therefore I wish to record an instance, that of the firm of Lilienthal & Co., proprietors of the Crown Distilleries. The other day that firm closed its doors in respect to the memory of a man who was only a drummer. But he was a noble-hearted fellow, was Jack Shaugnessy, and it is a great pleasure to call attention to the esteem in which he was held by his employers. An humble citizen he was, following an occupation which gives little opportunity for deeds that win distinction, but the praises of Jack Shaugnessy have been sung all over this coast. One of the dailies which published an obituary notice of the drummer told of how he started a fund for the relief of a miner's widow in Montana. It was one of a thousand instances of his sympathetic and kindly nature. His salary was ten thousand a year. He spent half of it in relieving distress and aiding friends, but he left no promissory notes as post-mortem evidence of a charitable nature. He took no notes.

A Bank Teller's Good Luck

The story of another instance of a big firm's recognition of the worth of an employe, and of its generous testimony thereto, came to my ears the other day. One of the high-salaried tellers of the London, Paris and American Bank was summoned into the private office of the manager recently, on the occasion of the twenty-fifth anniversary of his connection with that institution, and after being congratulated was handed a check for five hundred dollars. After expressing his gratitude he started for his desk, and the manager called him back and told him that he had received a cablegram that morning from the head of the institution in Paris. He read the cablegram which instructed the manager to present his compliments to the teller together with a check for one thousand dollars.

Mr. Chauncey M. St. John gave a dinner last Friday evening complimentary to General Oscar F. Long, prior to his departure for Washington, D. C. It was a very pleasant affair. Afterward the party went to the Tivoli, enjoying "The Serenade" and winding up with supper at the Zinkand. Those in the party were General Long, Major Devol, U. S. A., Colonel Brady, Mr. Older and Mr. St. John.

Topics for Society Writers

Mrs. Eleanor Martin having joined the ranks of Sunday Supplement writers, we may reasonably expect others of the smart set to break their necks, so to speak, to get themselves into print. Let me suggest a few topics that some of them could give pointers on:

Mrs. Captain Blair—"How to Get into Society."

Mrs. Henry T. Scott—"The Evolution of a Woman of Fashion."

Mrs. Joe Tobin—"The Art of Dressing Well."

Mrs. Salisbury—"Match-making, and How to Do It."

Mrs. Frank Carolan—"The Management of Husbands."

Mrs. Charles L. Bent—"General Shafter and the Philippines."

Almost any of the Young Matrons—"Slang in All Its Moods and Tenses."

Mary Kip to Return

Miss Mary Kip, who in leaving here last autumn wished to shake the dust of California from her feet, has decided, after an extended series of visits in the East, that there are worse places than the Golden State and will return here early next month. No doubt her many friends will gladly welcome her for she is a charming woman. Mrs. and Miss Kip will spend the summer at their favorite resort, San Rafael, and there also Miss Alice Hager will pass most of the coming season. Miss Ethyl Hager will remain in town for awhile and join her sister in San Rafael later on.

To Honor Mrs. Reid

The most brilliant function of the post-Lenten season will be the fete champetre which Mr. Henry P. Bowie intends giving next Friday at his beautiful home near San Mateo, in honor of Mrs. Whitelaw Reid. Everything that wealth combined with refined taste can do will be done to insure the enjoyment of the guests. A special train will leave for San Mateo at one o'clock returning at five. A full orchestra will play under the spreading oaks and dancing for those who wish to trip the light fantastic will be among the pleasures of the afternoon. Mr. Bowie's house is full of rare curios and objets d'art gathered by him in extensive foreign travel. It is something of a coincidence that the first fete champetre in the vicinity of San Francisco was given by Mr. Bowie's late wife—then Mrs. George Howard—at her country home El Cerito, San Mateo. The date selected by Mrs. Howard was the fourth of July, 1865, and on that occasion a special train carried the guests from town there and back again. A band was in attendance and there was dancing in the new barn opened that day for the first time, while luncheon was served in a tent erected upon the lawn.

Phil Sheridan's Brother

The despatches tell us that Colonel M. V. Sheridan was promoted to Assistant Adjutant-General the other day by President Roosevelt. General Sheridan is the brother of General "Phil" Sheridan, but he has won distinction for other reasons. He served in the Volunteers in the Civil War, and at its close became Second Lieutenant in the Fifth Cavalry. He was promoted captain in the Seventh Cavalry within a few months, and entered the Adjutant-General's Department as Major in 1883. He served as aide-de-camp on his brother's staff from 1870 to the death of General Sheridan in 1888, but during the late sixties he was on the frontier with his regiment in Indian wars. He was made a Brigadier-General of Volunteers during the Spanish war and will retire for age on May 24, 1904. The promotion of Colonel Sheridan and of Colonels Isaac D. De Russy and Andrew S. Burt were no doubt made in response to the popular feeling that worthy officers of long service should not be permitted to retire as merely Colonels, but should be made Generals even though they be retired immediately after their promotion.

Caught Consumption from His Patients

News comes to me from New York that Dr. Clinton H. Catherwood, the son of Mrs. Darling, wife of Major Darling of this city, has become afflicted with consumption, the direct result of years of practice among sufferers from lung diseases. He has been compelled to give up his home and his practice in New York, and he has gone to Colorado Springs. He was for a long time a staff physician at the Hudson street hospital and later on he was house surgeon there. In his private practice he had an unusual number of cases of consumption under his care, many of them being in tenement houses, where whole families were infected with the disease. He first began to feel ill two weeks ago, and he consulted a fellow physician, who laughingly said that if he didn't know Catherwood for a big, husky fellow without a taint of any disease in his blood, he would say that he had consumption. Dr. Catherwood immediately consulted specialists, who told him that he had tuberculosis and that it would have a fatal ending in a short time if he did not go away. Dr. Catherwood is a son of Colonel Catherwood, who fought in the Civil War with a Missouri regiment. His maternal grandfather was a Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of this State. He is one of the Catherwood boys mentioned in Winston Churchill's novel, "The Crisis."

The Fair Case Scandal

The Justices of the Supreme Court will no doubt hail with delight the last word that shall be spoken in the Fair case. No other case tried in this State ever occasioned so much jesting at the expense of that dignified tribunal. And never before have defeated attorneys voiced their disapproval of the Court's decision in such insinuating terms. If those attorneys were mere fledglings at the bar, or if they were chronic kickers of the Philbrook type their caustic criticisms would receive no attention, but they are the leaders of the profession, and the most aggressive of them—Robert Y. Hayne—has but recently stood as the Court's champion. His sarcastic language in his petition for a rehearing is tame compared to the comments that have been made outside the court-room. The integrity of the Court has been attacked, and though the attorneys have made no direct accusations they have left no doubt as to their sentiments.

Jim Budd's View

So whatever were the intentions of James J. Fair regarding the disposition of his property, he at least succeeded in stirring up the nastiest legal scandal that ever involved the local bench and bar. The attorneys for the Fair heirs affect great indignation over what they are pleased to term the sore-head tactics of their opponents and they are particularly bitter against Mr. Hayne whom they denounce as a disgruntled poseur. Ex-Governor Budd, who is noted for his forceful and unique English expressed the sentiments of his confreres at the Palace Grill the other day, when he said, "Those fellows have been pulling at the Fair udder for a long time and they hate to let go and give anybody else a chance."

Mrs. Craven's Attorneys

But the wind-up of the case cannot be long delayed now. The Hayne petition for another rehearing will no doubt be denied, for there is no likelihood of another flop on the bench. It was Chief-Justice Beatty who was responsible for the last rehearing which caused all the trouble, he having signed the order granting it though he had stood by the trust. After the trust matter has been ended then, the supposition is, Mrs. Craven will be bought off. How her attorneys will figure in the matter I cannot predict, but I should think they would be eager to retire as gracefully as possible. The circumstance of their having espoused the Craven cause proved them to be men either of phenomenal credulity or of elastic consciences, and they should never pose again as authority in matters of professional ethics.

"Show me, please, the latest thing in artistic switches," said the American Lady in Paris, to the Dealer in Human Hair.

"Certainement, Madame. What color?"

"Oh, goodness, I don't know. It's for my husband's sister in New York. (After a pause) Well, I tell you. Just give me the latest modish shade. I guess it will do."

The Naked Truth

There was a little argument, the other evening at a downtown rotisserie, and the naked truth propounded there conveyed a veiled allusion. Four old and two young newspaper men were gathered about the table. The elders were self-made men; the youth were college graduates. One of the elders started the ball by making the old declaration about over-education. "Why, even California is over-educated!" he said. One of the young men took up the argument. "Over educated!" he exclaimed. "Why, California is still a schoolboy in knee pants." "So?" smiled the cynic of the crowd. "Every wind that blows up Market street flutters a pamphlet of college diplomas." "College diplomas do not signify education," the second speaker answered. "Half of the men who hold college diplomas could not pass high school examinations. Too many people are crying about over-education when what they really mean is 'under-education,' if I may coin a phrase. What you meant to say," he continued, turning to the man who had opened the debate, "is that California is suffering from too many college graduates. Now, Dr. Jordan says—" Here the man who had opened the debate rose to his feet and pulled at his hair. "Yes!" he roared, "'Dr. Jordan says—Dr. Jordan says'—damn it all, that's just what I meant to say! Dr. Jordan says something and within twenty-four hours you young cocks of the walk are up here crowing it on every dung-hill in San Francisco. A man can't attack an enemy or roast a trust but what it comes back at him with 'Dr. Jordan says' tagged to the preface!" The next day an editorial appeared in a paper roasting the State for over-education, and that week a weekly editorial appeared on under-education. So much for the naked truth.

The Veiled Allusion

I wonder if half the people of this city stop to think just how much 'Doctor this' and 'Professor that' have to do with our public and even our private affairs. If there is a hybrid species of animal discovered, the Biology Prof. is hunted down and made to talk; if a street car line is to be bought, the Economics man is poked out of his shell; when a farmer discovers an odd relic or rock it is packed up and addressed to the university. And as for our private affairs—a man can't even be divorced but the Psychological Professor must give his opinion or temperament, and the History man his statistics of marriage. And worse—or better—as these Doctors of Philosophy and Professors of Science obtain public grace and attention, they become prolific to an extent that would startle the lay mind should he get their variations all at once. For example, within the past year or so, I have known one professor to talk on the following subjects: Mountain Climbing in Switzerland; The Open Door Policy in China; The Efficacy of Woolens for Winter; The Laws of Alaska; The Harvest Fields of Holland; The Most Nourishing Foods for Infants; The Life of a Mother; The War in the Philippines; A Drunkard's Home; The Social Psychology of Mob Mind; The Fishes of Honolulu; Sheep-raising in Texas; Bull-Fighting in Mexico; Prize-Fighting in California; The Brain of a Man; The Life of a Microbe; Knee-Garters for Women; Snuff-Taking in England; and A Straight-Front Corset for Uncle Sam. Now for the veiled allusion. If, as that young collegiate said, a college diploma is not significant of education, to just what extent shall we place the blame on the fellow who holds that diploma?

A Family Tree

Apropos of the remark made by a society girl the other day, referring to the engagement of Miss Margaret Salisbury, that it is better to be born lucky than rich, I was reminded of the luck of the Smith family, and as that topic suggests some interesting reminiscences I will take a backward glance into the past. Few of the society people of today remember the Smiths and their humble origin. Yet Mrs. Mary Smith was the progenitress of two of our smartest matrons whose husbands are noted for their ponderously aristocratic bearing. In the early sixties Mrs. Mary Smith, a widow, lived with her sister, Mrs. Caroline Bowman, in a cottage in Bush street, just above the present side entrance of the Russ House. There were no more popular girls than the daughters of the widow Smith. They were from Chile and they were pretty girls and dainty, and their clever fingers fashioned exquisite fancy work, which found an eager purchaser in F. Locan, the leading dealer in fancy goods in those days. The girls were popular among the beaux of the period, and they had a devoted friend in George C. Bode, the warehouse man who acted as their escort on all occasions.

How the Girls Mated

Each of the girls had a host of admirers. Nellie, the eldest, was finally won by James Freeborn, who was a rich man, and then the luck of the family began. Quica, the second daughter, by some thought the prettiest, was assuredly the most popular of the sisters and her friends were warm in their congratulations when her engagement to Louis Parrott was announced. It was however, broken off and she died soon after unmarried. Nonie, the third daughter, numbered her beaux by the score, the most favored being Captain Weedon of the Army, and much sympathy was felt for her when, after a lovers' quarrel one night, Weedon was found dead in his rooms in Bush street. He had taken an overdose of chloral and on his writing table lay an unfinished note addressed to Miss Nonie. Not long after she became the wife of the well-known broker, E. J. de Santa Marina, and they lived in Paris almost continuously until the husband's death in that city, when the widow returned to California and remained here till after the marriage of her niece Eugenie to the son of Captain A. F. Rodgers of New York, and she is now in that city.

The Fourth Daughter

It was reserved for the fourth daughter Georgie to make the match of the quartet when she married E. W. Hopkins, nephew of Mark and Moses Hopkins, each of whom left them large legacies, and their daughters are the present social lights, Mesdames Gus and Will Taylor and Fred McNear. The youngest of the Smith sisters, Sophie, married Fred W. Zeile. Luck surely proved better than riches in the life of the Smith family.

The Hulls are Here

Major John A. Hull, U. S. A., and his bride, who were married at Des Moines on the third of this month, arrived here last Wednesday and are at the Knickerbocker. Major Hull is the son of Congressman Hull, chairman of the House Military Committee.

Lord Temple cigars are smoked by all clubmen who will take nothing but the best.

Two Thorntons Gone

Society is regretting the departure of Mr. and Mrs. Will Thornton, a most popular young couple and members of the large Thornton clan. They will make Chicago their future residence, Mr. Thornton having gone into business in the windy city. Mrs. Thornton is a native daughter; her father, Major S. J. Hensley, was a noted pioneer, founder of the California Steam Navigation company and a man of great wealth. The family home at San Jose was distinguished for an unceasing flow of hospitality dispensed by Major Hensley and his brilliant wife, a lady whose intellectual gifts have always been recognized as of a high order. Members of Will Thornton's family were for years among San Francisco's most prominent residents. His grandfather and father were each judges on the Supreme bench and the ladies of the family have been noted socially. His brother is the well-known clubman, Crittenden Thornton; one of his sisters is the wife of Admiral Watson and another sister is Mrs. Abbott Kinney of Southern California.

Doane-Farrell

After all, there's not to be one left unmarried of Mrs. Marriner-Campbell's famous young ladies' quartet that comprised Florence Doane, Mary Mann, Julia Heyman and Ivy Gardner. To the names of Mesdames Haley, Emanuel and Glassell will be added that of Mrs. Charles H. Farrell on the fifth of June, when Miss Doane will become the bride of Mr. Farrell, one of the proprietors of the Dramatic Review. Miss Doane had long cherished her independence, but finally decided that it is a woman's prerogative to change her mind. She is a very beautiful young girl, a perfect blonde, with a voice of such sweetness and strength that H. C. Barnabee tried hard to get it for the Bostonians. But Miss Doane preferred to stay in San Francisco with her parents and satisfy herself with appearing in an occasional concert, and being leading soprano of a church choir. She will be a great heiress some day. Her father was a pioneer and was for years senior member of the firm of

Art in the Altogether

There was a lot of reminiscencing about Fred Yates at the Sketch Club's exhibition of his pictures last week. Fred Yates never made a great deal of money here, but he was always very popular. Long before Maren Froelich started in to paint ballet girls, Yates did a danseuse that created a tremendous sensation when shown in a Post street gallery. It was a life-size pose of a ballerina in scarlet skirts, the entire color scheme being red, and it was really a striking thing. Yates is the artist who aroused such a how-de-doo among the husbands, fathers and brothers who had feminine relatives learning to wield palette and brush under his guidance. That was long before "Trilby" had made us familiar with the term "altogether." Yates taught in the old Pine street studio and some of his pupils begged to take from the life. "We're sick of drawing from those old casts," the enthusiastic students pleaded, "let us have the real thing." Yates gave them a nude model, but afterwards he wished he had not. He never heard the last of it.

An Artistic Personality

Sandona is painting a portrait of Callaghan Byrne, and, embryonic as it is, the likeness is wonderfully accurate. I cannot point out an artist here who catches an expression as this young Italian does. Joe Strong had the gift, but I do not think either Wores or Peck has it in such a degree. Sandona is a very modest young fellow. His caput hasn't swelled a bit since his Hopkins' portraits brought him into such prominence. He has far more capacity for application than most youths of his age—he is only twenty—and works all the time. In his leisure he reads—poetry, mostly, Dante, Tasso, Plutarch. A society girl who has a penchant for seeking likenesses, said that Sandona is the picture of Romeo, the real Romeo. As the young artist came from Verona, the suggestion is not inapt.

Downfall of the Scotts

The greed of the Union Iron Works has been the cause of the blasting of the political hopes of the Scotts. The Chamberlain report to Congress was a fatal blow to Mr. Irving M. Scott. The State will never send to the Senate a man accused of having sandbagged the Government. Heretofore the Scotts have thought that they should be made admirals because the Oregon managed to get around the Horn without going to the bottom. They regarded that as the greatest achievement in American history. Senator Perkins must have been happy when the Chamberlain report was read. At the time of the launching of the Ohio in the presence of Mr. McKinley, the Scotts ignored Senator Perkins. They did not invite him to the boat that conveyed the President to the launching, or even to the grand stand. He was obliged to hire a tug.

Connoisseurs of perfect goods appreciate "Jesse Moore" Whiskey for its purity and delightful flavor. It is without a peer.

Sproule's Latest Bon Mot

According to the Examiner there are no wits left in the Bohemian Club. Though I believe the club to be top-heavy with dullards and bores, I do not agree with the sweeping assertion of that journal. I know at least half a dozen Bohemian Club wits who are capable of saving any jinks from a frost. William Sproule, the railroad man, is one of them. He is a noted epigrammatist and more than one bon mot of Sproule's has gone into literature. The other day he was invited to join "The Family," the new club of distinguished wits which is epected by some to extinguish the glory of the Bohemian Club. He begged to be excused saying, "I hope I am not yet in the family way."

Presents Galore

The Salisbury-Boardman engagement has made great opportunities for the social climber. All those who have ever been invited to Mrs. Salisbury's dances or who have any friends to hope to be are sending in beautiful engagement presents. By the time the wedding is over the Salisbury home will look like a combination of Hammersmith & Field's, Gump's and the White House. Mr. Salisbury, by the way, has been found. I once wrote of him as the lost Mr. Salisbury for he never attended any of his wife's functions. The reason, I understood, is that he has a profound contempt for society. Mrs. Salisbury is a devoted wife.

An Artist's Luck

The story comes my way of how a Californian colony in Paris made the fame of a poor artist. Gus Spreckels has a fad for pastels and one day while wandering in the Quartier Latin in the guise of a Cook tourist he stumbled into the squalid studio of a handsome fellow with whom he struck up a bargain. The artist agreed to paint the Spreckels' portrait for sixty dollars. That was the best bargain the millionaire ever made in Paris. The portrait was completed after a few sittings, and it was so good that Mrs. Spreckels decided to pose for a full length portrait. Hers was the sensation of her friends, and then the Spreckels children sat. Meanwhile the artist discovered that he had a good thing and began raising his prices. Mrs. Fred Sharon sat for him next, and then came the children of Mrs. Will Tevis. Finally Mrs. Will Tevis decided to have her portrait painted, and by that time the prosperous artist became a high-priced chap. Mrs. Tevis was charged eight hundred dollars. "I suppose," she said, "he charges me double because I am twice as large as any of you." The artist became the envy of his fellows of the brush and now he is pointed out as the man who "trouvait son Amerique in Paris."

The Luscious Menu

It is said that San Francisco originated the "ladies' luncheons" which have become so popular a form of entertainment in other cities than our own. It is certainly a most convenient way to entertain. What constitutes a successful gastronomic function these days? Is it elegance of the "table furniture," or the excellence of the menu provided for the guests? To illustrate my meaning I give herewith a scrap overheard in a street car yesterday. Two of our prettiest buds were speaking:

"Say, girls, I was at a real elegant lunch party yesterday. Why, we ate off plates that cost thirty dollars apiece."

"Yes, but what did you get to eat?"

"Oh, we were too busy looking at the china to think of what was placed upon it, but come to think of it, it was the same old things, salted almonds and salads in every variety, but I tell you there was lots to drink."

The Will Reveals the Man

The will of Cecil Rhodes was a remarkable document, and will stimulate inquiry for years into the character, motives and purposes of one of the most potent, dramatic and interesting figures in the history of the British Empire. Cecil Rhodes was never in this country; his mind seemed to be taken up with the great empire he was building in the African wilderness, and no one supposed that he cared a tinker's imprecation about this American nation. Yet, his will provides that two Americans from each State and Territory shall be eligible to study at Oxford. Five scholarships for Germans to be nominated by Emperor William are also established. The motive of this plan is explained in a codicil—"A good understanding between England, Germany and the United States will secure the peace of the world and educational relations form the strongest tie." This paragraph indicates that Cecil Rhodes was a friend of peace. Yet he is generally regarded as the incarnation of force to further ambition. Most of the civilized world believes that he was the personal and compelling force in one of the bloodiest and most deplorable conflicts in history. The historian and the politician will quarrel forever over his policy and his methods.

As a Friend Knew Him

I once met a personal friend of Rhodes, who told me that he was not the sort of a fellow most people imagined, and the will of Rhodes surely presents that remarkable character in a new light. According to his friend, Rhodes was neither crafty nor sullen; he was straightforward, bluff and affable. He had many powerful political enemies in Europe, and when brought into contact with them he invariably treated them with marked courtesy. It seemed as though his big projects absorbed his attention and that he had no time for wreaking revenge. The memory of Rhodes will be execrated by many, but that he was a man of genius, of powerful personality and greatness of soul must always be admitted.

The American Girl through British Eyes

A London weekly which is generally regarded as the organ of the royal family expresses the fear that one result of the American invasion for the Coronation will be the "Americanization" of the English girl. While admitting that the American girl is for many things to be envied, the writer says: "It seems probable that the average Englishman will have to be educated up to the transformation of the cultured, well-bred English girl into the young woman who talks about poppa and momma, eats candy morning and night, talks much and unquietly, is untidy in the morning and defies Mrs. Grundy by taking her best boy alone to the theatre and up the river. The decay of the chaperon will give a decided impetus to the process of Americanization, but the modern English girl will do well to think twice before she exchanges the refinement, quiet grace and amiability which have so long been her national characteristics, for the independent, and hail-fellow-well-met manners of her American contemporaries."

Miss Livingstone's Mission

A clever and subtle young woman whose cards read "Adelaide C. Livingstone" has spent a month in San Francisco doing the Paris stunt, lorgnetting our prize beauties and offering as the apple of reward a golden chance of being immortalized between the covers of a book on "Types of Beautiful American Society Women." Without absolutely committing herself, Miss Adelaide C. Livingstone gave society to understand that she belonged to the New York family of that name which of course pedigreed her at once. Miss Livingstone did not go about her work like the ordinary tyro in the book canvassing trade. She managed to win the ear of a wealthy and influential matron who gave her notes of introduction to our local Venuses. Miss Livingstone is herself a woman of much beauty and more personal magnetism. She has the slender, posteresque figure of the hour and knows how to swathe it in stunning gowns. The society people whom she met declared that she had an "air" that always indicates blue blood. Her English had a Parisian tang—a combination of frisky r's, and Frenchy shoulders that spoke of long residence abroad. Miss Livingstone acknowledged that she had spent much time in the art galleries of Europe. Was she an artist? "No-o, no-o, no-o!" She had studied art to understand, not to create. She modestly confessed that criticisms that dripped from her pen were much sought after by foreign journals. "Voila! when an American Societe"—not a soulless mercenary publishing house, mark you, but a "Societe" whose object is to spread the Greek worship of beauty—conceived the idea of a book, they selected Miss Adelaide C. Livingstone and her cultured eyes to pick the fair ones worthy of such distinction.

Money No Object

Six of them Miss Livingstone was to choose from San Francisco. Money she declared would not buy even a back page in this volume of beauties. It was to be an exquisite edition de luxe printed for no sordid reasons. Miss Livingstone met most of the women in the smart set and there is no doubt that she managed to hypnotize the required six. There will be but five hundred copies of the book printed, so the Types of Beautiful American Society Women will not decorate marble top parlor tables. Miss Livingstone made so sure of her quarry before she touched on the financial subject that only the six subscribers of all those with whom she discussed the subject have any idea of the price demanded for the honor. However, one young woman, whom she must have thought safely baited, declares that from hints Miss Livingstone dropped to her, at least five hundred dollars was asked. No amount of coaxing would make Miss Livingstone divulge the names of the beauties whom she had "selected." She indignantly denied that any tax whatsoever was levied on them and declared that the "Societe" was shouldering the entire cost and would sell each "beauty" not more than two books, if they cared for them, but there would be nothing obligatory. I suppose the other volumes are to be distributed among the nobility of Europe with a view of facilitating match-making with American heiresses. Miss Livingstone has gone to Cincinnati which city is to have only two representatives. How interesting it would be to know the personnel of San Francisco's bevy of beauty and—sotto voce—how much it cost them.

A New Boss

With Tirey L. Ford at the head of the legal department of the street railroads syndicate another factor in the gubernatorial campaign must be reckoned with by the politicians who are calculating on continuing Henry T. Gage in office. Mr. Ford is not of the Gage forces. There has been friction between the Attorney-General's office and the Executive Department, and Ford's friends have talked of sending him into the convention against Gage. Of course, Mr. Ford will now devote some attention to the organization of a political bureau. The railroad officials may assert that they intend to keep the corporation out of politics, but Mr. Ford will not neglect their interests. A political bureau is an essential adjunct to a well regulated law department of a big corporation under our beneficent American form of government. If the street railroads company should decide to oppose Gage it would exercise considerable influence. No corporation is capable of concentrating greater power at the polls.

An Anecdote of Stebbins

The late Dr. Horatio Stebbins was a broad-gauged clergyman, and one of the most popular divines ever in this city. He was a man of kind heart and generous impulses. Some years ago William Cousins, the aged sexton of the First Unitarian church fell ill, and about that time Dr. Stebbins learned that there was a mortgage on the sexton's home and that it was about to be foreclosed. At the conclusion of the service one Sunday morning, Dr. Stebbins told his congregation the story of the old sexton's hard luck. Then he took up the contribution box and called upon the members of the congregation to contribute liberally. He paced the aisles himself, and succeeded in collecting enough money to settle the old man's indebtedness.

Relics of a Campaign

If Horace Davis had been elected Mayor of this city when he sought that honor he would surely have given us an economical administration. Judging from the following sent me in a letter from far-off Tokio, Davis believes that the success of a business depends upon a hungry attention to details. "The other day over in the Shiba district of this city I noticed a shop with an awning made by sewing together a number of flour sacks. Each flour sack was inscribed with the following words: 'Vote for Horace Davis.' These sacks are, I suppose, relics of a political campaign in your city. I wonder whether Davis was elected and gave away the sacks, or was defeated and sold them cheap."

The McNears' Social Campaign

When the McNears folded up their tents in Oakland and came to this side, it was a subject of comment whether they would just stay until after Fred's marriage with Georgie Hopkins or whether they meant to work for a permanent niche in the San Francisco smart set. The news that they have taken the Eyre place near Menlo for the coming season means that they have really said "shake a deydey" to Oakland. To argue their success from the attentions that they have shared with Georgie Hopkins during her engagement, would be false reasoning. For now that Georgie and Fred are in Europe it is not likely that the McNears Sr. will be given much of a social boost by the Hopkins-Taylor contingent. The Eyre place which the McNears will occupy neighbors the Hopkins family home where Helen Taylor and her husband spend the summer, while the Will Taylors have their own place at Burlingame. So the McNears will be geographically within the sacred radius but there are still social battles for them to wage and win. The Taylor boys have rather enlarged ideas of their own status which the marriage into the Hopkins family did not tend to decrease. And it is believed that the notion prevails in the Taylor circle that Georgie's marriage to a McNear lacked the social lustre of mating with a Taylor. They no doubt felt that there would be danger of pricking their fingers in pulling thorns out of the McNear path. I have heard it suggested that if the McNears were better grounded in social tactics they would have waited until Fred and his bride returned before making their bid for Blingum's social favor.

A Wedding Predicted

The matchmakers have pounced on Therese Morgan and are persistently coupling her name with that of a popular clubman whose divorce is still green. Shortly after the decree was granted his ex-wife's engagement with a prominent young doctor was announced but their marriage has not yet taken place. Therese has an independent spirit and will undoubtedly marry the husband of her choice. There is no doubt that Mr. Morgan would have seriously objected to a son-in-law who was not a "sod" widower. Mr. Morgan kept a tight checkrein on his family and was not elated over the choice of his son Horace. Even before her father's death Therese accepted the devoirs of the clubman and since then they have been seen so frequently together that the gossips predict a wedding.

Miss Tobin's Fad

When Agnes Tobin left for Paris she said that she meant to add as many bizarre and curious old pieces of jewelry to her collection as her purse would permit and as the Tobin coffers are wide and deep she will bring back a goodly number to startle her friends with. For Miss Tobin does not lock these reliques away in cabinets but frequently adorns her person with them. A friend of the Tobins was once surprised by a visit from Agnes dressed with innumerable chains of rare workmanship; her breast studded with antique brooches and a bizarre belt with dangling folderols completing the amazing costume. It was her friend's day at home so several guests were also treated to this strange vision. Miss Tobin seemed oblivious of the sensation she was creating. "I love a tea gown," was her only apology, and then, catching a lady's startled eye fastened on her jewels she laughingly said, "You think I look like a cabinet of curios escaped from a museum but jewels that have a history are the only jewels I care to wear." She told them some of the stories of her curios and held their interest for hours. Miss Tobin has undoubtedly the finest collection of historical jewels in San Francisco and augmented by those she will bring back with her, the collection should rank with any in the country.

A Very "Large" Wedding

Considerable space was given in the dailies this week to the elaborate wedding of Miss Margaret Costello, a very charming young woman, and Mr. William J. O'Brien, a popular young man and a sweet singer of local fame. The social editor of a daily declared that "it was one of the largest weddings of the week," and no doubt it was. From the standpoint of pomp and ceremony it was was about as "large" a function as ever took place in a local church. It had all the glitter and splendor of a Blingum function. It will be the subject of enthusiastic discussion in Ashbury Heights' society for months to come. And Ashbury Heights' society knows a swell wedding when it sees it. It is a transplanted society, is that of Ashbury Heights, having with the dawn of affluence moved to the hill from south-of-the-slot. It is only a little more recent than that of Pacific Heights and perhaps a little less exclusive, but it loves pomp and circumstance and gossip and all the other concomitants of a well-regulated social push. Billy O'Brien, the groom, is popular in Ashbury Heights' social circles. His sweet tenor voice has been heard in many a plush parlor on the hill, and it was thought that he could have had his pick of half a dozen heiresses in that aristocratic centre. Indeed he was betrothed to one of them, but the engagement was broken off and there were rumors of his engagement to several others.

He Captured an Heiress

Miss Margaret Costello, having won so popular a young man, is deserving of felicitation. But the congratulations should not be all on one side, for in capturing a beautiful and cultured girl, Mr. O'Brien won for a wife a charming heiress. And he is a man of comparatively humble station. The dailies stated that he was "associated in business with his father," but now, I understand, he is to represent the interests of his mother-in-law in the dry goods house of O'Connor, Moffatt & Co. He has had no experience in that line, however, for his father's business is that of a saloon-keeper, and the popular William tended bar for him. Therefore am I of the opinion that the congratulations should not be all on one side. If the sweet singer had been a Blingum polo player, instead of an humble bartender, he could not have had a more elaborate wedding. The ceremony was preceded by a full nuptial mass. There was a special choir for the occasion and at the offertory William McDonald sang the "Ave Maria." There were bridesmaids galore and prominent Ashbury Heights' citizens acted as ushers, so it was indeed a very large wedding. The future home of the happy young couple is at 525 Ashbury street.

The Cop and the Kopje

Mr. Grant Carpenter, the newspaper man who fell in love with and married Sannie Krueger, the niece of Oom Paul, has returned from his South-African trip minus the object of his search, but with stories enough to make him most desired as a dinner companion. Mrs. Carpenter owned large droves of cattle in the Boer country, and it was the cattle for which Mr. Carpenter went in search. He found them, too, but in such a metamorphosed state he would have had to bring several regiments of the British army with him to get his cattle away. The live stock fortune had been quite literally eaten up by the English forces. On his arrival in the Boer country, Mr. Carpenter was immediately shadowed by an English secret-service agent. "I told him I was an American citizen," says Mr. Carpenter, "and he declared that Americans were nearest his heart. I told him that I was a theatrical man, and he swore undying adoration for me. I told him in despair that I was a spy, and putting his hand on my shoulder, he declared in whispered confidence that he also was one. It was all of no use. That fellow stayed with me and hunted cattle with me, and helped me place indemnity charges against his own government; slept outside my door, and opened the government mail-box when I had deposited my mail therein.

"America," concludes Mr. Carpenter, "is truly the land of the free. In America, if a man takes after you, you run for a cop; in Africa you run for a kopje."

A Distinguished Globe-Trotter

The dailies missed a good story last week when they let James Pinnock of Liverpool and London slip through their fingers. He calls himself a merchant and a globe-trotter by profession, but he is also acknowledged one of the greatest living authorities on matters pertaining to Western Africa. He spent over forty years of his life in that part of the dark continent and was responsible for opening to the world the region drained by the Rio Forcados, one of the principal tributaries of the great Niger river. In company with Sir Richard Burton he explored the Niger beyond the Socatee country and science and commerce benefited richly by the expedition. Mr. Pinnock left here on the last Honolulu steamer, after spending three weeks in San Francisco. He is on a tour of the world, having left London in October last, and since visiting the West Indies and Mexico. He came here from Honolulu. After leaving Honolulu he will go to Samoa and visit the old home of Robert Louis Stevenson, who was a dear friend. Thence, across the Pacific to Australia, and home by the way of the Straits Settlements. He is well on in years, but can not resist the fascination of traveling. This interesting old gentleman is very wealthy and is a large stockholder in American railroads and steamship companies. His brother-in-law, Sir Alfred L. Jones, is said to be the largest individual shipowner in the world.

Four Leaf Clovers Needed

I am informed that Neville Castle, who married Mrs. Salisbury's niece, Mary Scott, is in Council City and that he has not been able to shake off the ill luck that appears to have marked him for its own of late years. The Scotts have had all kinds of bad luck. Laura and her sister, who went to Washington, D. C., some time ago, found it anything but easy to storm society at the Nation's capital, without a good income. Their brother, Lieutenant H. H. Scott, on his small salary could not of course help them out. Austin Scott, another of the family, after a series of misfortunes at Nome and all the way down the coast, finally reached Honolulu where his brother "Tod" is expected to look him up a job. Tod had a hard time himself until he secured a position with Williams, Dimond & Co. He has all the grit that characterizes his better known relative and did not consider it beneath his dignity to work his way to the islands as a "hasher" on the Sierra.

They Fostered Independence

Perhaps perfect harmony prevails in the California Club, and the ladies are now on the most amicable terms, but one of them remarked to me the other day that the leaders of the opposition were not discouraged in the least by the recent election. "We fought for incorporation," she said, "and we won. Moreover, we polled a large vote, and it is now understood that there will be two tickets in the field every year. We fostered a spirit of independence and it is bound to develop for the best interests of the club."

The ladies interested in the management of the California Eye and Ear Hospital intend giving a tea next Thursday at the Sorosis Club. The ladies are deserving of much credit for the good work they have done through this institution, which they have conducted most successfully.

Dodge's Oversight

My attention has been called to the fact that S. W. Rosenstock bequeathed one thousand dollars to the Children's Hospital, and that Henry L. Dodge, who was a trustee of the institution, didn't leave it a cent. Mr. Dodge believed no doubt that in serving as a trustee he had rendered sufficient service to the institution.

Matrons to have Full Sway

This summer Burlingame will enjoy the unique distinction of being a girl-less Eden. The sweet young things will be as rare there as good manners. All the marriageable girls have gone to the altar and even the younger set who are still too verdant and vealy to count will summer elsewhere. Charlotte Wilson goes to the islands with the Irwins. She and Elena Irwin have an adolescent passion for each other that has earned them the sobriquet of "Milly Christine." The other girls just out of the "pigtail" period but not yet buds, are East or in Europe where they are being sandpapered into shape for the smart set. Now that Mary Crocker, Mary Scott and Caro Crockett card themselves matrons, Blingum cannot hope for any summer romances, for Cupid will find nary a target for his arrows. With the Hopkins girls married and Miss Eyre in Europe, Menlo Park will be just about as barren of material for the matchmakers; and down Redwood way there are only the Josslyns left, for the Preston girls have been going like the proverbial hot cakes. It will be essentially a young-matron summer and therefore much gayer than the girly-girly season. Married women have privileges and prerogatives that make for unrestrained enjoyment. There is therefore a good crop of gossip in prospect for Madame Grundy. Several flirtations of the more serious variety are in embryo now and should come to a climax in the dolce far niente days of June.

Going to the Coronation

Mr. D. W. Kirkland, president of the Owl Drug Company and manager of their Los Angeles Branch, has been in San Francisco the past ten days, and he leaves shortly on his long contemplated trip around the world. Mr. R. E. Miller, secretary and manager of the company, will join him in New York in June, when both will sail for London on the "Kaiser der Wilhelm de Grosse." They will reach London in time for the Coronation of Edward VII. After that they will leave for the Continent, spending the month there. Mr. Miller will join his wife and niece, Miss Anna Cowperthwaite, who have been six months at Lucerne, and he will accompany them home.

A Lingerie Fad

The latest fad is to adopt one color for the lingerie and to affect no other. It should be a shade that harmonizes with your name if possible and the Roses and Lilies and Marguerites have all taken the cue. Olive Holbrook is said to have pioneered the fad and uses nothing but ribbons of olive green tint. If the name does not suggest a hue, one that suits the complexion may be adopted. The fad is said to have reached out to the men's wardrobes. Frank Carolan has always objected to being called "Pinkie" but it may furnish him a tint now.

A New Club for Honolulu

Hawaii's capital is to have a new club, and it is to be composed of the young bloods of Honolulu. The Pacific Club is the swellest organization of its kind in Honolulu but it is controlled by the old bucks who, like the same species in our Pacific-Union, love to sit at the window and sigh for the days that have flown. Young men annoy them and are barred. So the younger element of the town with Prince Cupid and Prince David in the forefront has decided on organizing a new club and securing a home more handsome and inviting than that of the Pacific.

Effective Satire

A society matron, the wife of a well-known broker, dismissed a servant recently and in her place obtained an Irish lass, who said that she had "come over" three year ago. The dometic that had been discharged had left things in a very untidy state and especially the front stairs. Her mistress told her that she wished she would wash them off as soon as she could, and before the afternoon was old.

"If you please, ma'm, mayn't I wait until tonight, or do it tomorrow morning?" was the girl's unexpected answer.

"Are you sick?" asked the matron, very much surprised.

"Oh, no, but I don't want my friends to see me."

"Well, don't worry, my girl, about that," said her employer, reassuringly. "Your friends are all in their banks and offices at this time of the day."

This bit of satire had the desired effect. The steps were washed before night.

But it Will Take Place

It would most certainly appear that to use the words of the prayer book, the Oelrichs-Martin wedding day is a "moveable feast." The way the date for that auspicious event flies about is surprising. Various reasons have been assigned by those professing to know for this constant postponing of the happy day, but I have assured them, and I know whereof I speak, that the nuptials will hang fire till the old lady comes down with Mamma Oelrichs' required dot. In society circles generally it has grown to be a sort of Hamlet soliloquy, "To be or not to be," but like the release of the Stone party from the brigands, no doubt the splicing of this devoted young couple will some day be accomplished.

When the Nicolay-Hay-Lincoln biography was published, illustrated by reproductions of the physiognomies of every one obtainable who had ever "passed the time of day" with any of the Lincoln family, we thought we had reached the end and limit of absurdity. The Bookman, in exploiting the Balzac-De Hanska episode at length, illustrated of course, one of the pictures was that of "Balzac's tailor" with his head out of the window. It passes comprehension what possible bearing the man has on the subject, but it is one more picture at all events.

Miss Virginia Foltz, who sprained her ankle so seriously a short time ago that it necessitated an operation, has recovered from the consequent illness and is now visiting Mrs. Dr. Lull at Palo Alto.

Kathryn Kidder has revived "The Country Girl" and is starring in it. Her idea will be interesting to contrast with that of Florence Roberts which we so lately saw.

The First Court

A San Franciscan now in London writes to TOWN TALK of the first formal court of King Edward and Queen Alexandra.

The first evening Court of England's new King and Queen was more successful than any one had expected. Those who clung to the old tradition of daylight Drawing Rooms threw their prejudices to the winds and frankly confessed that the evening affair was far more brilliant in every respect. It was a nasty night, windy and rainy, but nobody seems to mind stormy nights however much they grumble when the days are dark and dreary. In Queen Victoria's time, the strings of carriages, with the women wearing low frocks and ugly necks, bared to the daylight's cruel glare, were not always a pretty sight. And the debutantes, after being stared at for hours by multitudes who did not hesitate at making audible remarks about their charms or lack of them, were often so nervous when they reached the royal presence that they could scarcely go through the ordeal without danger of a fainting spell at its conclusion.

The evening Court made everything easy. After a good dinner, with nerves lulled to rest, a drive through the dark streets landed the guests at the palace. If the weather had not been so shocking, there would likely have been a larger crowd of gaping populace hanging about the entrance; as it was only a handful of spectators appeared to stare and these were certainly courageous for it was raining guns and they were soon wet to the skin.

The arrangements for the Court differed slightly from those in vogue at the late Drawing Rooms. The ceremonial was about the same. The women passed each in turn but made but two courtesies, one to the King, the next to the Queen, who stood beside him. Edward VII wore his uniform of an English field-marshal, his breast brilliant with orders and decorations. The Queen looked beautiful in white satin covered with mousseline-de-soie appliqued in Brussels and rose-point lace, with embroidery of roses in silver paillettes and diamonds. The train, attached to the shoulder, formed a Venetian mantle, an overmantle of lace and embroidery matching the gown. All over the train, which was cut square and very long, were many tiny silver paillettes. The lining of cream satin and silver spangled mousseline was brought round the train's edge, forming a border in the shape of roses. The bodice was square, with small V in front filled in with white tulle and lace. The sleeves were short and of tulle with three diamond straps. Alexandra wore the Garter and other orders, a crown and parure of diamonds. Though she is by no means a large woman she looked every inch a Queen, charming and dignified.

Though mourning is now out of order, the Queen's two sisters-in-law wore half-mourning as is but proper. They wore exquisite jewels, however. The Princess of Wales was in white satin adorned with large diamond-shaped appliques of jeweled lace, beneath which showed glimpses of an underskirt of cream silk edged with cream rose-petals. The bodice was caught up at one side by a bunch of white poppies with diamond hearts. Her Royal Highness's train of silver tissue had an outer drapery of priceless lace which formerly belonged to the Duchess of Teck; the lining of white chiffon was bordered with chiffon roses with diamond hearts. Her parure was composed of diamonds, turquoises and pearls.

Princess Victor of Hohenlohe wore a rather fetching combination of black and mauve, the black velvet train lined with satin of a wisteria shade. The black satin bodice was embroidered in steel. The Duchess of Portland was in cream satin and silver tulle; the Duchess of Devonshire wore black lace embroidered in steel and jet. The Duchess de Moulas was in white and silver, a red ribbon crossing her bodice sparkling with orders. Baroness de Ramel wore gold embroidered mousseline de soie. Mrs. Choate, in whom we Americans are naturally interested, wore a pink satin gown trimmed with rare lace and black velvet nasturtiums sparkling with diamonds. Madame d'Acos, lady in waiting of the Empress Eugenie, was in black satin and gauze. Lady Landsdowne's stomacher of diamonds was magnificent. In fact, the jewels worn at this Court were more striking and in greater profusion than I have ever seen before in one gathering, even at the New York Horse Show or the grand opera.

If the Court as a whole did not differ largely from Queen Victoria's Drawing Rooms, there was one innovation that seemed to please old and young alike. This was the serving of refreshments. After the presentation to their Majesties, adjournment was taken to the Green drawing room or the Garter room, where refreshments of a light nature were served to the weary dowagers, matrons and buds. The ices were served in nougat baskets shaped like fruits and ornamented with sugared foliage. The salads were dressed with the famous Royal mayonnaise, the secret of which King Edward prizes so highly.

No longer will unmarried women be permitted to attend the Courts, after their first presentation. They may attend Court balls and concerts, but not the Courts. The spinsters have registered a protest against this dictum.

Style and Fit in Home-Made Garments

"That suit was never made outside of New York," remarked a traveled woman, who was examining the models of ladies' tailored garments in the workrooms of the M. J. Keller Co., 1028-1030 Market street, the other day. The suit had Style written in every seam. It was exquisitely finished and of a modish cut. It was made in San Francisco by the Keller Co.'s workmen, who are artists in their line. The Keller Co. makes a specialty of its tailored suits and shirtwaists, for men and women, and the prices are very moderate considering the beautiful workmanship and finish.

Zola is tabu in Australia. Not only is the introduction of his books into the colony prohibited, but the editions in the hands of book sellers are seized as unfit for circulation. Zola has been coming into favor in England of late years, and large editions of his books in translation have been issued. Of course it was expected that a proportional quantity of the output would be disposed of in Australia, and provision was made accordingly, but this attitude of the colonists will make the overplus of the editions a dead loss to the publishers.

The Simple Facts

The Cactus Oil Company wants to sell stock. C. A. Hutchinson, financial agent, says of the company: "Our first well is down nearly 800 feet and is in oil. We will have a flowing well in the next thirty days. Our second well is down over 300 feet and will also soon be a producer. We own in fee simple 1,928 acres in the Carrizo Creek district, San Diego county. Oil in paying quantities is found here at a depth of 800 to 900 feet, and the highest grade refining oil." The stock is for sale at 12 cents a share, and the public is reminded that, "The company is not selling stock to start work." This seems reasonably certain, and also that it is selling stock to make money. The fact is there is not a producing well in the whole of San Diego county, and that the company's land is desert, with a crop of cactus and nothing else.

The Concord Crude Oil Company is after investors. It has taken up the old Rodeo Company's property, formerly held by the Eastern Consolidated Oil Company. The Concord Company claims to own 117 acres. Its literature falsifies the facts and is written solely to bait a trap for investors who know nothing of the oil situation. The Concord Company is trying to sell bonds in the East, for the purpose of paying for the land at the rate of $1,000 an acre, and also for the purpose of building a refinery. The land sold for $520 an acre not long ago, and there has been no development to enhance the price since. Like the Eastern Consolidated Oil Company which induced a great many people to put money into its stock, the Concord Company offers no opportunity for speculators to make a profit.

Oil shares came in for some little attention during the week and business on the Exchange was fairly interesting. There was a flurry in Petroleum Center and several thousand shares changed hands. Prices were forced up rapidly from 7c. to 14c. but with the liberal offering of stock by holders endeavoring to realize a profit at the advance there was a recession to 10c., with buyers' wants more than liberally supplied. Sterling and Sovereign were fairly active stocks at steady prices and quite a few Home shares were disposed of at a trifle lower rate. The Standard Oil Company has purchased about 50,000 barrels of oil in the Los Angeles field which greatly relieved the pressure on the Southern market.

Sales on the Oil Exchange last week were $142,599 shares valued at $58,198, the leading sales being as follows: Bear Flag, 4,500 shares; Four, 1,900; Home, 1,675; Independence, 3,000; Junction, 6,300; Petroleum Center, 81,875; Superior, 1,800; Lion, 2,000; Oil City, 2,000; Sovereign, 5,750; Reed, 1,000; Occidental, 3,900; Sterling, 25,175.

Stocks and Bonds

Bonds continued to lead in point of demand on the Stock and Bond Exchange during the past week while trading in general shares has been rather light and mostly confined to a few of the leading industrials. The liberal and rather extraordinary activity in bonds is attributed to the seeking investment for most of the money obtained by the consummation of the Market-street Railway deal. Investors have been partial to Sacramento Electric Gas and Railway 5 per cent bonds and trading in these has been the feature of the various sessions during the week. Values have steadily increased from $96.50 to $102 and the general tendency is towards a further improvement. Many of the leading railroad bonds changed hands at good figures and prices have been well sustained. The settlement of rates and the prospects of a dividend have caused investors to turn to Spring Valley shares as a desirable security and prices hardened a trifle and ruled firm at $93.50. Alaska Packers' Association shares were in favor and the moderate lots offered ruled strong with $162 bid. Both California Wine Association and California Fruit Canners' shares were steady at $100 and $103.25 respectively and several fairly large blocks of stocks were sold. Improvements in many of the canneries of the latter institution are in progress and with prospects for a good demand for the output indications are quite favorable for an improvement in values for shares. Pacific Gas Improvement shares were a trifle firmer and some fair trading was recorded during the past few days. The 3,000 shares of the unissued stock of the company, which was offered to the stockholders by the directors through a circular letter at $36 a share, the subscriptions to be based upon one share for every ten held, have all been sold and paid for. Large stockholders were the principal buyers. This action increases the amount of issued stock from 32,000 shares to 35,000. The authorized capital is $5,000,000, in 50,000 shares. Sugar stocks have been dull and featureless and prices have shown no material fluctuations. Sales of Oceanic Steamship Company were small with values a trifle easier. There were no offers to sell the moderate lots of Market-street Railway shares still held, and buyers were bidding $100 strong. A dividend on the old stock for the quarter ending with March 31st was payable Thursday. The rate is sixty cents a share the same as heretofore.

As a mark of respect from his late fellow members, George F. Bowman, one of the charter members of the Stock and Bond Exchange, who recently sold his seat to Fred S. Knight, was presented with an elegant loving cup at the close of last Saturday's session. President Pollitz made the presentation speech in which he paid warm tribute to the retired broker.

A meeting of the stockholders of the Oakland Transit Company has been called for June 10th to take action on the proposition to create a bonded indebtedness of $6,000,000 to take up old issues and provide for improvements. It is reported that an additional bond issue will be made later by the ferry company.

The one hundredth consecutive dividend of the Alaska Packers' Association is payable today. Ninety-seven of these dividends were at 75c. a share and the last three at $1, making a total of $75.75 paid on a share since the declaring of dividends.

The stocks and bonds of the United Railways of San Francisco are reported in strong demand on the Wall street curb and indications are that with the listing of securities on the New York Exchange eastern capitalists will invest freely. The prices ruling on the street at present are as follows: $23.87½

The Sacramento Electric Company

In connection with the increased demand for the 5 per cent bonds of the Sacramento Electric, Gas and Railway Company during the past two weeks there are several rumors current on the street. One of these is that a prominent investor in street railway securities has offered $40 per share for a controlling interest in the stock of the company. Whether this is true or not the rumor has not materially affected the selling price of the company's securities. During the past week there has been a slight advance in the price of these shares but it has not attained a prominence beyond what could be readily considered the ordinary business fluctuation from day to day. The outstanding capital stock of this company is $1.853.200 at par value. The corporation has, however, $265.000 first mortgage 6 per cent bonds as a funded debt of the Central Electric Railway Company and $2.250.000 5 per cent bonds of the Sacramento Electric, Gas and Railway Company which will mature in 1927. The trust deed provided for the retiring of any or all these bonds at $103 but on March 25th last the Board of Directors passed a resolution rescinding this clause. The properties of the company include the Folsom Water Power Company, with dam, canal and water rights on the American River; the Sacramento Electric Power and Light Company, with its plant at Folsom and its distributing service in Sacramento; the entire street railway service of Sacramento, comprising about 24½ miles of track, and 9.842½ shares out of a total issue of 10.000 shares of the Capital Gas Company, which, by the way, is the only gas plant in the city of Sacramento. For the twelve months ending January 31st, 1902, the gross earnings were $419,781.03 and the operating expenses were $195,266.38. To the latter, however, must be added certain fixed charges, aggregating $113.540.50. The net earning therefore,less $9,602.70 for the year were $101,371.45. At the close of the year 1901 the company hat a net surplus of $125.540.87 to its credit, so that after deducting $36,103.80 the total of dividends paid during the last fiscal year, there was still a net surplus of $190,808.52 on hand on February 1st, 1902.

The capital of the Union Trust Company was increased from $1.250.000 to $1.500.000 by an issue of 250 shares in addition to the 1.250 that were in existence. The new shares are to be issued with $800 paid up, the same as the balance, but as they are to be placed at $1.800 per share, the sale will add $250,000 to the company's large surplus. The demand for the new shares is brisk. —The Financier

English publishers are disappointed at the very limited sales made of the vast number of biographies, memoirs and other volumes concerning Queen Victoria, which were rushed through the presses in anticipation of an enormous demand. There is but a limited call for anything except the Harmsworth publication, which may be looked upon as official, inasmuch as it is written by the Duke of Argyle. It is too soon yet for any good work to have been put into shape, and, moreover, Queen Victoria was a wise woman. Judging by the advice she had given others, it is not unlikely that she made provision for deferring the history of her life and reign until its publication could have less effect on the living.

STAGE

The Cardinal

The sign of the cross is still one of the moving incidents at the Columbia theatre. It was a feature of "The Christian" last week when made by Episcopalian divines, and now we are having it done somewhat more solemnly by Mr. E. S. Willard in the red robes of a Cardinal. But the sign of the cross, even when combined with such other accessories as a few candles and a crucifix, is not sufficient to give atmosphere to a play. And that is what "The Cardinal" lacks. The play tells an interesting and somewhat melodramatic story, but Mr. Parker, the author, depends too much on dialogue. Yet "The Cardinal" is not lacking in interest. At times it is thrilling, even when the situations are forced. It was written around the confessional, that sacramental function having been introduced for the purpose of acquainting the Cardinal with the knowledge that subsequently enabled him to prove the innocence of his brother who was arrested for the murder of his fiancee's father. It is just a bit shocking, the incident of the murderer rushing red-handed, as it were, from the scene of the murder to the confessional and there getting absolution. His crime was a particularly revolting one, and was committed in a manner most cold-blooded, even for an up-to-date melodrama. His victim was the father of the girl whose hand he sought in marriage. In an interview lasting not more than two minutes he was refused and thereupon he plunged a stiletto into the old gentleman's body. The murderer acted as nonchalantly as though he killed a man every morning before breakfast, and yet he was a God-fearing man, for he immediately rushed off in search of absolution. Nor was he content with the ordinary absolution of a priest. He forced himself into the presence of the Cardinal, and in a few minutes he was absolved of his sin. Sensational novelists have told us of such things being done a few hundred years ago, but they are not convincing when done on the stage, especially when the churchman is not represented as a bad man. Giovanni de Medici, as portrayed by Mr. Willard, is a fine fellow and apparently a devout churchman, and it is hardly likely that he would have been so accommodating. The play is full of inconsistencies, but if you are in good humor you can swallow them and enthuse over Mr. Willard. He is one of the survivors of the old School of Thespians, and he has all the tricks of gesture and of posing that are so pleasing to the eye. He is surrounded by an adequate company. His leading lady, Miss Ellen O'Malley, is of pleasing manner.

"Madame Butterfly"

I have before spoken of the artistic acting of Juliet Crosby in "Madame Butterfly." If she never acted anything else in all her life, this one impersonation would stamp her an artist. Her characterization of the poor little Japanese wife in David Belasco's dramatization of John Luther Long's story, as observed in this week's revival of the play, is something to admire greatly. Miss Crosby is, first of all, intensely graphic. She gives a vivid picture of the wife in all her moods, ranging from joy to deepest despair. There is no suggestion of make-believe or mimicry. All is perfectly natural; pathetically—in the scene of the vigil—real. Miss Crosby's power of delineation is undoubtedly a natural gift, but this possession does not prevent her from being a finished actress.

"The Fortune Teller"

When Alice Neilsen presented "The Fortune Teller" at the Columbia it did not strike me as being much of an opera. It had a great part for Alice herself, and she practically ran the whole show, for like Charley's Aunt there never was a minute when she wasn't in it. But just as the Tivoli made a bright, snappy production of "The Ameer," which was nothing when Frank Daniels had it, the local people have managed to give "The Fortune Teller" a dash that was not in it originally. Anna Lichter in the dual role of Irma and Musette has of course none of Alice Neilsen's jolly little air that no one could possibly counterfeit successfully, but she is clever and fair to look upon nevertheless. Her fresh, pure and delightful voice is heard to fine advantage in the music of this role. Hartman, Webb and Cashman are eminently successful, both in make-up and action. Frances Graham as Vaninka has some good numbers, though the part is not such a strong one as was Dolores in "The Serenade." The only parts beside Miss Lichter's that give any chance for distinction are those of Ladislas and Sandor. Harold Gordon makes a fine Ladislas and sings all his music with admirable voice and expression. Arthur Cunningham has the part that was written for Cowles and his Sandor is one of the best things he has done at the Tivoli. Cunningham, however, can always be depended on to give a strong rendition of any role entrusted to him.

"Fiddle Dee Dee"

Fun is the main quality in the burlesque that is crowding Fischer's this week. Fun is a good thing. It drives away Dame Care. It sweetens life. Whether it is a new pun, a novel bit of horse-play or a joke that is unfamiliar, so that it strikes the risibles at the right time it is all right. And that is the way "Fiddle Dee Dee" seems to have struck San Francisco. The burlesque on the "Florodora" sextet is remarkably good, even coming after the many imitations of this song that we have seen, and which were in themselves burlesques. Maude Amber, the brunette Lillian Russell, is a picturesque and handsome Widow, and sings with plenty of dash. Lillian Coleman as usual sings and dances with capital spirit and good taste. Winfield Blake comes in for a few good songs and imposing entrances. But the comedians are the main thing after all. Comedians seem to be having it all their own way this season, from New York to Yokohama. Prime donne haven't a chance beside them. The "Fiddle Dee Dee" comedians are Kolb, Dill and Bernard who abound in unctuous comicalities. The chorus is of good size and robust voice and legs and the mounting alike in scenery and wardrobe is excellent.

Mr. Jones' Newest Play

Henry Arthur Jones' latest play, "The Princess's Nose," is not highly praised by the London critics. The story of the play tells how a Princess, finding that her husband is carrying on a liaison with Mrs. Malpas, who is a school-friend of hers, and that they have made arrangements to meet in Paris, determines to order Mrs. Malpas out of the house and to prevent the Prince from following her, as he intended to do. One act sets forth the means by which she endeavors to detain her husband and recapture his affections but, before he starts, the Princess is informed that an accident has happened to the brougham which was conveying Mrs. Malpas to the station, and that the result is a fractured nose. Now, the Princess's own nose had, at a previous period, been slightly irregular, it appears, and Mrs. Malpas, being her school-friend, had made capital of the fact. The Princess does not inform her husband of the accident, but allows him to proceed upon a journey which she knows will be futile, at the same time warning him that she may console herself during his absence. This threat is the more terrible because she has been pursued by the attentions of a Mr. Pyne. As may be imagined, the damage to Mrs. Malpas' nasal organ brings the Prince's affections back to his wife; Mr. Eglinton Pyne is sent off with a horse-whipping, and all ends as well as can be expected. The chief weakness of the play seems to be the lack of incident. Nothing actually occurs; everything is described in long conversations.

An American Girl Abroad

Since May Moore Duprez appeared in San Francisco at the Orpheum she has traveled nearly round the world and her circuit has been a series of triumphs. The little American girl's beauty, youth and talent have gained her friends everywhere. In Australia she was a prime favorite and now in the English music halls they star the "Special Expensive Engagement of the Charming American Specialty Artiste and Dancer." One English paper says of her: "A prime favorite at the Metropolitan is Miss May Moore Duprez. The quaint impersonation of a German girl, added to her spirited and graceful dancing, are so well appreciated that the audience recall her half a dozen times before they will allow her to really depart." "A merry little American artiste who fairly 'fetched' the house," writes another, and another says: "Loose-limbed and lithe, there seemed scarcely a movement of which she was not capable." One of London's best known critics wrote: "The best turn of the evening was that of a young American artist, Miss May Moore Duprez. Her German Girl ditty is a capital character sketch, full of quaint quips and touches of the nature which makes the whole world smile. And she dances delightfully."

Attractions Next Week

Columbia: One of the most charming comedies ever written, by J. M. Barrie, "The Professor's Love Story," with a plot "like a whiff of Heaven's fresh air," will be the offering for Mr. Willard's second week. "Tom Pinch" and "David Garrick" will follow, and the Goodwins come after Willard.

Grand Opera House: The fifth and next to last of the MacDowell-Stone Sardou season. "Fedora," showing Sardou in the modern, will give us MacDowell as Loris Ipanoff and Miss Stone in her splendid portrayal of the Princess Fedora. Edward Harrigan will be the next star to come to this theatre.

Alcazar: That most amusing farce comedy, never before given at popular prices, "Why Smith Left Home," should pack the house to the doors. Who can forget the inimitable cook-lady, the "clever girl," the rebellious Smith and the Trust?

Orpheum: A genuine novelty is promised in the original Pony ballet, eight in number, and direct from the Empire, London. These girls are pretty as pictures and take their title from their diminutive stature. They come from the Tiller training schools for dancers of London and Manchester. Of Sam, Kittie and Clara Morton, Sam is a comedian and dancer of unusual unction, Kittie is the lightest heavyweight devotee of terpsichore before the public and little Clara is a dainty comedianne. Banks Winter, the tenor-author of "White Wings,'" and his little daughter Winona, will have a clever turn. The Petching brothers in their "Musical Flower Garden," Miss Christine Towle, operatic soprano in the latest hits, will be new. The Clippers, James Cullen and Marie Wainwright will remain.

Fischer's: "Fiddle-Dee-Dee" having scored the expected hit, and engagements for seats extending far ahead of time, it will be continued. Burlesque has hit the popular taste, as I predicted when the new theatre opened.

Tivoli: The local interpretation of "The Fortune Teller" is evidently on for a run. Its second week is announced beginning next Monday.

The Central will have a great melodrama next week, "The Dangers of a Great City." —The Playgoer.

"The Battleground"

Since the "historical novel" has gained vogue it is with fear and trembling that one takes in hand anything dealing with Colonial or Revolutionary or Rebellion times. The topics have been used so often and so often ill-used that one is predisposed to expect another failure. It is therefore with feelings of fervid thankfulness that one discovers in Ellen Glasgow's new book, "The Battleground," something worth telling and well told. The Battleground is the Virginia of the war time, in and about Richmond, but the story is more that of domestic life than battle-fields. War and battles there are, but we are introduced, not to gorgeous uniforms and prancing steeds, flaunting banners and flashing blades. There is little of "the thunder of the captains and the shouting." We follow the footsteps of the private in the ranks on toilsome marches, with short rations and scant clothing, with hardship and hunger, wounds and defeat, coming home at the last to find his ancestral mansion a burned ruin and his fields and woods a battleground. Mrs. Glasgow has given us some delightful pictures of home life and the lavish hospitality of the antebellum aristocracy, kindly masters of contented slaves. It is well that such books should be written and that the pictures of the old-time gentry should be preserved for a doubting and scoffing generation. We may smile at the mincing gentility of Miss Lydia, who was shocked at the idea that any woman should use rouge. And the gentle Mrs. Ambler, who never thought in the whole of her life of wanting to do such a thing as take a walk by herself and who quoted the earlier time when "it was the custom for ladies to have delicate appetites in my day, you see; and I remember your grandma's amazement when Miss Pokey Mickleborough was asked at our table what piece of chicken she preferred, and she answered quite loudly,' Leg, if you please.' She was considered very indelicate by your grandma, who had never so much as tasted any part except the wing." And Mrs. Lightfoot, who clung to her shelf full of old novels, and could not be induced to read Dickens or Thackeray lest she should find herself associating with people whom she would not receive in her home. Yet, in the dark days of the Confederacy these women cheerfully gave up their luxuries and deprived themselves of necessaries for "our soldiers." They wore their linsey gowns and their homemade bonnets with as much grace as they had their satins and brocades, and presided over their sweet potato coffee with the same graciousness with which they dispensed their former magnificence. And of the men it can only be said that they were knightly and courteous gentlemen, worthy of their wives and daughters. The two girls, Virginia and Betty Ambler, are charming types of Southern belles, and all four of the children, as they are when they are introduced to us in the beginning of the book, are delightfully simple and natural. There is perhaps no child of the present generation who has any conception of the agonizing misery suffered by little eight-year old Betty on account of her red hair. One is irresistibly drawn to the tall soldier, nicknamed "Pinetop" from his unusual height, an illiterate mountaineer but staunch comrade with his simple wonder that soldiers from other states should fight so gallantly on Virginia soil. He was no slave owner, nor did he wish to be but he defended his state as he would his own door yard, from an instinctive feeling of loyalty and patriotism. There are masterly delineations of character throughout, both of the black slave and the white master, and the contrasting picture is given between the contented servant, fed, clothed and cared for and the free Negro, eking out a precarious existence in a land where there was nothing for him to do. "The Battleground" gives a different picture of the war from that contained in Mr. Cable's "Cavalier." That was the poetry, but this is the prose version. "The Voice of the People" was a vigorous piece of work and was appreciated by the reading public, which made it one of the most popular books of its day. "The Battleground" is a distinct advance upon the earlier work. In these days, when books are turned out so rapidly that no one can think of reading all even of the best, "The Battleground" should be marked to be read. The illustrations are in keeping with the rest. [Doubleday, Page & Co.]

The prize story in the Century competition for college graduates was printed in a recent number of that magazine. It almost goes without saying, in these days, that the action centres about a successful authoress, but the successful authoress is represented as bringing her masterpiece for inspection in a roll! It is not the first time this has been done, nor will it be the last, for even the veteran Howells has given us glimpses of his discouraged writer hopelessly wending his way from one editor to another with his roll of manuscript, though he does not hint that therein lay the cause for rejection. It is an old superstition amongst travelers that to roll up garments in packing trunk or bag is to "roll up trouble." Possibly superstition may have some effect upon the minds of would-be authors, but evidently injunction passes over their heads.

The Mercantile Library recently made a new departure with reference to that class of books which enjoy an inflated circulation for a few months, and then drop to the normal or below. An additional number of the volumes likely to be in great demand soon after their appearance will be supplied, and those impatient souls who cannot brook delay can have the privilege of satisfying their curiosity at a cost of ten cents a week. Mary Johnson's "Audrey" was the first book placed on the list. The idea would seem to be an excellent one—much better than that of not purchasing books until they are a year old, the alternative which is under discussion in the East. When there is a "waiting list" of from twenty-five to fifty, with requests registered, a considerable proportion of the number may be expected to be willing to pay a nominal sum for preferred places, and the additional volumes will thus be paid for by the people who make use of them without absorbing the revenue of the library.

Some years ago James Whitcomb Riley published a number of dialect verses of childhood, and thereby excited the wrath of the educator, who will insist upon the doleful exercise of "speaking pieces." The Riley verses suited the kids, and instead of coming prepared with selections from Longfellow or Tennyson they repeated the "Raggedy Man" and others of the same strain. Now Mr. Riley has produced another collection, and there is wrath in store for him as soon as "speaking day" comes round.

Book Booming

An article which is gaining considerable currency through reprint sets forth in satiric fashion the importance of the office of "book-boomer," and the idea of the writer thereof is to cast a slur upon the value of the principal literary magazines, which are all owned by publishing houses, and which are supposed to make use of their pages for the sole purpose of unduly praising the books which they themselves bring out. While it is undoubtedly true that inferior books are overlauded, it is patent to any one who reads the literary magazines that it is not from them, but rather from the reviewers of the daily press that the bulk of the adulation emanates. Neither the Critic, the Book-Man, the Book-Buyer, nor any other of the book-lovers' periodicals, give undue prominence to the books published by its proprietors, nor does any one of them refuse to notice, or in any way decry or treat unfairly, the products of any other house. This complaint of professional booming has been made so often within the last few years that one would like to know from whence it originates. If it is the cry of the disgruntled author, why in the name of common sense has he so little business acumen as not to take his productions to a firm which operates a "boomer," and so reap the advantage which he thinks he is deprived of? If it is a lament of rival publishers, there is no law to prevent them from starting a "boomer" for themselves. All they need do is to make it interesting and reasonably fair in the treatment of authors. Nothing is gained by this monotonous lamentation, which has too much of the flavor of sour grapes.

The Fannie Bloomfield Zeisler Recitals

The interest taken in the coming recitals of Fannie Bloomfield Zeisler is of the most enthusiastic nature. Even Paderewski or Hofmann has not more sincere admirers here than Mrs. Zeisler. Ever since her last visit here, she has been asked again and again when she would come for other recitals, and now the time has arrived. Her first program next Tuesday night will be: Prelude and Fuge, No. 2, C minor, Bach; Sonate, Op. 111, Beethoven; Menuetto (third movement from Fantasie, op. 78), Schubert; Marche Militaire, Schubert-Tausig; Nocturne, Op. 37, No. 2, Etude, Op. 25, No. 9, Valse, Op. 64, No. 2, Polonaise, Op. 53, Chopin; Deux Arabesques, Op. 45, Leschetisky; Andante Finale from "Lucia," Donizetti; Gondoliera, Op. 41, Impatience (No. 1 from Spring, Op. 57), Moszkowski; Valse, "Man lebt nur einmal," Strauss-Tausig. It will be interesting to note the difference in Mrs. Zeisler's interpretation of the Schubert-Tausig "Marche Militaire," which was one of Josef Hofmann's most stupendous feats. Numbers from Scarlatti, Beethoven, Chopin, Rubinstein, Raff, Dvorak, Lewy, Zarembski, Tschaikowski and Strauss-Schuett will be on Wednesday afternoon's program. On Thursday night Bach, Beethoven, Schubert-Liszt, Schumann, Chopin, Rubinstein and Godard will be interpreted, and the Paganini-Liszt "Campanella" etude will be the closing number. A splendid program, beginning with Schumann's Papillons, Op. 2, and ending with Moszkowski's "Caprice espagnol," will be given next Saturday afternoon at the final recital at Metropolitan hall.

Mr. H. O. Fox of Chicago will give a series of Cecilian concerts next week at Byron Mauzy hall, opening on the twenty-sixth, matinee and evenings. Tickets can be had by calling at Byron Mauzy's, 308-310 Post street.

The program of the final concert at the Hopkins Institute Thursday evening was of especial interest and included numbers by Miss Elena Roeckel, contralto; Mr. Jack Harris, tenor; Miss Louise A. Levy, cornet; Miss Frances R. Wertheimer, pianist; Professor Joseph Roeckel, accompanist for Miss Roeckel; Mr. Emil Cruells, organist and accompanist.

A Shining Mark

The brilliant sign effulgent on the house tops at Ellis and Powell streets has been the sensation and talk of the town. By this time the feelings and peace of mind of those alarmed journalists and others who warned the public of the danger of that sign have been calmed. The enterprising merchant in whose mind was evolved the idea of that sign cautiously provided against accident and it is now the most attractive ad. on the Pacific Coast, showing that those who were criticised had good taste and good judgment and the good sense to comply with all of the legal and engineering requirements in placing in position an ad. which has withstood a gale blowing at the rate of eighty-five miles an hour. And there it still stands, enlightening the world. We hope that our esteemed contemporaries will smother their feelings and in the quiet recesses of their editorial sanctums find solace in the sweet consolation to be had in the charming blend of the Pall Malls. Food for thought!

The Best Beer is Wieland's

The way a beer holds its own after the first novelty of its being on the market has worn off proves its real worth. The California Bottling Company reports constantly increasing sales of Wieland's beer, which is no longer a fad but a standard article of consumption. The person calling for Wieland's is always sure of getting the best in that line of liquid. Besides, it is a purely Californian product, and as such naturally commends itself to the native son or long resident who takes pride in the good things of his State. Wieland's beer is particularly favored by families, and is used in all the clubs.

Wine that Pleases Epicures

When a bon vivant finds a wine that suits his taste in every particular, it is a proof of friendship when he confides the secret of his discovery to any one outside of his own little circle. The bon vivant has placed the seal of his approval on the Mont Rouge wines in their several varieties, the product of the vineyards of Chauche & Bon. Especially has he commended the delicate Jurancon, said to be the favorite wine of King Henry of Navarre, and which has attained such vogue among the epicurean feasters of clubdom and society that it threatens to drive champagne from favor.

MUSIC

Greven Operatic Society

There was a very large audience present on Tuesday evening at the fifth operatic concert given by the advanced pupils of Joseph Greven. It was far beyond the average pupil recital in point of merit and the ambitious nature of the selections rendered. While some of the voices were too light for the more trying operatic works as a rule the numbers were well suited to the organs. While in such a long program it would be impossible to mention all the singers, some were of such remarkable excellence that they should receive special notice. Mabel Jackson Christes, who sang Elizabeth's prayer from "Tannhauser" has a voice of fine timbre, though her rendition was slightly marred by her evident nervousness. Florence E. Walbey, who sang the Shadow song from "Dinorah" is a rarely intelligent singer from whom one may look for great things in the future. The duet from "Le Nozze di Figaro" was charmingly sung and indeed was to my idea the gem of the program, only equaled by the duet from "Il Trovatore," the concluding number. Kitty McShane sang Maritana's ballad, "'Twas a Knight" in good voice and with pleasing expression. Mrs. Ed. Burns, who has distinguished herself at previous pupil recitals, made her usual splendid impression. She has genuine talent for operatic work, as was shown in the recitative and aria from "Ernani"—"Oh, come and fly with me," and in the duet with Mr. E. V. McGinty from the same opera. Mildred Kearney challenges comparison somewhat with Saidee Walsh, a former pupil of Mr. Greven built on somewhat the same lines. Miss Kearney betrays aptitude for grand opera and her voice is rich and expressive. She sang the avanera and Gypsy song from "Carmen" with considerable brilliancy. The closing number was contributed by Zita Fahey and John Beatty, scene from "Il Trovatore," each giving a solo with admirable effect, and then the duet already mentioned as one of the best things on the program. One of the numbers in the first part, a scene from "Der Freischutz," also deserves mention, particularly Agnes' beautiful aria, sung by Mrs. Lenore Greven. Mrs. Greven's voice shows the effect of most careful culture and practice and her diction is delightfully pure. Others taking part, and doing very creditable work, were Florence Donovan, Sadie Colby, Fred Huber, Alice Ashby Kane, Ray Goldstein and Erne Happ. Mr. Greven was at the piano and there was an instrumental quartet consisting of Messrs. Haug, Strelitz, Schaefer and Yanke.

Brown and Miss Esther Macomber, dramatic reader. It is expected that there will be a very large attendance, as the program will be of a high order. Mrs. Moore, who has it in charge, has brought the choir of the Park Congregational church to a fine degree of excellence. She is herself the possessor of an admirable voice which has gained with every year of cultivation and experience. Mrs. Moore does not, however, believe in resting on past laurels. In June she will go East to visit her old home in Binghampton, New York, and during her three months of absence she will take a course of study in a New York city conservatory. During her next vacation she will extend her travels abroad, with the intention of studying under a European master.

Other People's Ideas

"A woman who once grovels at a man's feet has lost thenceforth her power over him."—Gwendolen Overton in "Heritage of Unrest."

"The first lesson in politics is to lie and love it; the second lesson is to lie and live it."—Eugenie, in Ellen Glasgow's "The Voice of the People."

From Basil King's "Let Not Man Put Asunder":

Petrina: Socially speaking, there is no risk without something risque. * * * Living with the clever is like living with the rich. In trying to keep their pace one goes beyond one's means."

Mrs. Faneuil: "The conventional is only what the united good taste of mankind has found to be the most becoming."

Lady de Bohun: "A sign is not a certainty. Men are like the weather. They often promise sunshine, and then shift round and give you showers."

"Love can go and leave no trace; and once gone it is as impossible to recover as a perfume scattered by the wind. * * * Love is a fire which, when once quenched, can never be rekindled. Another fire may burn on the same hearth, but the old will be in ashes."

From "Foma Gordyeeff," by Maxim Gorky: "Some men thrash about in life, like the owl. They hunt and search for their proper place, and struggle and struggle—and the only result is that the feathers fly off them, and they accomplish nothing. They struggle until they are exhausted and ill, and their plumage is all gone, and they flap their wings and dive into any place that they happen to find, if only to rest from their labors." (Ignat.)

"Marry when you have simmered down. * * * when you have eaten your fill of sweets then you will crave for plain rye bread—that's the time to marry." (Pelagaya.)

"If a fool offers you honey—spit it out; if a wise man offers you poison—drink." (Mayakin.)

"When a man has become accustomed to living merrily, and cannot rejoice, he is in a bad way. He wishes to live gaily, he wishes to laugh—and it is not he who laughs, but life which laughs at him." (Sofya Pavlovna.)

"Hard labor is cheaper than light labor. One man puts the whole of himself into his work for a ruble, and another earns a thousand with his finger alone." (Foma.)

OUR OPINION

Comparative Heroics

If survivors of Balaklava continue to bob up and boast of the fierceness of that engagement, some lover of historical research may look into the matter and discover that the Charge of the Light Brigade was a myth. So many thousands of survivors of Balaklava have come to light in recent years as to warrant the suggestion that perhaps there has been much exaggeration regarding the carnage of that memorable battle of which Britishers love so much to boast. One of the innumerable tribe of survivors was quoted the other day as saying that he was in some hot engagements in the Civil War and that "none of them came within measurable distance of Balaklava." Nettled by the implication, General St. Clair A. Mulholland sat down and wrote about the casualities at Gettysburg. He pointed out that the greatest losses in European battles were at Mars La Tour in the Franco-Prussian war, where the Third Westphalian had casualities of 49.4 per cent in killed and wounded; at Metz, where the Garde-Schutzen lost 46.1 per cent and at Balaklava, where the British loss was 36.7 per cent. In the Union army during the Civil war there were sixty-three regiments that lost more than fifty per cent in single engagements, and one hundred and twenty whose loss exceeded thirty-six per cent. At Gettysburg no less than twenty-three Union regiments had casualties of more than fifty per cent. The loss of the 1st Minnesota was eighty-five per cent. The 151st Pennsylvania, consisting of school-teachers and their boys had such heavy losses that the Confederate General Heath said afterward: "The dead of the 151st marked the line of battle with the accuracy of a dress parade." There were instances of bravery in the Civil war of which one seldom hears, but compared with which the tales of heroism from foreign histories pale into insignificance. How seldom is recalled the anxious inquiry of Hancock on the second day of Gettysburg: "What regiment is this?" The Confederates had found a gap in the Union line and were advancing in heavy columns to occupy Cemetery Ridge. "The 1st Minnesota," shouted Col. Colville. "Charge that line!" was Hancock's order. With leveled bayonets the Minnesotans sprang to the attack and closed with the enemy's columns, which were repulsed after a desperate struggle of ten minutes. But the 1st Minnesota lost Colville and every other officer but two and eighty-two per cent of the rank and file. "There is no more gallant deed in history," said Hancock, mourning the fate of so many brave men, "but I would have ordered them in if I had been sure that every man would be killed." Our school histories contain comparatively little about the deeds of heroism of the Civil War, and though the school children are familiar with "The Charge of the Light Brigade," they have but a vague notion of the valor of the men who saved the Union. Balaklavas were so common in that titanic struggle that, with the exception of "Sheridan's Ride," there are no separate heroisms perpetuated in popular song.

The End of the War

Peace negotiations have been started between the British and the Boers, and one of the most disgraceful wars in history appears to be drawing to a close. The British are no doubt as anxious as are the victims of their greed for peace. It was evidence of a desperate state of affairs when Lord Wolseley was dispatched to South Africa. The Times and the Mail assured the people that he was going out merely for an airing, but they asserted it so often and so loudly that every one began to believe there was a purpose in his voyage. In diplomatic circles it was understood that he was going on a special mission to look over the land and report to the Government what he thought of Lord Kitchener's blockhouse system. But the people of England have lost confidence in Wolseley as they have lost it in Kitchener. He was familiar with conditions in South Africa, but he staked his reputation three years ago that forty thousand British soldiers were sufficient to deal with the Boer forces and to bring the war to a rapid and successful termination. The fact was that he never understood what a splendid soldier the Boer marksman was. He is a good specimen of the academic soldier. There have already been accounted for among the Boer killed and prisoners as many as were to be found in both the republics at the beginning of the war, and there were twenty thousand yet in arms when peace negotiations were opened. The fact is that they were being steadily recruited from Cape Colony, and it would require twice forty thousand British soldiers to bring them into submission if they insisted on fighting to the bitter end. Today in South Africa there are lines of block-houses extending from De Aar to Johannesburg, and thence to the Natal frontier; and from the rate of progress Kitchener was making the chain of block-houses would in time extend from the Cape to Cairo, constituting the highways of England's imperial civilization. Where the men were to come from to man all those block-houses it was hard to say, but Mr. Chamberlain was kept busy telegraphing for more to Australia and New Zealand. Surely, he was glad when negotiations for peace were started. But when peace is restored England will have another Ireland on her hands.

The Palmistry Fake

It was P. T. Barnum who said the public loves to be fooled, and there have been hundreds before and since the immortal showman who have acted on that theory. There has never been a period of the world's history when some fake or fad has not held the popular attention, and when fools have not begged to be parted from their money. Speculations and lotteries are the things at one time, and astrology and hypnotism at another. A new form of religion or a fake science is sure to have believers and disciples by the thousand and as long as people are willing to surrender their common sense and voluntarily part with their property, it is difficult to see either how or why the law should come to their protection. The latest fad is palmistry, and it seems to be spreading equally as fast in Europe as in America. Palmists are almost as numerous as clairvoyants, and if reports are to be credited, about as disreputable. There have been so many scandals and so much questionable dealing on the part of these "scientists," that in some sections of the country there is a call for some investigation and regulation of the business. If people want to be taken in and done for, it is useless to argue with them about the absurdity of the idea that the arrangement of the creases in their skins can affect their lives. No doubt the predictions are sometimes fulfilled, for those who are credulous enough to patronize these quacks are so susceptible to suggestion that they frequently proceed to bring about the conditions foretold. An example of it was that of the foolish girl who recently committed suicide because a palmist predicted her death within a short period. One would imagine that it would occur to the seekers that if the predictors had the power to see into the future, they would make use of their knowledge in their own behalf instead of stewing their wits to provide themselves with a living. Admitting, for the sake of argument, that they do not or cannot make use of their extraordinary powers to enrich themselves, there are hundreds of salaried positions which would be created for them if there were the shadow of a foundation to their pretensions. Every Accident, Fire or Life Insurance agency in the world, for example, would be supplied with an official palmist, and the saving which would be effected them would be enormous. The clumsy tables of "expectations of life" could be discarded and calculations based on certainties. Fraternal societies would employ a palmist and demand palmists' certificates instead of those of physicians, and instead of undertaking hazardous and painful operations in the hope of saving the lives of patients, the palm specialist could be consulted as to their utility. There are so many of these openings, all on the supposition that palmistry is anything but a humbug, that the possibility of filling one of them is sufficient to prove the fallacy of the whole fake. A large salary regularly paid in comparison to the thin and interrupted stream of halves and quarters trickling into their purses would be as Niagara to a squirt gun. It is not only the foolish and ignorant who are taken in by this kind of nonsense. There is a fair sprinkling of the intelligent and educated, and when women like Ella Wheeler Wilcox will expatiate for a column on the advisability of palmistry and phrenology, it is little to be wondered at when people of less experience and opportunity are misled.

Too Much Mental Pap

A young lady attending the State University lost her reason, it is affirmed, by too close application to her books, and once again the daily papers have set up a howl about over-study, one of them going to the extreme of calling upon the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children to interfere and stay the destruction of the innocents. A young lady of college age can hardly be classed as a child, and the S. P. C. C. is as much in need of restraint as anything else. There is never any danger that that body will pass over a chance of gaining notoriety and advertisement, and the sum total of its achievements thus far is the all but annihilation of discipline and government in home and school. But there is no crying necessity for all this ruction over the danger of children studying too much. Once in a while, in a rarely exceptional case, an ambitious or over-stimulated child may apply its brains too sedulously, but the average youngster of either sex is in no danger whatever. The real danger lies not in over application, but in lack of attention and concentration. Every new freak and fad that is incorporated in the course of study, and that is but another way of saying every new fad that is invented or discovered, is one more distraction. Children are not kept at any one thing long enough to become interested in it or to see what it leads to. Some of the parents who bitterly lament the amount of "home study" that is demanded of children would do well to ponder over that passage of "Sentimental Tommy," wherein the master makes complaint of that youthful worthy's imperfect lessons. On being told that he sits long over his books each evening, that observer of youth replies that "he may be long over them but he is not at them." Fifteen minutes of concentration is worth more than fifteen hours of lackadaisical dawdling. There is no good reason why a child who has learned to study should not learn a lesson by a single reading, just as he grasps an entertaining story. The Saturday Review

(London) had a scathing article some time ago on the subject of "The Literature of Snippets," the snippets in question being that class of periodicals of which Tid Bits is the best example. Some of the remarks accurately describe a modern educational course. "No joint of information is put upon the table, but there is supplied a bewildering profusion of scientific tabloids, and dish upon dish of literary mince. All information is in this way cut down to the Procrustean bed of brevity, and what the nature of it is is of no consequence provided it is only succinct and short. Their object, frankly confessed, is to concentrate the attention of idle-minded readers for the shortest practicable space of time. We have made various experiments as to the amount of time which these journals have decided should be given to each of their snippets. In other words, their business being to accurately gauge the duration of their readers' capacity for concentration, we have taken for granted that they have now discovered it and have come to the conclusion that the space in which the attention of a reader can be held is not safely to be extended beyond eighty seconds. Cheaply illustrated and still more cheaply edited, with scissors and paste, instead of independent thought, they are aiding in the mental deterioration of hundreds and thousands of young minds. They weaken the power of the brain in assimilating information, they reduce to a minimum its capacity for retaining and connecting ideas. The only hope we have is that when a whole generation has been fed upon nothing but pap and mince meat there will come a revolt against the purveyors of this miserable diet." Lack of concentration, and of the capacity to become absorbed in any subject, leads to failure whether it be of tomorrow's lessons, or some business enterprise. The worst conceivable cruelty to children is to turn them loose on the world without the capacity to take care of themselves and make use of their faculties, and without the discipline, mental or physical, which fits them for work. That an occasional misguided or intemperate student makes undue use of books is no more an argument for releasing the whole mass of pupils from the necessity for study than it would be to argue against the existence of fire and water because they burn and drown the unwary. It is well, before taking these stories of demented students on their face value, to find out whether there are other causes than the midnight oil which lead to derangement, for it is usually enough that the afflicted one shall have been a student for it to be taken for granted that books are to blame. When six nights in the week are given to dissipation and amusement, it is hardly just to blame the seventh, given over to study, or perhaps only a pretence of it, for the collapse. There are few teachers who have not had pupils taken out of school because they were "breaking down under the strain," but most of them can testify that the strain did not come from mental application and the delicate invalid was a long remove from the head of the class. At all events, because an occasional man or woman becomes insane while attending college is no excuse for calling on the S. P. C. C. to protect infants from the mental torture of learning the alphabet. Lop off about nine-tenths of the foolish freaks and fads that fritter away time, and teach children to concentrate their attention and use their brains intelligently when they are at their books, and they will learn twice as much in half the time.

The Saunterer

Concerning the Stork

Editor TOWN TALK: Please pardon one of your most faithful readers for suggesting that a family journal should not keep tab on the stork, I like TOWN TALK. I think it is the breeziest and brightest paper in the country. I like it for the courageous manner in which it exposes sham and affectation in high places and it may interest you to know that certain clergymen among my acquaintances regard it as a powerful influence for good in the community, but I think it is rather indelicate to feature the stork as a bird of importance in the social world. It strikes me that you plunge too deep into private affairs when you announce that somebody is expecting a visit from the stork. Moreover such announcements are embarrassing to the people whom they concern. I know a very charming matron who broke an important social engagement one day because that morning she had read in your paper that she was expecting the stork. The statement was true but she remained home because she feared that everybody would be rubbering. By cutting out the stork I believe you will improve the tone of your paper.

CONSTANT READER.

It always pleases me to receive suggestions in reference to the policy that should be pursued in the management of a family journal, but my views are irreconcilably at variance with those of Constant Reader. I have heard objections to the stork before, but I should as lief omit all reference to the marriage of Peter Martin and Lily Oelrichs if it ever be consummated, or the decoration of Mrs. Henry Scott by Edward VII with the emblem of the Order of the Garter if that lady should achieve such distinction, as banish the stork from these columns. Is it not evidence of rank and fatuous prudery to pretend to be shocked at the announcement that some good woman is about to present her husband with an heir? Are not women proud to become mothers? Do they not publish the notices of births in the dailies? Is there any department of news more eagerly scanned by the women of a community? When an heir is expected by a royal family in Europe or by one of the nobility the news is published in the court journals and wired all over the continent. No Queen ever objected to having it announced that the stork was en route to the palace with an heir to the throne. Instead of becoming embarrassed by the report that she is approaching maternity, a good and true wife should feel complimented, for the publication of such a report implies that she is of some consequence. And strange to say it is only in the wild and woolly West that items of news concerning the stork superinduce a blush. The breezy Western sense of modesty is of an exceptionally fine quality. But it is most easily appealed to in those that are possessed of a prurient mind. Charles A. Dana once said that he was prepared to print in the Sun the news of anything that happened in consonance with God's laws. The Sun was a clean family journal under his management. I shall continue to herald the coming of the stork, believing that no allusion to him is indelicate so long as he refrains from trespassing.

The Kanaka on the Roof

A fair San Franciscan who sipped the bliss of her treaclemoon in Hawaii some weeks ago, and who is now making some stir by entertaining in her charming home here, amused a group of fashionables a day or two ago by her stories of her adventures in the Paradise of the Pacific. With her husband, she rambled over the group of islands and visited some of the out-of-the-way places. On the island of Maui, at the principal town of Hilo, they put up at the only hotel, and were treated hospitably by the manager, who by the way is a Mr. Dankey who once lived in Fresno. Overcome by the heat of the afternoon, the bride sought her room and her call was answered in person by Dankey. She wanted a cool bath and was delighted to know that she might have one of salt water, and with an invigorating shower. The tub proved rather primitive and the door of the bathroom persisted in coming ajar. She scampered from the water several times and finally fastened the rebellious door with a huge pin. She read this sign above the tub: "When you want the shower, pull the rope." Mrs. Honeymoon tugged in vain. The avalanche of which she had such entrancing visions was not forthcoming. Finally she yanked the rope furiously and exclaimed, "Confound the old thing, anyway." A voice above, in soft, sibilant kanaka-English replied, "You move more other side, you get plenty water." She looked toward the ceiling, and through an opening in the roof, saw a tall, dignified native man, holding a half-barrel of salt water, ready to launch it on her head. He was the regular adjuvant of the shower bath. The bride shrieked and tried to do as did the Lady Godiva ere she summoned strength to leap for her dressing gown. She vows she never told her husband because she says, "I didn't know him well enough then."

Wallace and the Millionaires

Allan Wallace, a scion of the Vanderbilts and a cousin of the Duchess of Marlborough, has become a citizen of California and a resident of Monterey. He likes this State so much that he has become one of its greatest boomers. Mr. Wallace is a member of all the exclusive clubs of New York, but he is so democratic that he is an enigma to the Snobocracy of this city. They cannot understand how a rich man with plutocratic ancestors can have tastes that are not of the most fastidious variety. Up at the Pacific-Union Club he is not popular because he shocks the multi-millionaires who expect to be salaamed to every time a young man passes their way. That club abounds in Beau Brummels, Chesterfields and Dr. Johnsons of the Henry Scott type who are accustomed to seeing people faint on presentation, but Allan Wallace never turns a hair for he has met the multi-millionaire in his infinite variety. The Pacific-Union millionaire impressed him only with his bad grammar and worse manners.

They were Sentimental

From Rome comes the news that the Artsimovitch's are as happy as the proverbial turtle doves; also, that Mrs. Artsimovitch has become almost a fanatical communicant of the Greek church. She became interested in that church in this city shortly after she and her present husband became epris. I am told that both Artsimovitch and his wife are quite sentimental and that before they started for Europe they visited Mill and Ross Valleys for a farewell look at the spots which they knew so well in the days of their courtship. Count Artsimovitch expects promotion in the near future. His father is an influential politician in Russia. Webster Jones has never quite recovered his buoyancy of spirits since the loss of the fair lady who is now the wife of the Russian diplomat.

An Exceptional Woman

Mrs. Lloyd Tevis is reported to be very much improved, but it is doubtful whether she will ever go out again. Of all the rich women in San Francisco I know of none more beloved than Mrs. Tevis. Into her ears have been poured the tales of woe of half the dissatisfied and the sufferers of society, and she has ever been a solacing sympathizer. Moreover she has always been a woman of charitable views for she has never been quick to condemn, preferring always to extenuate and to suggest plausible excuses for those that have erred. I sincerely hope that the end of so good a woman is not near.

Buckets and Loved Spots

In the public schools children are required to illustrate verse that has been read to them. In this way is the young idea stimulated to a love of both literature and art. Some children display very amusing interpretations of the theme. The story was told me the other day that a little boy, after hearing "The Old Oaken Bucket" read handed his teacher a sheet of paper on which he had drawn three circles and a bunch of dots.

"What is this?" asked the teacher, pointing to the first circle.

"That's the old oaken bucket," was the reply.

"And what's this?" she asked, pointing to the second circle.

"That's the iron-bound bucket," replied the infant artist.

"And this?"

"That's the moss-covered bucket that hung in the well."

The Demon in Pasadena

Beautiful Pasadena, the city of millionaires and of churches, is in the hands of the Demon, says the Women's Christian Temperance Union. Though for fifteen years Pasadena has outlawed the liquor traffic in her midst, now the most insidious devil of all the bottle imps has gotten an entree into the most exclusive circles of the city, say the good ladies of the alphabetical order of the booze fighters. In the new city directory of Pasadena, a hundred and twelve advertisements of malt, spirituous and vinous liquors are sandwiched in among the addresses. Very few had noticed the advertisements until the W. C. T. U. held a meeting and drawing up resolutions, published them. The resolutions cover a half-column in the newspapers of the Southland. The indignant ladies have resolved that each one of those one hundred and twelve advertisements is a covert blow at the civic, social, and moral welfare of the city, and that if allowed to stay there unrebuked, would stand as a seeming just ground for slurs and ridicule on Pasadena's claims as a temperance town. They have requested every person owning a copy of the directory to blacken over every one of those one hundred and twelve liquor advertisements in his own copy of the book. Committees were appointed and an outlay for small blacking brushes and ink pots authorized. The town has been districted and the dear ladies are going about asking to be allowed to wipe out the diabolical legends. The saloonkeepers of Los Angeles and the wholesalers who paid for the advertisements are tickled to death and the Demon is roaring in his sleeve at the free puffing he is getting.

Living in Blissful Indifference

The European correspondents who are ever on the alert for sensational gossip about the crowned heads and the innumerable nobility have been overlooking the domestic affairs of the Prince and Princess of Monaco, though there are no more interesting personages on the continent. I was accorded the other day the privilege of publishing some excerpts from the letters of a local matron of the smart set who has been touring Europe, and in which the affairs of the House of Monaco are discussed. "The Prince and Princess," she writes, "are resigning themselves to the inevitable, and are giving up hopes of living in anything like accord. Perhaps it would interest Mr. and Mrs. —— to know that in living in blissful indifference to each other's doings they are emulating the example of the Prince and Princess of Monaco. The Prince is a handsome fellow, but a little too old and too scientific for his wife. She was—perhaps you don't remember—Alice Heine, the daughter of a wealthy New Orleans banker. I met her in San Francisco years ago at the Donahoes. She told a friend of mine recently that she and the Prince have agreed upon one thing only since their marriage and that is to live apart. The fact is that each is passionately devoted to a hobby which has no interest for the other.

Their Respective Fads

"The Prince delights in posing as an expert among men of science, and he gives all his time and a deal of money in pursuit of his fad. A large part of his revenues is devoted to the maintenance of his steam yacht which is fitted up in the most extravagant manner for ocean exploration. He has sailed in her all over the globe, dredging, mapping and measuring, and he feels that he is well repaid for months of observation and labor if he drags a crustacean from the bottom of the sea no record of which is to be found in marine literature. Now it happens that the Princess has an antipathy for the sea, and she hates the slimy sea-beasts even more. Her hobby is music and she dotes on musicians. The long-haired artists with the soulful eyes are the men that interest her, and she rounds them up in her salon. Her husband hates them with a vigor that rivals her detestation of the creatures of the deep. So you can readily understand that there have been some very wordy wars between His Highness and Madame la Princesse in that gorgeous palace of theirs, which as far as beauty of environment goes, surpasses anything that I have yet encountered in all my travels..

Their Picturesque Palace

"And Monaco! You should see it. The site beats Sutro's and the Cliff. The palace stands on the brink of a rocky promontory that juts into the waves of the Mediterranean below the mountains which rise, ridge upon ridge, away far into Savoy. The rock is about two hundred feet high, and is surmounted by loopholed walls, which I have been told were used for defensive purposes in mediaeval times. Ages ago it was a Roman stronghold, and later it was held by pirates. The guides say—but what do you care about the guides? I know you will be more interested in the Prince and Princess. The Prince has had a past. When he was but the hereditary Prince he married Lady Mary, only daughter of the Duke of Hamilton. They had one son, the present heir. After ten years they were divorced and she married the Hungarian Count Festetics, some relation, I believe, to the gent who married Miss Haggin. When the Prince reached his fortieth year he married Alice Heine who has had previous matrimonial experience, too. Her first husband was the Duc de Richelieu. I don't know whether she was a divorcee or a sod widow when she met the Prince but she was no longer young. The Prince, by the way, has published the result of his sea exploration in a work called 'Oceanography' which has reached its eighteenth volume. He has a museum that rivals his palace, built where the sea can lap into his tank filled with all sorts of live objects. Here his Highness loves to loiter and here Madame La Princesse has been known to come only once. That one visit gave her such a fit of shuddering hysterics that no one has ever dared to suggest that she should repeat the experiment."

A Lawyer's Plea

From a prominent member of the Bar Association comes a request that I urge the lawyers of San Francisco to take a greater interest in their professional club with the object in view of fostering the purposes of that institution. He kindly explains that the purposes are "to elevate the profession and to establish a more cordial relationship among practitioners," and he calls my attention to the fact that the Bar Association has now under advisement a praiseworthy plan to provide counsel for paupers who have just claims to prosecute. He regrets, incidentally, that attorneys do not frequent their club and that they appear to take very little interest in the Association.

A Mere Suggestion

The objects of the Bar Association are indeed praiseworthy, and I should like to stimulate an interest in any institution that would be likely to elevate the profession in this city. It is badly in need of elevation, but I do not think it would do any good to induce lawyers to dine together in their club. What the Bar Association of San Francisco is most in need of is a conscience and a wholesome mental diet. I should suggest the reading of papers at regular weekly meetings. There are many topics that might be discussed to advantage to the profession. For instance, when an attorney of the standing at the bar of James G. Maguire is retained in a case such as the Fair case to represent such a woman as the Widow Craven after the shallowness of her claim has been exposed, and with no prospect in view except that of forcing a settlement, would it not be interesting to hear some learned member of the profession discuss the question of ethics involved if such a question be involved? I am not thoroughly familiar with the ethics of the profession but I am strongly of the opinion that if all that is done by attorneys in good standing is in accordance with professional ethics, then the first duty of the Bar Association is to get a new code.

Reinstatement Too Easy

I have always been of the opinion that the extremes to which a lawyer may go in this State without being disbarred are too great, and that it is altogether too easy to get reinstated after having been disbarred. If an attorney has been convicted of embezzling a client's money and sent to jail, it may be all right to reinstate him after he sheds his stripes providing that he has manifested a disposition to reform. But I should prefer to put him on probation. A man cannot obtain a license to practice law unles somebody certifies to his good moral character. Why then should a convicted crook be rehabilitated with the authority to act as an officer of the court which he once abused? The Supreme Court of our State has established a precedent in the matter and the Bar Association seems to like it. Perhaps if the leading members of the Bar Association could inspire greater confidence in themselves they would find it easier to arouse the interest of the reputable members of the profession.

Now for the Hamilton Cult

Mrs. Atherton dedicated her latest novel which deals with the life of Alexander Hamilton to Dr. Allan McLane Hamilton, and the doctor has very kindly involved himself in a divorce suit and a remarriage at Sioux Falls. But I am of the opinion that Mrs. Atherton's novel "The Conqueror" will sell on its merits, for that brilliant woman has obtained the recognition which she deserves. Dr. Hamilton, by the way, is a direct descendant of Alexander Hamilton, and he is a noted physician. I believe the novel which has been dedicated to him is destined to revive interest in one of the most unique aristocrats that ever lived, and I look for the Hamilton cult to soon make its appearance. This is a propitious time for research into the life of Hamilton. We are now interested in men of culture, and we are putting them to the front. Roosevelt is in the White House, Low is Mayor of New York, Schmitz the musician is wielding the baton in San Francisco, Prince Poniatowski is taking an interest in politics, and Mrs. Astor has boomed the college gent.

A Tribute to Genius

Mrs. Atherton has given us a romantic story of Alexander Hamilton's life and she has placed that distinguished gentleman on a pedestal for the admiration of all true lovers of the polite. She has endeavored to show that the flame of ardent patriotism may burn in the breast of the true gentleman. If she is to be believed we owe the present majesty of the United States more to the culture and fervor of Hamilton than to the simplicity of Jefferson. He may not have written the Constitution but he fought the fight that won it for us. She presents him to us as a genius, a marvel of creative force, a great financier and a brilliant diplomatist. And in doing so she sticks to the historic verities. Mrs. Atherton started in to write a novel, but the novelistic instinct overpowered her and she gave us a romance that bristles with facts of absorbing interest and with all the glamour of fiction. The book is a splendid tribute to the genius of Hamilton. Now for the Hamilton cult.

Vain Gossip

On the very highest authority I am informed that there is not the slightest foundation for the gossip about the prospective announcement of an engagement between Therese Morgan and a popular clubman. When there is such an attractive young woman on the eligible list the gossips cannot refrain from speculating as to the probable lucky man. However Miss Morgan is not worrying herself much on that score.

Former San Franciscan Married

From New York a correspondent writes me of the marriage of Ida May Miller and Albert Augustus Mozer. While the bridegroom is not known here, the bride is very well remembered. In her schoolgirl days she was the bosom friend of Emma Butler, now Mrs. Breedon. Ida Miller was an uncommonly pretty girl of the Van Dyke blonde type, brown eyes and fair hair. After the death of one of her parents she went East to live. During one of the family's visits to San Francisco, Ida married her second cousin. It was a love match but was not approved by the bride's father, and it finally ended in a divorce. The young wife retained the care of the only child, a little boy. Her father died lately and left her two hundred thousand dollars, therefore she brought a rich dower to her present husband who is also, writes my correspondent, wealthy in his own right.

The Barn First

Alice Hoffman is a sort of an Arcadian queen in San Rafael, and the residents of that burg take a great interest in her, for she is a most original young woman. She is now erecting on a lot near the hotel a large barn. She appears to feel that the welfare of her horses should be considered before that of the family. So much of the lot is to be occupied by the barn that the family residence must necessarily be small. The Southard Hoffmans, by the way, are going out once more.

Not a Ravishing Beauty

Mrs. Hugh Tevis has come up to town and San Francisco is having a good look at her. She is at the Richelieu. As she wrought havoc with the hearts of two men of prominence every one expected to see a combination of Lillian Russell and Maxine Elliott, but after surveying the young widow society exclaimed, "Is that all?" She is not of the regulation type of beauty so society must content itself with old favorites.

How Tulle Should be Worn

A bit of tulle is the latest hallmark of the smartly gowned woman in New York, writes an occasional correspondent from the metropolis. "Not such a tiny bit," she adds, "as the women of San Francisco wear round the neck wound into a small rosette at the back, but a full yard and a half of the soft material spread out into a large bow which serves to frame the face. The large bow is sometimes worn in front and occasionally at the side but preference is given to the back."

How a Broker Lost His Seat

George Knight's son, who bought a seat on the Stock and Bond Exchange for twenty thousand dollars some days ago, had the pleasure of assisting in the discomfiture of a fellow broker with a funny bone. Business was dull, and this broker thinking to create a diversion, mounted a chair and cried: "I'll sell my seat for four dollars."

"Taken!" yelled Knight.

"I mean the seat of my trousers," replied the humorist.

"I'll take that, too," said Knight.

Before the broker could say a word he was seized and held by a dozen while Knight carefully carved out the seat of his pants. He was handed four dollars and told to go in peace. He went with his overcoat.

Mrs. Martin Called

Every one wondered what Mrs. Eleanor Martin would do with the Robinson Reillys when that very much talked of couple came to town. The whilom mother-in-law of Mrs. Reilly was, in the opinion of some people, displeased with the charming Genevieve, but Mrs. Martin didn't permit speculation as to what she would do to become so vexatious as the problem involving the date of Peter's marriage. She promptly called on the Robinson Reillys.

Mrs. Potter and the King

When King Edward passes away, and it is to be hoped that he will not do so until after the Coronation, his epitaph should be, "He Was Loyal to His Sweethearts." The King has had many sweethearts in his day, and from all accounts that day is not yet closed. It was many years ago that he won the admiration of all Lotharios by perjuring himself like a gentleman, and since then he has never failed to show his gratitude to those women who have from time to time earned it. No woman was ever permitted to lose social prestige through a flirtation with Albert Edward. More than one woman obtained social position by winning his royal esteem through amorous dalliance. Even for the unspeakable Langtry he demanded social recognition and she was vouchsafed it. And now comes the story from London that Cora Potter, the American actress, owes her social influence in London to the gallant King. A short time ago she was forced out of the cast of a new play in Beerbohm Tree's theatre, whereupon the King withdrew his patronage from the playhouse. He attended every performance in London except that at Tree's theatre, and of course his absence from the royal box occasioned comment of a damaging character. Now Tree is yearning for a knighthood, and his hopes grew with the approach of the Coronation with its customary distribution of titular baubles. He soon learned that he had incurred the King's displeasure and thereupon he restored Mrs. Potter to the cast.

Is James D. Phelan Engaged?

The story has gained currency in the East that there is some probability of ex-Mayor Phelan's returning to San Francisco with a bride, or at least as the fiance of a very charming young woman. During his recent stay in Washington he spent a good deal of time at the home of the McKennas, and about the time of his departure for New York en route to London I was informed in a private letter from the capital that the young bachelor millionaire had won the heart and hand of the charming young woman who was betrothed some years ago to Peter Martin. I attributed the story to mere idle gossip, but it is being repeated and in what appears to be an authoritative manner. It would be interesting to learn that ex-Mayor Phelan had lost his heart in Washington, for, residing there now, is a woman who was passionately fond of him years ago, and who, I believe, has never quite given up the hope of having her affections reciprocated. I refer to Mrs. McLean Martin, daughter of Mrs. Colton.

The Macfarlanes of Hawaii

Since the marriage of Polly Dunn into the Macfarlane family of Honolulu, a great deal of balderdash has been written by editors of social columns about the great wealth of the Hawaiian family and of its social importance. The fact is that the Macfarlanes are in fairly good circumstances, but there is no Croesus in the family. The foundation of what little wealth they have was laid in the saloon business and they are still engaged in it in connection with their hotel enterprises. I believe that the senior Macfarlanes started Honolulu's first saloon, and Grandma Macfarlane, Eliza as her friends called her, assisted in its management. The story is still told of her refusal once upon a time to sell a drink to one of the Kamehamehas because he had too much aboard. The maternal grandmother of Harry Macfarlane, Jr., was the late Mrs. Wideman, a very worthy woman, in whose behalf a claim to royal blood was made in an open letter to a Honolulu paper at the time of Polly Dunn's wedding. The claim was quickly disproved by some prominent natives. There is intense pride of blood among the nobles of Hawaii, and family records are strictly preserved to this day. Mrs. Wideman, before her marriage, was one of the entertainers at the Court of Kalakaua the Gay, and it was perhaps through that circumstance that the mistake was made.

No Curs Will Be There

A few years ago a mere handful of the smart set took an interest in pedigreed dogs. The George Lents, the Webster Jones', Jack de Ruyters and one or two others were all the representatives of the swim at the annual bench show of the Kennel Club. But now all that is changed. Society goes in for dog culture with an enthusiasm given to nothing else but golf. American and English fox-hounds, French bulls and mastiffs are the favorites, but collies and fox-terriers still manage to keep in mild favor. There is more interest being taken in the big Charity Dog Show that opens next Wednesday than anything that happened since the Mardi Gras. Eastern amateur dog fanciers have sent out the cream of their kennels and the local canine breeders intend to run their cousins on the other side of the Rockies a close second. Our swim may not be so blue-blooded as that of New York, but the Californian canines to be shown at this bench exhibit have pedigrees many leagues long.

Among those who will spend the season at the Hotel Mateo are Mr. and Mrs. E. Mandel, William M. Rose and family of Florida, the Francis Towles of St. Paul, the J. K. Armsbys, E. F. Houghtons, Miss Rose and George Hooper, W. D. Holt of St. Louis.

The Opposition to Mathews

A god once sprang from a machine and now a new art school is about to grow from a refusal to make paint puddings. I have told something of the distaste of honest art students for the methods of Arthur Mathews, the puny dictator of the Hopkins Art Institute, and of the rebellion of the clever folk against the lash of the boss who is blind to his own idiosyncrasies but who seeks to make all play his monotone. Now comes the result. Never have the Hopkins classes been so small or brought forth such mediocre work. Genius could not flourish under the savage superciliousness of Mathews, and so the brilliant students have dropped away from the tutelage of the house on the hill, and gone to studying alone or in groups in their own studios or elsewhere. Encouraged by the printed criticisms of Mathews, and by the stand of the older insurgents who refused to exhibit at the Hopkins and who will shortly have their own show, the younger artists who are still at the feet of the masters have announced their intention of opening a school of their own, and of learning to paint the thing as they see it and not as Mathews sees it.

His Penchant for Puddings

But of the paint puddings? The chief crime charged to Mathews is his arbitrary rule as to the mere trifles of paint and palette. One must, after squeezing the paint into one's palette from the tubes, take one's knife and make little puddings of the soft pigment before using one's brushes. Otherwise, says Mathews, one cannot paint well. He refuses to correct the work of those who will not roll the puddings, although he is paid by the Hopkins management to teach all comers. A middle-aged woman who is a hard student tells me that Mathews has passed her by for weeks at a time, with never a word of correction and encouragement. She had no knack or liking for the boluses favored by the boss and so earned his disfavor. Now the dozens who have revolted against the pudding discipline have gotten together, and will have a school of their own. I understand that the directors of the Hopkins are very weary of Mathews' misrule and that steps will be taken to end it in the near future. Mathews' friends say that he is misjudged; that his worst fault is a desire to ape the great maitres of the Paris ateliers and to assume the despotism of genius. Perhaps this is so, but the rebellion has now grown past reasoning and the downfall of Mathews is in sight.

The Insurgents

The California Society of Artists—the insurgents who have broken away from the Hopkins Art Institute—have all the treasures for their coming exhibition in hand. Today is the last for sending pictures to the jury, and already there is abundant promise of a successful and praiseworthy collection of canvases. On the evening of the twenty-sixth of this month the first peep will be afforded the exhibiting artists and their friends. A reception will be held that night with music and a general gathering of the clever people who have flung the gage of defiance to the potgang of the big house on the hill. These insurgents are of the younger generation but they are not callow nor unskilled in the ways of showing their work to the public. Wisely enough, they have begun at a pace which insures no false steps but which may and will be quickened as appreciation grows. They have fixed on the studio of Charles P. Neilson at 207 Sutter street as the place for the first exhibition, and here the pictures will be hung during the next ten days. The studio is large enough for all purposes, has a fine top light ,and is accessible to every one as it is but one door from Kearny street and up but one flight. Neilson has generously moved his painting traps and surrendered his atelier to the hanging committee and jury. All the expenses of the exhibition will be borne by the members of the new society, and will be entirely free. This is a radical departure from the custom at the Hopkins, where an admission fee of twenty-five cents is charged.

They were discussing the shortcomings of Mr. Gaytop the married flirt, and Von Pompous remarked that no true gentleman ever humiliated his wife.

"But many that think they are gentlemen spend most of their leisure time at the club," said Mrs. Von Pompous.

"Do you mean to insinuate that I—"

"I merely wish to submit that it is somewhat humiliating for a man to proclaim by his conduct that his club is more attractive than his wife," said Mrs. Von Pompous, and Mr. Von Pompous buried himself in the morning paper.

The Hotel Mateo is rapidly becoming the centre of attraction for automobilists on account of its excellent accommodations for the machines. H. T. McKnight took a large party down to the hotel in automobiles last Sunday. Sterling Postley, with his new White racer, was there recently, and F. T. Miner made the run from town to San Mateo in two hours. T. Bradley Quinn, the English bicycle enthusiast, late of Calcutta, is a mine of information for the chaffeurs.

Mrs. J. M. Robledo has arrived from Guatamala. She came hither to visit her mother, Mrs. Gashwiler with whom she will remain for several months. Mr. Robledo will join his wife in a short while and they will go back to Guatamala in the summer.

Uncle George's Eighty-fifth Birthday

"When other mortals stoop to folly,
And find, too late, they're somewhat bleached;
It soothes next morning's melancholy
To know that you are still unreached."

This greeting, from L. J. B. Lincoln, was but one of many received last Saturday from Lambs and Players and Bohemians, to be read at the dinner given by the Bohemian Club in honor of Uncle George Bromley's eighty-fifth birthday. It was the largest dinner given at the club in many a day and brought out a strong representation of members. Those who could not be there sent messages by letter or wire. Raphael Weill cabled from Paris. Frederick Warde wired from Butte, Montana; Daniel C. Gilman from Baltimore; William D. Bunker from Washington, D. C.; Frank L. Thresher from Minneapolis; Maclyn Arbuckle from Chicago; Ignacio Martinetti from Philadelphia; Archie Gunter from New York; George H. Broadhurst and Bob Mien from nearer home. Frederic Remington and E. B. Kemble sent characteristic sketches, as did Oliver Herford, V. Benson and others of the Lambs Club. James Barrie sent a charming bit of verse.

Among Players and Lambs sending good wishes in prose or verse were Willie Collier, Henry E. Dixey, De Wolf Hopper, Frank Worthing, John Kellerd, Mark Smith, Frederick Truesdell, Arthur Byron, Samuel Edwards, Frank Unger, F. Vivante, Fritz Williams, George Backus, George A. Spink, Nate Salsburg, Edwin Hoff, Digby Bell—the "Boy" of the Lambs—C. T. Dazey, John Malone, Francis Wilson, George W. Leslie, Herbert Carr, Harry Corson Clarke, Julian Potter, Joseph R. Grismer, Wilton Lackaye, Eugene Presbrey, Harry Woodruff, Joseph and E. M. Holland, Horatio Harper, Barton Hill, Edward E. Kidder, Robert Edeson, Stewart Brice, Glen MacDonough and Samuel Reed. Reginald De Koven sent a bar of "Maid Marian" over his signature and Arthur Weld also sent a bar of music. Clay Greene sent a short toast and a longer poem. Robert Reid and Jennings S. Cox in New York and Dr. H. J. Stewart in Back Bay, Boston, were among absent Bohemians sending messages. Ed. H. Hamilton, of the local Family, sent a toast in prose. Captain Caxton, U. S. A., wrote on Westmoreland Club paper from Richmond, Virginia, and Lieutenant Cloman from Madison Barracks, N. Y.

Mrs. Fremont Older left for the East last Tuesday. She expects to be away about a month. Mrs. Older is a clever writer and has done some good work in the short story line, but lately she has devoted herself to the more ambitious task of writing a novel, which has been highly commended by professional readers in New York. I believe the purpose of her trip is to discuss the work with the members of a large publishing house.

It's an Ill Wind, Etc.

Jimmy Otis, the husband of one of Society's beauties, is seventy-five hundred dollars a year richer by the death of Winfield Jones. Otis and Jones were trustees for life of a big estate, and the total sum allowed for their services was fifteen thousand a year which they divided. Mr. Otis will now enjoy the whole amount.

Gage was Prudent

Governor Henry T. Gage cautiously absented himself from the convention of Republican clubs at San Jose. And I think he should be commended for his prudence. If he had gone to San Jose he would have given his enemies a splendid opportunity to attempt some coup for the purpose of embarrassing him. And that is surely what they would have done. Those disgruntled politicians who have been unsuccessful job chasers under this Administration are eager for an opportunity to smash Gage publicly, and with the Chronicle and Call ready to give publicity to everything of a damaging character, the enemies of the Governor must have been sorely disappointed over his failure to show up. If he had attended the convention a fight would have been started against him, and though it would, perhaps, be unsuccessfully waged, the advisability of entering a dark horse in the gubernatorial race would become more apparent. With so much rancor and bitterness in the party it behooves Gage to give the opposition as little food as possible to feed on.

His Unwise Letter

There was a surprising lack of tact in the Governor's letter declining the invitation to attend the convention. If he had declined on the ground that, occupying as he does a high State office and being a candidate for renomination, he feared that his presence might be misunderstood and lead to the injection of extraneous matters into the deliberations of the delegates who had assembled for the good of the whole party, his sense of delicacy would have been approved. His expression of disapproval of the exercise of the personal influence of candidates in such a convention was unnecessary and ungallant. It was an affectation unworthy of the Executive. He knows that there is nothing sacred about a political convention. He knows that the Republican clubs were organized in the interest of job chasing politicians and not through exalted patriotic motives. Indeed, he would have been there had he not been afraid of a stampede or some other untoward occurrence. Therefore it was ungracious of him to snarl at his opponents, especially as he was doing indirectly through his job holders what he protested against in his letter. He was represented at the convention by a lot of cheap pot-house politicians of the Aleck Truman stripe who are drawing fat salaries from the State treasury, and who were there to guard his interests and inflate his boom.

Why Gage was Endorsed

But the Governor was endorsed as I predicted last week that he would be. The convention could not afford to turn down the Administration without jarring the whole Republican party, and the endorsement was only what should have been expected. It was rather amusing however, to endorse the Executive and the Legislature in the same resolution. In order to save the State from financial disaster, it may be remembered, Governor Gage was obliged to veto bills passed by the Republican legislature appropriating over three millions of dollars for unnecessary purposes. The Republican convention, having heartily endorsed a band of tax-eaters who tried to loot the State treasury could not refuse to endorse the Governor without rendering the inference plausible that he had incurred the enmity of his party by safeguarding the people's property.

Cupid's Climax

The expected happened when on Wednesday of last week Mrs. Antonia Bandmann was very quietly married to Captain Louis P. Brant at the residence of her daughter-in-law, Mrs. Charles Bandmann, in Vallejo street, her little grandson "giving the bride away." There was quite a small tempest raised some time ago because the suggestion was made among Mrs. Bandmann's friends that she would soon become the bride of this gallant Son of Mars, and the soft impeachment was strenuously denied by both. The bride's first husband, who was the senior partner of the house of Bandmann, Neilson & Co., was at one time quite wealthy, but he died a poor man. They had two children, a son, Charles J. Bandmann, and a daughter, whose death soon after her marriage to Percy Rothwell almost broke her father's heart.

One of the Old Smart Set

Mrs. Bandmann that was, Mrs. Brant that is, is still a very handsome woman. All early day San Franciscans remember what a pretty girl she was when, as Miss Tonie Pollard, she took a leading part in the festivities of the old Oriental hotel of which her father was the landlord. She and Lillie Hitchcock were inseparable friends, and with Eugene Dewey joint promoters of all that was gay and lively in their quarter of the town during the latter part of the Fifty decade. When the rumor was started before, it was said that Mrs. Brant's present husband was her junior by several years, but disparity of age, in favor of the husband, is no longer unusual. Exceptional charms entitle a woman to the advantages of youth in her husband. And many of those possessed of the charms of maturity give away weight in that respect for age. Take, for instance, the widow of Henry Barroilhet, the French banker, who selected a young doctor of Redwood upon whom to bestow her very mature charms and handsome fortune. She was in New York purchasing an elaborate trousseau when the bridegroom elect passed away.

True Story of the Match

The Examiner's "Chaperon" started a broad grin Sunday by giving considerable space to the story of the marriage of Millionaire William H. Deming of this city to Azalene Earle in New York. The affair was written up as though it were a "high sassiety" function and the readers of the Examiner were told that the bride had been introduced in society in Gotham where she had been pursuing her musical studies. It was also hinted that in a short time she would return to San Francisco, and become one of the hostesses of our smart set. But just to set matters right, as it were, the Examiner explained two days later that Mrs. Deming was formerly a hello girl in this city, and that Deming met her when she was employed by the Telephone company. Quite right, but why not let the poor girl enjoy the booming of the Chaperon? Mr. Deming has millions and if he wants to break into the smart set with his bride he should be permitted to do so. I'm sorry the cat is out of the bag but now that it is the story should be complete. Miss Earle was a very attractive girl. After leaving the telephone company she became a stenographer and typist. She became acquainted with Mr. Deming through a flirtation and he fell desperately in love with her. She worried him a great deal for he was constantly afraid that he would lose her, and for a time there appeared to be some likelihood of her transferring her affections to an automobile agent. When she went East, Deming's friends thought that his infatuation was at an end, but he suddenly jumped to New York and pulled the marriage off in a hurry. The bride's mother keeps a boarding-house in this city, but her daughter, having married a millionaire she intends to retire from business. Mrs. Deming is pretty and has accomplishments that should make her quite attractive in—well, in Blingum, for example.

A Violation of Church Law

The Cardinal in the play of that name which was produced at the Columbia last week declares that it is one of the miracles of the Church that the secrets of the Confessional have never been violated. He remarks that there have been bad priests who deserted the church but that none of them ever revealed anything confided to them in the Confessional. The purpose of this little speech was no doubt to avert the disapproval of Catholics, for notwithstanding the boast of the Cardinal he violates Catholic doctrine by using information obtained in the Confessional for the purpose of establishing the guilt of a murderer. The Church law imposes upon the Confessor the obligation to cast absolutely out of his mind all thought of every bit of information imparted in the Confessional. By way of illustration it may be stated that if it were revealed to a priest in the Confessional that the person confessing contemplated murdering him at the first opportunity and that subsequently he received a call from that person to visit him in a ministerial capacity, he should respond notwithstanding the danger his visit involved. This is an extreme case but it has been cited by Church authority to illustrate the requirement as to the state of a priest's mind. Mr. Willard in "The Cardinal," which purports to be a Catholic play, questions the murderer in the presence of a witness with a view of having him repeat what he said in the Confessional.

Crawford and the Confessional

Marion Crawford, by the bye, worked the "confessional" into one of his stories, but he made no such error as that of "The Cardinal." In his "Corleone," one of the Saracinesca series, one of the characters chases his brother into the sanctuary and murders him before the chancel. A few moments later, a young visiting priest who has been practicing on the organ comes down from the loft and themurderer flings himself on his knees before him and forces him to receive his confession. Later on the murderer accuses the priest of having committed the crime and the seal of the confessional prevents the priest from revealing the truth.

Manchester Will be There

There is one American heiress that can't be kept away from the Coronation. She will be on hand to lend eclat to the big show and shed the brilliancy of her jewels in Westminster. I refer to Miss Zimmerman that was, but now the proud Duchess of Manchester. On Monday of this week the English court decided that, in spite of proven "rash speculation and extravagance in living," it would annul the bankruptcy of his Grace, the Rt. Hon. Wm. Angus Drogo, ninth Duke of Manchester, Viscount Mandeville and Baron Montague of Kimbolton castle, St. Neots Hunts, Brampton House, Huntingdon and Tanderagee Castle, County Armagh. Unless you are up in the nomenclature of British titles you would scarcely recognize this young man of many titles and houses who found that there was little in them all when not accompanied by the long green. He is none other than His Grace of Manchester, who spent some little time in this city not long ago, and who captured the daughter of Papa Zimmerman of Cincinnati.

An Absurd Rule

It now appears that Miss Zimmerman came along just in time, for now the hereditary legislator of the proud house of Montague will not have to hide his strawberry-leaved coronet under a bushel while the Coronation show is in progress. It is the absurd rule of the House of Lords that when a peer is being chased by Jake Rauers through the vulgar law courts, and dunned from one castle to another by cruel creditors, he cannot enter the chamber and occupy his seat. Of course it is absurd to elevate Mammon above rank, and deprive an accidental legislator of the realm of the proud privilege of assisting in the Coronation of his King. Why should a bank account take precedence above the claims of long descent, and the lack of it put a peer to the necessity of wedding a vulgar American heiress? If it were not for the kind hearts of some of our American millionaires some of the coronets of England would be in a bad way just now.

The smile of a woman with pre .y teeth is not always eloquent of mere happiness.

Dr. Catherwood Improving

Mrs. Clara Darling joined her son, Dr. Clinton Catherwood at Colorado Springs a week ago, and found him greatly improved. He had tuberculosis in its incipient stage. Hard work in the laboratory and in practice combined to render him susceptible to the germs of the disease, but Mrs. Darling has written to a friend in this city that her son has gained eight pounds since his arrival at the Springs less than a month ago. She believes that he will be thoroughly cured in a year. She will start in a few days for her summer home in New London, Connecticut, where she will join her husband, Major Darling. Mrs. Catherwood, the wife of Dr. Catherwood, is with her husband in Colorado. She was Miss Maude Fiske, daughter of Joseph Webb Fiske, one of the largest iron manufacturers in the East.

The Craze for Exclusiveness

I believe it is Mrs. Henry Scott who is pioneering the idea of having the buds come out in spring instead of during the winter season. The plan sounds revolutionary out here where it has never been tried, but it was given a preliminary canter at Newport last year and voted a success. Its main advantage, from the viewpoint of the projectors, is that it plugs up many holes through which aspirants for social honors manage to creep. If the girls come out in the spring then debuts must, of course, be held at the country houses, which would centralize things between Burlingame and Redwood. Garden parties and stable balls would be the mediums of introduction instead of the usual teas. "Under the winter schedule," say the advocates of the idea, "many of the nouveaux riches can give a big tea and it is hard to ignore their cards as one could for a dinner. These debutantes are launched with all the elat of the initiated and before we realize it they are really 'in it.' But if we have our girls come out at our country homes in the spring only people we really cared to know could expect to come." Students of logic would probably say that this is sievelike reasoning that won't hold water. It smacks of a real estate boom, for what would prevent people with debutante daughters from pitching their tents in Blingum in the spring. Mrs. Scott thinks that the plan should be tried next spring.

Saved by Miss Convere's Stockings

A novel and unheralded feature was introduced into Marie Wainwright's Orpheum sketch one night last week in the shape of a pair of Marion Convere's stockings. Not their usual shape, however, for they were adorning the angular shanks of a seventeenth century soldier of Britain. Art and a copious distribution of cotton-batting strove to produce the symmetrical contour of nature, but failed signally, and the graceful curves that might have been were not. Grant Wagner, assisting as a soldier, discovered as the sketch was about to be staged that his costume lacked a pair of stockings. The situation was made known to Miss Wainwright and stage-manager Morrisey and great was their pertubation. Unlike Kipling's soldiers, who captured a town clad only in their cartridge belts, a complete uniform is essential to the Cromwellian soldier on the stage. Mr. Morrisey suggested that he appear as a Gordon Highlander and had the property room searched for a kilt, but this ingenious makeshift met with strenuous objection from Miss Wainwright. Meanwhile the warrior was badly needed at the front. Presently came an inspiration. A messenger was hastily despatched to the Alcazar for hosiery of any sort, and Miss Convere, with self-sacrificing generosity, produced an attractive pair of her own, and back to the Orpheum scudded the messenger of hope, arriving just in time to avert a nervous breakdown on the part of Miss Wainwright, and to assist the much-harassed guardsman to fittingly array his nether limbs for active service.

They Learned to "Parley Vous"

Two well known San Franciscans are the sensation of the hour in Paris. When Mrs. Henshaw and Miss Grimes left here for Europe they did not plan a will o' the wisp flitting over the continent, but intended to live long enough in each country to absorb the "atmosphere." But eating spaghetti in Italy doesn't put one on reading terms with D'Annunzio, so the ladies decided that in la belle France they would enter a boarding school for young children and learn to parlez vous with the toddlers. They went to a private school where they were put in the receiving class. Mrs. Henshaw writes that the oldest child in the school was twelve and that the diet was such as was not likely to impair infantile digestion. But the ladies found mush and milk wholesome after the spiced "messes" of strange countries. They spent six months in the school, and the American colony in Paris doesn't know whether to laugh at them or follow their example.

Mrs. Stetson Ill

Mrs. J. B. Stetson submitted to a capital operation during the week. The family is very much alarmed over her condition, but none save Mr. Stetson is with her. Harry Stetson divides his time between the Oxnards and the Winslows. He has been the loyal cavalier of Miss Georgina Jones, daughter of Senator Jones who is sojourning in this city. However society does not take him seriously for he is somewhat of a social butterfly.

Precocious Jennie Crocker

An Eastern society scribe has catalogued Jennie Crocker as a next winter's debutante, which is, of course, absurd. Jennie Crocker is tall for her age, but she is still in the very early teens. Her playmates here were little Flossie Hopkins and Marian Zeile. These little cousins are still in knee 'kirties and more interested in roller skates than in cotillions. However, when Jennie Crocker was last out here to act as a flower girl at Mary Scott's wedding, she announced her intention of getting married just the minute she was half-past eighteen. "I'll come out when I'm eighteen," she said, to a friend of Mrs. Easton, "and it will take me six months to make up my mind which one of the men I meet I want to marry." It was suggested that it might take the gallant longer than that to gather up his courage to the proposing point. "Oh, I'll help him out," answered the precocious Miss Jennie, "Grandma says you have to sprinkle salt on their tails these days if you want to catch a husband." Which same has passed into a proverb down Blingum way.

It is worth while being inaccurate occasionally just to have attention called thereto by envious contemporaries who have ceased to be rivals, and who thereby expose their justifiable spleen. My contemporaries may be assured of my failure to observe their inaccuracies, for to search for them would involve the task of being dreadfully bored.

The Selby Family

Last Monday the wife of Admiral Kempf passed away. She was the daughter of the late Thomas H. Selby and one of a family which has always stood first in the commercial and social life of San Francisco. In the old days the Selbys were noted for their handsome entertainments. They owned the only house in town which possessed a genuine ball room, and in it were to be seen nearly all the distinguished people who visited San Francisco. Among their guests on one occasion was Prince Iwakura and members of the Japanese Embassy. To be sure the house was somewhat difficult of access, standing as it did upon a bluff high above the grade of Harrison street near Second. And the steps leading thereto were many and steep. But once inside the house the warm welcome extended and the brilliant scene compensated for the fatigue of the ascent, and an invitation to the Selbys was never refused.

The Admiral's Wedding

The marriage of Miss Cornelia Selby to Captain Louis Kempf, U. S. N., took place at the country home of the family at Fair Oaks in July, 1873, and was a gala affair. Mrs. Kempf's eldest sister is the wife of A. J. Ralston, and the youngest, Jennie, who was the beauty of the family, married Faxon Atherton, whose sister, formerly Mrs. Fred Macondray, is now the wife of Percy Selby. The eldest son of Admiral and Mrs. Kempf is an officer in the Navy, and another son is still at College. They had but one daughter, Miss Cornelia Kempf.

Draped His Desk with Flowers

Those who for thirty years have passed to and fro on Montgomery and Pine streets are familiar with the sign, "Holland Smith, Notary," at the head of the stone steps leading down into Mr. Smith's and George Goodman's offices in the Nevada Bank building. One morning last week the desk in the front office was draped with violets and lilacs, and a card bearing the announcement, "Holland Smith died April 8th," lay there. Mr. Smith was one of the best known figures down town, and in his time he held many public offices. At the death of Postmaster Perkins in 1862, Mr. Smith was appointed to succeed him and filled the unexpired term of more than two years. He was appointed notary by the Governor of California in 1865, and from that date until his reappointment in November of last year, he was regularly re-appointed every four years. Judge W. W. Morrow, a lifelong friend of the notary, delivered the eulogy at his funeral.

Mr. Smith was a lover of flowers and of music. One of his delights was the care of his home garden. During the musical season, he and his wife were constant attendants at the grand opera. The Commercial Club, of which he was honorary president, and which meets at Jules' restaurant the last Saturday in every month, met on Saturday the fifth, and gathering all the decorations of spring blossom and violets from the table placed them in the vacant chair, and afterward sent them out to the absent member. The members of this club are Joseph C. Campbell, Colonel F. E. Beck, William H. Metson, Marshall Hale, D. G. Scofield, Fred Koster, Clarence Walter, Samuel Ackerman and R. B. Hale. Mr. Smith leaves a widow, his aged mother Mrs. Nathaniel Holland, and two sisters, Mrs. Helen Carter and Mrs. Charles Pennell.

The Theory Sensational

The gossips are beginning to chatter over the mystery that has veiled the case of the two sisters who were critically ill and who are now convalescing. There are those who have suggested that the young women became discouraged on account of the crosses they had to bear and sought to put an end to it all. It is indeed a sad case and one that should be immune from gossip however plausible the various theories might appear. There should be nothing extraordinary about two refined and cultured women who had to put their unused shoulders to the wheel, collapsing. But Mrs. Grundy insists that Death was met more than half way. And there has been criticism of the relative who took them into his house, and after a few months made their stay impossible by introducing under the same roof his bon ami. It was, no doubt, this incident that gave color to the suicide theory.

Must Draw the Line Somewhere

Society is girding itself this summer to draw more taut the lines that divide the smart set from the "Has Beens" and "Never Wases," who are breaking through the fences. Half a dozen of the ultra exclusives have declared that unless the lists are expurgated they will not attend next season's cotillions. Mr. Greenway shaved off his lists last year by pretending to have lost the old list, and it was conspicuous that Mrs. Salisbury was there and the girls upon whom she has set the seal of her disapproval were not invited. But with all the trimming the list is still too democratic to appeal to some of the exclusionists, so there will probably be more pruning and an aftermath of heart ache. La Jeunesse is also programmed to put the brakes on and invitations will be sent by slow freight with due deliberation. It is creditable to the leaders of the swim that they have not been influenced by religious prejudices. Several members of the younger Jewish set have been admitted and are in good standing. Among them are Edgar Peixotto, the Rosenstock affiliation and the Sussmans. Miss Sussman is regarded as one of the greatest beauties in society. The Poniatowskis lent a friendly hand to the Sussmans, for Sussman pere angeled a Poniatowski business venture or two, and the Prince reciprocated with a social boost. However, the gratin du gratin are objecting not to the Jews but to their own people, who are believed to be a trifle too new. "We must draw the line somewhere" is their slogan.

A Comstock Social Incident

All of which reminds me of the attack of exclusiveness that struck Virginia City in the days of the Bonanza kings. The line was to be drawn at a big charity ball which was to be managed by the wife of one of the kings. She had a factotum in the person of a real Kentucky colonel, and he took up for her the cry of, "We must draw the line somewhere." And it was drawn at the poor and the ungodly, much to the indignation of the people of democratic spirit. Things began to hum, and it looked for awhile as though the Colonel would be treated to a little fancy shooting. But Jim Burns discouraged the bloodthirsty. He said it would be a shame to kill a man with such an educated thirst as that possessed by the Colonel. Burns had a good sense of humor, and he planned the revenge of the social outcasts. He took the Colonel in tow the day of the ball and that night when the lady patronesses arrived they found the Colonel stretched out at the entrance to the ball-room, in a drunken stupor. He was shaded by a canvas sign bearing the legend, "We must draw the line somewhere."

Samar Widows

A Manila correspondent writes me that they have a new name there for the Army women whose husbands are fighting at Leyte and Samar. They call them "the Samar widows." The "widows" are not killing themselves with grief in their husbands' absence, but, as my correspondent expresses it, "are having a pleasant wait, you bet. There's lots of fun to be obtained in Manila if you know how and where to find it. And it isn't all Army—there are others. The bickering and jealousies among the Army people," says my correspondent, "have grown to such proportions that it is absolutely ridiculous. No woman's reputation is safe with her calling acquaintances. She barely gets out of the door, after enjoying a sherbet at some other Army woman's house, when she is torn to chiffons by those left behind. The Regulars are as bad as the Volunteers, and the situation is one that seems impossible of remedy. General Jim Smith makes his headquarters in Tacloban. When he first went there he ordered all of the Army women off of Samar and Leyte, leaving only civilians on those islands."

Scarcity of Dancing Women

While in our swim it is a lack of dancing men that is deplored, on the islands near Manila, where there are only a few white women residents, it is a paucity of feminine terpsichorean experts that gives cause for weeping. One of the high officials gave a ball some time ago and all of the eligible senoritas were invited. But the American officers outside of Manila do not take kindly to the dusky-hued belles, and would not ask them to dance. They stood around the walls trying not to look bored, but their acting was not successful. The few "white" girls present had all the partners they wanted.

In Good Society

Johnny Lawson, the polo player, carries a copy of Rosebery's "Life of Napoleon" around under his arm and explains that while he has it with him he is sure that he is in good society. As Mr. Lawson spends most of his time at Burlingame I fear that there is a sinister meaning in his explanation.

The Arrival at Cannes

Though Mr. Thomas Lipton was the center of a most cosmopolitan and festive crowd, I am glad that I was a stranger and unexpected consequently, he regarded me with curiosity and the keen dart his attention gave to the Press. The incredible that people were hoping to get more in the form of getting authentic information regarding Sir Thomas's visit to Switzerland must have had a terrific influence on the possible. From the other ports of disembarking a party about to embark, I am informed that The Gazette, through an agent in Paris, procured much more news, should "Shamrock" be beaten than have either Chas. Levy, Jr. obtained on his behalf of a newspaper. The friends of Sir Thomas who are on the wall of the pier, all anxious to see the Boats that Sir Lipton which he has been making his previous trips inspired the enthusiastic crowds, Etc. They are presenting all sorts of emotions, enthusiastic, and then hope I express the sentiments of having Sir Thomas Lipton in the harbor of Cannes. Their Majesty appears to be much the worse for the Mediterranean all night's rest. Personally, Sir Thomas is an indefatigable Athlete, and an exemplary character in private life.

The Shattuck Ruling

It was remarked, on all sides at the Princess Theatre yesterday, on the initial outings presented by the ever popular Shattuck Stock Company. Miss Edith Hall presented her admirable talents. Miss Lorna Owen and Miss Chesterfield being very well and also actively supplied. Miss Grace Hamilton and Miss Vera Dunn, with many well-known faces, also contributed their share to Shattuck's many big successes. It is certainly worth the trouble of a short journey to visit the Princess Theatre and see the Shattuck Stock Company in their exciting specialties.

Ring for Fashion

Fashion gave an entertainment in Carnegie Lecture Hall last night at the same time that there was a meeting of the Ontario Medical Association. Fashion's audience was much larger than that of the medical men. Why? Because Fashion's name was on everybody's lips. Why? Because Fashion's name was on everybody's lips. Why? Because Fashion's name was on everybody's lips

Poets Sing to Bromley

[All wit has not fled from Bohemia. The commercial element dominates, but it has not crowded out all the genius that has made San Francisco's leading club famous. Last Saturday the annual dinner in honor of "Uncle" George Bromley was given at the club, and some very clever papers were read. "Uncle" George, be it known, is the incarnation of the true Bohemian spirit. When he dies his features may be perpetuated in bronze and his head substituted for the owl as the club's emblem. But it is feared that "Uncle" George may take it into that head to live forever. He reached his eighty-fifth year last Monday, and he is the most marvelous man of his years in the world. He has the bouyancy of spirits of a youth of twenty, and he is incessantly bubbling over with bonhomie. He can fan the flame of conviviality for more hours on a stretch than the youngest of 'em, and he has not yet discovered that he is in the possession of a liver.—Ed.]

There were several original poems read at the Bromley dinner. This was contributed for the occasion by Louis A. Robertson:

Time's record shows, when closely conned,
  Fair women and brave men
Who loved and laughed long years beyond
  The Psalmist's three-score-ten.
With added age they seemed to thrive
  And did their youth renew;
The God who keeps the saint alive
  Preserves the sinner, too.

We bar the patriarchs who trod
  The earth before the flood;
And Mammon's slavish sons who plod
  Through life with stagnant blood;
Sainted or sordid never feel
  The pulse with rapture rife,
When Hebe's rich, red lips reveal
  The lore that lengthens life.

That secret murmured in the breeze
  That kissed the crested tide
When Cytherea trod the seas,
  And it has never died.
To Dionysius it was told
  And in his flagon flushed
When from the purple grapes of old
  Its meaning first was crushed.

It taught the Teian and he laughed
  At Chronos' dismal chime;
It rippled from the cup he quaffed
  In many a glowing rhyme;
Venus and Bacchus at each shrine
  He worshiped oft and long,
Saw Beauty blushing in the wine
  And crowned her with a song.

It makes the heart beat wild and warm
  In many a snowy breast;
Ninon de l'Enclos and Delorme
  Were courted and caressed
When nigh a hundred years had passed;
  In revel and romance
They held in homage till the last
  The royal rakes of France.

Why ponder over pagan creed,
  Or Epicurus' cult,
Or in Time's rusty roster read,
  Or Pleasure's page consult,
When in the living flesh we see,
  Lusty and all alive,
One who has climbed the years till he Sits throned on Eighty-five.

Bohemia's bards his triumphs sing,
  Her sons and sages raise
Their voices till the rafters ring
  And echo back his praise;
They love the Genius of their joys,
  The Master of their mirth—
Mirth that no malice e'er alloys,
  And Wit with Wisdom's worth;

Their King of Revels who can drive
  Their grief and gloom away;
Their Priest of Pleasure who can shrive
  Their thirsting souls next day;
Hesper may herald in the feast,
  The glasses clink and foam
Till Eos flushes in the East
  And all have wandered home.

Then fresh as one whose night has passed
  In slumber till the dawn,
He lingers on until the last
  Bold bacchanal has gone;
He proves that Pleasure's cup may bring
  A blessing, not a blight;
For him it holds no adder's sting,
  But Life's elixir bright.

And so he laughs at Time, who lays
  On him the lightest load,
And when in Pleasure's path he strays
  He finds few thorns to goad;
His is the best philosophy,
  The wisdom that outwears
All other creeds, and we shall see
  Him live a hundred years.

Now let the jest and laughter lull,
  The glasses cease to clink,
The Owl who sits on Sorrow's skull
  Gives you this toast to drink:
We've seen him turn night into day,
  December into June,
May the Lord love him long, we pray,
  Nor call for him too soon."

Peter Robertson of the Chronicle sent the following effusion from his own pen:

In days all dim and distant now,
Some five and twenty years agone,
When first I took Bohemian vow,
Of "One for all and all for one,"
I mind me of the merry crew
The clinking glass, the joyous rout,
The laugh that ever broke anew
And Uncle George's voice trolled out,
  Easy, my man, easy!

We loved him then; the grizzled head
The genial face, the kindling eye,
The smile that radiance seemed to shed
Like sunlight from a summer sky;
And whatsoe'er the feud or fight,
The tinge of bitterness died out,
The argument of wrong or right,
All ended when his voice trolled out,
  Easy, my man, easy!

The years have come, the years have gone,
Bohemia, grown to rich estate,
No longer fears persistent dun,
Nor dreads the Sheriff at the gate.
But still we know the merry crew,
The clinking glass, the joyous rout,
The laugh that ever breaks anew,
And Uncle George's voice trolls out,
  Easy, my man, easy!

The kindly hand-grasp just as warm;
The brotherhood; the gentle thought;
The fellow-feeling's simple charm,
Only in wider circle taught.
And young hearts, like the old, now beat
For Uncle George. A louder shout
Than erst on Sacramento street
Gives chorus when his voice trolls out,
Easy, my man, easy!

Ah! not alone to us the truth,
The lesson of his life, may reach
Through all the world, for age as youth,
A gentle soul may something teach.
In him Bohemia's spirit dwells,
Through all the years we've heard it call;
And in this simple strain there dwells
The true philosophy of all—
Easy, my man, easy!

The fight for fortune, craze for power,
The pain of struggle and of strife
For station that may last an hour;
Brief triumph of the strenuous life;
The rich man, worn with nameless fears,
The poor man broken in the rout,
But wearing five and four-score years,
Our Uncle George's voice trolls out,
Easy, my man, easy!

Four-score and five? I could not tell.
The kindling eye, the crown of snow,
The genial face I knew as well,
Ay! five and twenty years ago.
May the years lightly on him rest!
May every hour its pleasure bring!
The world loves him who loves it best,
His song to Father Time we sing,
Easy, my man, easy!

From New York came the following verses contributed by Clay M. Greene, an old member of the Bohemian Club:

The Northwest wind rattles blind and sash, and taps on my window pane,
And a voice on the breeze thro' the swaying trees disturbs me again and again.
My fingers refuse to my pen guide on to things that the piper pays,
So I cast it aside like a prayer denied, and list what the wild wind says.
It reminds me again that Bohemia's chief hath a missive dispatched to me,
To bid to a feast from the nether East, good friends that are kin with ye.
For we all are kin in that merry world where fellowship holds full sway
And where man loves man on the only plan that can live in the soul alway.
There are loves and loves, there are ties and ties, in a line that hath got no end;
But there lives no bond that's as true and fond as the love a friend bears friend.
And a voice calls out thro' the Northwest wind tonight, from that far-off sea,
And I hear it say: "'Tis the natal day of a friend dear as life to ye,
O ye wand'rers afar from Bohemia's shrine where a Bromley we feast tonight;
So speed us a word that ye all be heard in the din of our heart's delight."
Let labor who will in the endless grind for the dross that shall give us bread;
I shall wield my pen that the best of men may be sure that my love's not dead.
For I love him as well as he e'er was loved; I shall love him until he die;
And my pen shall say from this far away as the Northwest wind doth sigh:
Take all of my heart if it be to you the kind of a heart you'd own,
For there lives no wraith in its boundless faith, and it beats for its loves alone.
I know that the heart which hath too much pride in the things that are born of trust
Is a feeble thing in the endless swing of the hordes swayed by money's lust;
I know that the voice that would sing the songs of a limitless Friendship's power,
Hath a lack of pluck for the run of luck that comes where the fortunes tower,
But I care no whit for the taunts of men who would fetter their hearts with gold,
While I bask in the truth and the endless youth of a heart that can ne'er turn cold.
And most of that heart with its youth and truth, dear George, are for you tonight:—
May this natal day be the sign alway of a love that is ever bright;
May the hearts of the friends that with you today, and the spirits of dear ones lost,
Unite in a feast that from West to East shall be rich as a nation's cost.
Be these eighty and five of your honored years but the heralds of more to be,
And I ask but this: on this night of bliss waste but one little thought on me.
And if it feel half of the garnered store I hold in my heart for you,
Then we both are blest in the peace and rest that can come of two friendships true.

Ed Townsend of Chimmie Fadden fame, who formerly belonged to the local newspaper push sent these lines from the Lambs' Club:

But eighty five?
(Why, man alive
How sweet alive you are!)
Your distant friends
And "distance lends"—
(A moment at the bar.)
I sought to say
(You know the way
One's thoughts are turned aside)
But on this day
(Yes, Frank: the same.)
We drink to (blame
Me not. The boys insist,
I can't resist)
We drink to (How!
Long life to him!)
We drink (I halt,
'Tis not my fault
We must repeat)
We drink to sweet
Uncle George.

The Oil Boom Frauds

Now that the oil boom is over, the rottenness of a good deal of it is coming to the surface. Some of the biggest promoters have failed, and others have retired. The courts are filled with litigation resulting from fradulent sales of stock, and from the frantic endeavors of dupes to recover some of the money they paid for shares in oil companies which have petered out. A good sample of the way in which many of the California oil companies have been managed is found in a tale of woe in ten typewritten pages of complaint made by a stockholder in the Puente Crude Oil Company. The Puente Company was incorporated three years ago with a capital stock of $3,000,000. The next year it bought property for $55,000, and sold $65,000 worth of stock. It put down a well eight feet, and then quit for lack of funds, and a $5,000 debt. This $5,000 was paid J. B. Bushnell, secretary of the Puente Oil Company, for additional oil land in Kings county. The generous directors also threw in a hundred thousand shares of the company's treasury stock. Last year Secretary Bushnell and Vice-President Beveridge issued an order for the company to sell 1,500,000 shares of the capital stock at a cent a share. This netted the company $9,800, but now although no work has been done, there is only $1,500 in the treasury. John T. Kiernan bought a few chunks of the stock at 10 to 15 cents a share, but when the market was flooded with the shares at a cent, Kiernan found his shares worth even less than that. These revelations are all of the kind of those made in suits brought against many other companies. The fact is that today a man who invests in oil stock is a fool. Good, producing oil companies are not selling shares, and those that are not producing are too big a risk for the average investor. California has lost much more than it has gained by the oil boom, for a reputation for dishonesty and false representations has been made in the East, and in Europe, as well as here, which will take long to live down.

Demand for Investment Bonds

As I predicted weeks ago, the flooding of the local money market with cash through the purchase of the Market Street Railway by Eastern capitalists, has resulted in a strong demand for investment bonds. San Franciscans and Californians in general, who seek a good and safe income through investments in Pacific Coast securities, have kept the local brokers busy for a fortnight past and have made these dealers some neat commissions. The Sierra Railway Company's bonds have attracted many since the disbursement of funds by the United Railways Company, and the bonds have appreciated rapidly. Ten days ago there were sales of $2,000 worth at 113, and the next day $4,000 more at the same rate. When it is remembered that these sales were the first during 1902, and that during 1901 only $2,000 worth were sold, and these at 110, the sudden craving for Sierra is better weighed. There were some sales at 115 on April eleventh, when $10,000 worth of bonds were let go at that figure. Of course this was just the day before the semi-annual coupon cutting of $3, but on April thirteenth $4,000 worth sold between 112 and 113. At this writing the bonds are being held at from 114 to 115, and may go higher. I do not think these bonds a superior security. The total issue is $642,000, and they bear six per cent. interest, maturing in 1837. The Sierra road runs from Oakdale to Carters in Tuolumne county, a distance of fifty-eight miles, with a nineteen mile branch from Jamestown to Angels. Certainly one would be venturesome to pay over 115 for these bonds, although the six per cent. is very alluring in these times of ready money and low interest.

The Stock and Bond Exchange

On the Stock and Bond Exchange during the week it was said that the good earnings of the Sierra company's road and its excellent prospects brought the bonds of the company into a favorable light. Sacramento Electric, Gas and Railway 5 per cents were still in favor and the bonds ruled steady at the closing figures of last week. Southern Pacific and other Coast railway bonds were taken freely at maintained prices. The favorable reports at the annual meeting of the Contra Costa Water Company had a stimulating effect upon values for the company's securities and numerous blocks of stocks changed hands at a slight improvement in values. Spring Valley Water Company's shares were rather overlooked and as there were more offers to sell than there were buyers a marked recession in values resulted. Shares of the gas companies were quiet but values ruled quite steady. Sugar stocks continued dull and neglected and Hutchison Plantation shares were offered at lower prices. The Onomea Sugar Company has declared a dividend at the rate of 20c. a share, amounting to $10,000 payable on May 5th, and it is reported that a dividend will be paid monthly thereafter. The last previous dividend of this company was paid in April, 1901, and was at 25c. a share. Rumor has it that several of the other Sugar companies will follow the lead of the Onomea Plantation and resume their monthly dividends; if this be true business in sugar shares will doubtless show a marked increase. Alaska Packers' Association shares were in favor at sustained prices, as were the securities of both the California Fruit Canners' Association and the California Wine Association.

Bonds amounting to $6,000,000 consisting of 6,000 bonds of a par value of $1,000 each, bearing interest at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum, and due in forty years from the date of issue, are shortly to be issued by the North Shore Railroad Company. The funds secured by the issue will be used to make the extensive improvements contemplated by the directors of the company.

At the annual meeting of the Contra Costa Water Company the old Board of Directors was re-elected: A. Hayward, C. C. Bemis, E. J. McCutcheon, A. H. Winn, A. W. Rose, Thomas Pheby and W. J. Dingee. The showing for the year amounts to about $488,000 above operating expenses and the total gross receipts were $773,975.

The following dividends were payable during the week: Bank of California, quarterly, $4 per share; California Safe Deposit and Trust Company, quarterly, $1.50; Contra Costa Water Company, monthly, 42c.; Port Costa Water Company, monthly, 30c.; Presidio and Ferries Railroad Company, monthly, 30c. (raised from 20c); Oakland, Gas Light and Heat Company, monthly, 25c.; Pacific States Telephone and Telegraph Company, quarterly, $1.50; California Fruit Canners' Association, monthly, 60c.

There has been some active trading in Oil shares on the Exchange during the week, Petroleum Center, Sterling and Sovereign being the preferred stocks. Sterling was particularly active and sold at higher prices, many sellers demanding time in turning over the stock. Several thousand Sovereign shares sold at good prices while values for Petroleum Center recovered some from last week's sharp depreciation owing to the more liberal request for stock. Offerings were large but there were sufficient buyers to prevent any weakness.

Business in fuel oil is steadily improving and conditions are becoming gradually more favorable to producers. The Pacific Oil Transportation Company has been incorporated to freight California fuel oil across the seas. A contract has been secured by the company to carry 4,500,000 barrels to the Hawaiian Islands. This order calls for an expenditure of at least $1,000,000 and is only a beginning of what promises to be a most important element in the ocean carrying trade of San Francisco.

The Powell street cable six per cent. bonds have been rather inactive for a long time, but during the week an offer was made on the Exchange to sell $100,000 worth at 120. Later, $100,000 worth of Market street cable fives were offered at 130. Although offers of such magnitude rather nonplussed the members of the Exchange, they show the way in which the wind is blowing here. San Francisco is fast getting to be the centre of investment activities west of Chicago, and members of the Exchange look for a lively business during the next year.

STAGE

Apropos Burlesque

Fischer's Theatre has "caught on." It doesn't take the theatre-goers of this city long to discover that there is a good show in town. The opening of the new theatre was unpropitious but when the management put on "Fiddle Dee Dee," the news that there was a crackerjack show on the boards spread like wildfire, and now the talent is playing to crowded houses. There is room for a good burlesque theatre of the Weber & Field's order in San Francisco, and the pity is that Fischer's is not larger. The fame and popularity of Emerson's minstrels years ago were due largely to the burlesque afterpieces. Clever burlesque is always amusing, and it is not necessary to send to New York for the skits and the themes. There are abundant themes for burlesque writers in San Francisco, and the writers are here, too. But it isn't a bad idea to educate the people in that form of entertainment by borrowing from Weber & Field's for awhile. The essential concomitants of a successful burlesque show are a good chorus, a good orchestra and a talented stage manager. Fischer's appears to be well supplied with talent. Kolb and Dill, the German comedians, are imitations of Weber and Field and they have been playing the Weber & Field productions in the East for years. They are equal in every sense to the originals. Barney Bernard, the Hebrew comedian, is the best ever seen in this city. He compares favorably with Dave Warfield. Maud Amber, the prima donna, is well suited to the show, though she is not a rival of Lillian Russell. She is more on the Marie Dressler order. Her voice is lacking in cultivation but it is a good strong organ. She would be more attractive if her gowns showed fewer signs of wear and tear. The most charming woman in the company is Lillian Coleman, a San Francisco girl by the way, and a granddaughter of the late Senator Patrick Reddy. She was with "The Burgomaster" company for two years. It is unfortunate that she has not more to do in the piece. Her two songs are a great hit, especially "The Girl that Leads the Band." She would get several encores for this every night if the stage manager would kindly prohibit the comedians from rushing on and taking her applause. Surely they have the centre of the stage long enough. The other night the audience forced them off, and when Barney Bernard reached the wings he sulked and remarked to one of the chorus that it was the first time he had ever been "crowded off." Poor fellow! He is like all actors, wrapped in their selfish conceit, eager to be the whole show, and reluctant to share applause even with one of the gentle sex. It is unfortunate that the stage breeds bad manners, but lucky for the profession that the people on the other side of the footlights cannot see their idols as their associates see them.

They Reek of the Road

The California theatre continues to give prestige to shows that reek of the road. A one-night stand show can afford to play a week or two to empty benches at the California, for then when it strikes the cow-paths the rustics are told that the company held the boards at a swell San Francisco playhouse for two whole weeks. But as you can't fool the people all the time the rustics will eventually fight shy of California theatre productions. I regret to see the California going the way of all the old Bush street playhouses. It is a cosy theatre but a little too far on the line. Yet its prestige might have been maintained by judicious management. It is easy to kill a house by accepting the temptation of a large percentage from a cheap company. Manager Lilinghouse having been identified with so many theatrical failures should have learned something from experience. And I am surprised that the lessors of the theatre do not protest as they did on the occasion when an attempt was made to produce an obscene French farce there. At that time it was said that they reserved in the lease the right to bar a bad show.

Simplicity that Scores

That simple maiden in "The Professor's Love Story" is an interesting combination of charming naivete and worldly wisdom. In creating her Mr. Barrie must have had in view one of those up-to-date typists, or the ingenuous girlie of the song that wore her golden hair a-hanging down her back. Lucy White, the professor's secretary, is not as artless or as guileless as she looks. No sensible wife would permit her husband to employ such a simple maiden, for she would be quite sure that he would be eating lunch with her the second day. But the professor was unmarried, and his sister of the barbed-wire-fence variety was away. So Lucy toyed uninterruptedly with her absent-minded boss. He didn't take her out to lunch because he wasn't that sort of a professor. He was content to make goo goo eyes at her until he couldn't stand her witchery any longer, and felt that he had to have a more intimate acquaintanceship. So he proposed marriage, but not until she had worked herself into his arms in a fictitious faint, and set his soul on fire. That kind of a simple maiden doesn't fall in love with an old man with a bank account, but for dramatic purposes Lucy White will suffice. It is a very sweet and charming story and Mr. Willard is more acceptable in the role of the Professor than in that of the Cardinal. He is a master of the comedian's tricks. Miss O'Malley plays the simple maiden with the naturalness of a typist bent on earning a sealskin sack.

No play that has been produced in years has attracted more favorable comment than "El Gran Galeoto," or "The Power of Slander," lately produced by Howard Kyle under the successful management of E. L. Sackett. The play is on somewhat Ibsenesque lines, simple and undecorated but full of power. Mr. Sackett feels worthily pleased at the success of his season's star and play.

The Goodwins in their last season's success, "When We Were Twenty-one," will follow Willard at the Columbia. One wonders if Goodwin ever saw Willard as "David Garrick," a part the former once essayed but without gaining favor of the critics. Willard, on the contrary, originally put "Garrick" on as a stopgap in his repertory but it is now considered one of his greatest roles.

Little Baby Keife, who will have a benefit tomorrow night, is one of the child dancers who promises to become better known when years and experience shall have matured her talents. She is a pretty little thing, charmingly original, and as simply childlike and modest as if she had never been within a league of the footlights.

Edward Harrigan, who comes to the Grand on the twenty-eighth, played a long engagement at the California a good many years ago. He is a comedian absolutely unique, and his comedies are very truthful pictures of certain phases of American life. He will open in "Old Lavender."

Lillian Elliott has made a hit as the cook lady in "Why Smith Left Home" at the Alcazar. This is the more remarkable since there were many who predicted failure for any one taking this role after Jennie Yeamans, its originator. But Miss Elliott has a remarkable talent for character work.

One of the features of the Bakersfield carnival and street fair to be given from May third to May tenth will be a Supervisors and Municipal day on which all of the county officers and members of the boards of trustees will be invited to be present.

Director Steindorff comes in for a lot of praise for his fine baton work in "The Fortune Teller." "The Singing Girl" is underlined for next, but its coming is evidently afar off judging from the present opera's drawing power.

At the Show Next Week

COLUMBIA—E. S. Willard in "David Garrick" and "Tom Pinch"; both highly spoken of by Eastern critics.

ALCAZAR—"The Two Escutcheons," a clever American satire by Sydney Rosenfeld that had a long run in the East.

GRAND OPERA HOUSE—Last week of Melbourne MacDowell and Florence Stone, whose engagement has been a record-breaker. Repertory—"Cleopatra," "Theodora," "Fedora"; special Thursday matinee of "Gismonda," and "La Tosca."

TIVOLI—Third week of the extraordinary success, "The Fortune Teller," which the town comes in crowds to hear.

FISCHER'S—Third week of "Fiddle Dee Dee"; packed houses every night.

ORPHEUM—Milton and Dollie Nobles in the former's latest sketch, "A Lesson in Harmony"; the Wilton brothers, triple horizontal bar experts, and the brothers Knight, singers, dancers and talkers; first appearance here of Susie Fisher, girl baritone; holdovers, the Petching brothers, the pretty English Pony ballet, the Winters and Mortons, with the biograph.

CENTRAL—"A Child of Fortune," sterling melodrama.

A POPULAR SALESMAN WITH M. J. KELLER CO.

Not every man can combine two occupations and be equally as proficient in each. Yet occasionally one meets a man who possesses this rare ability and slights neither of his professions, doing his duty to both. Such a one is Professor Puckett, whose dancing academy is one of the best and most select in San Francisco. The academy, which for the past eight years has been patronized by the most prominent families in the Mission, is conducted in Mission Opera Hall, Mission street between Seventeenth and Eighteenth. The classes meet every Tuesday and Friday evening, select socials occurring on the first Friday in each month. At these socials new figures of the cotillion and novelties are introduced. Every Tuesday and Friday evening Professor Puckett may be found at his academy by those desiring his instructions, or he may be addressed at his residence, 3555 Seventeenth street. At other times, during commercial hours, the Professor may be found at the M. J. Keller Co., manager gentlemen's tailoring department.

The service at the Puritan Dining Room, 413 Market street, leaves nothing to be desired for neatness and quickness. This restaurant easily stands among the best in the city for pure foods and ideal service.

MOORE'S
Poison Oak Remedy

Cures Poison Oak and all Skin Diseases. It has been used successfully for the last twenty years and thousands will testify to its curative quality. It is a specific for Poison Oak. AT ALL DRUGGISTS.

Milton and Dollie Nobles, who are in the Orpheum's bill next week, have any number of friends in San Francisco. Milton made fame and fortune from his great melodrama "The Phoenix" and nobody will ever forget that he was the originator of "The villain still pursued her."

Priceless Portraits

I wonder what ever became of all the treasures that Fanny Davenport kept in her house in Forty-fifth street, New York city? For one thing she had a priceless lot of photographs and portraits. The walls of her living-room were papered in maroon velvet, and on these were hung the faces of well-known footlight favorites. She had a photograph of Rachel, fragile and passionate in feature and pose. Then there were Mrs. O'Neil, very Irish in feature; Mrs. Abington, the original Lady Teazle; Madamoiselle Mars, the beautiful Parisian; a crayon head of Parepa Rosa; Peg Woffington, big-nosed but chic; Siddons, Garrick, Gustave Dore, Wilkie Collins, Dejazet, Forrest as King Lear. One big photograph of Clara Morris was taken in San Francisco.

Reminiscence of Fanny and Dickens

I was talking the other day with a man who had known Fanny Davenport when she was a girl and he told me many interesting things about Melbourne MacDowell's late wife. When Fanny was a child she conceived a great admiration for Dickens' books, and especially was Little Nell a favorite. Full of enthusiasm, she wrote to the author, thanking him for the great pleasure his creations had given her. When Fanny was ten years old her father, E. L. Davenport, gave her a set of Dickens' works as then published, and it was then she wrote to the author. She said, "I'll have a play made from all your books and never play any parts but the beautiful characters you have created." And when Charles Dickens came to America, one of the first letters he wrote was: "If the Miss Davenport receiving this is the Fanny Davenport who wrote a long letter some years ago to Mr. Dickens, will she give him the opportunity of thanking her for the child's gift he has never forgotten." Fanny Davenport considered this letter as much one of her choicest treasures as the diamonds which, after her death, her husband is said to have given to Blanche Walsh.

When Clara Usurped Fanny's Place

It was in the play of "Man and Wife," by Wilkie Collins, that Clara Morris obtained a chance to show what she could do. Fanny Davenport had been cast for the leading role but one day at rehearsal she threw down her play-book and refused to go on, saying the part was beneath her. Augustin Daly was wild, for the play had been announced and he knew no amount of reasoning would avail with his star when she had made up her mind. Then timidly spoke up one of the walking ladies, a pale, meagre-framed little woman with an atrocious accent. "Let me try the part," she suggested. Daly could see nothing but a jest in the words of the plain little woman, but finally consented to let her try the part at one rehearsal. Her success was followed by her allotment to the role and ultimate triumph before the public, when Clara Morris became even greater than the great Fanny Davenport.

The Understudy

Showing how a very sentimental society girl was cured of her penchant for a matinee idol.

A pretty young Society Girl with more Money and Time than she knew what to Do with conceived a Tender Passion for the Leading Man at a Theatre. She spent a Large Slice of her Income on Tickets for the Matinees at which he Appeared, and on Flowers ordered sent to his Dressing Room. She wasted Reams of monogrammed Note Paper and Boxes of scented Envelopes in Passionate Cries from the Heart directed at her Ideal Lover, and wept Oceans of Tears because none of them brought forth any Response.

Finally she fell into a Melancholy State from brooding on the Hopelessness of her Passion, and even a Proposal of Marriage from a Millionaire's Son failed to banish the Blues. Her state became so Terribly Sad that, when even the gift of a Smart Trap higher than those of any of her Chums and a French Bull Terrier with a Pedigree twenty leagues long did not even awaken a Smile on her pale lips, her Mother became Alarmed and called in the Family Physician. After explaining the Reason of her daughter's Illness, the poor mother sighed deeply and said:

"What shall I do?"

"Is the man Married?" asked the Physician, "Is there any hope of his being Bought for your Daughter?"

"Alas, no!" returned the Mother, "I have already worked the case along that Line. He is not only Married, but devotedly attached to his Wife—and five children."

The old doctor pondered for a few seconds, then he slapped his Thighs with Joy. An Idea had occurred to him.

"Wait until Tomorrow," he said, "and I think we'll Fix it all right. By the way, does your Daughter know anything about Acting?"

"Oh, yes," answered the Mother, wondering however what that had to do with the Case; "she is very Clever at it. She belonged to a Charity Company of Amateurs, and only a short time ago made a Great Hit as Camille in a production for the benefit of the Society for the Promulgation of Marriage and Music among the Hullabooloos."

As the Physician went away the Mother, with a Big Beaming Smile on her lips, went to the bookcase and rooted out the Fat Scrap Book that contained her Daughter's array of Press Notices when she was a Clever Society Amateur and before she had conceived the Hopeless Passion for the Leading Man.

A week later, the actors and actresses at rehearsal at the Petite Theatre were much surprised to see a New Woman in the Leading Feminine Role of the play in which appeared the Handsome Leading Man.

"I wonder who she is?" they asked, "and why, when they were getting a New Leading Lady, didn't they get one who knew how to Act?"

"Oh, it's an Understudy," returned a more sophisticated actor, "probably a Dresser elevated for one night only."

As for the Understudy, she was in a Seventh Heaven of Delight, for this was to her the Chance of a Lifetime.

She was the Beautiful Heroine of the Play. He, her Hero of Dreams and Real Life, was the Hero of the Drama. There was one act in which he had to kiss her—Passionately—and Clutch her to his Breast. She had gone over it all with the Leading Lady that morning and she was Happier than any Queen. "Don't spoil any of his Scenes by being Awkward," she had been cautioned. It was a Useless Precaution. What! she spoil any of His scenes? She would Crawl through her own part on her Hands and Knees rather.

She came to Rehearsal with her Heart beating with Rapture. She left the Theatre disillusioned and with only a Clay-Footed Idol pictured in her Mind.

That Unshaven, Unshorn Creature, with carelessly tied necktie, shirt wrinkled and spotted, was that the Handsome Leading Man?

"He's got an Awful Bad One on today," whispered one of the Walking Ladies, and "Drunker than a Lord," said the Prompter.

"Why, he's quite Old," murmured the Understudy.

"Yes, he must be about fifty or thereabouts," returned the Prompter, "but He makes up well."

"And he appears to lack Refinement," said the Understudy.

"Most actors do," said the Prompter.

"Are there not many Gentlemen on the stage?" asked the Understudy.

"No," said the Prompter. "When a man Spends most of his Time crowding people off the Centre and trying to steal the Fat from the Leading Lady and Flirting with Himself in the Mirror and letting other men Buy drinks for him to testify to their Admiration it is Hard for him to keep his Gentlemanly Instincts alive and in Good Working Order."

The Understudy quit her Job on the Spot and became a Society Girl once more. The next day the Leading Lady received a cheque in Three Figures and a cluster of American Beauties.

Moral—The Glare of the Calcium is deceptive, so to know a Matinee Idol as he Is you must see him in the Light of Day, or when He is being Sued for Divorce by a Disillusioned Wife.

—The Call Boy.

Julia Arthur, who is now Mrs. Cheney, and who arrived in this city the other day, made her first hit in San Francisco with the Palmer company at the Baldwin. That was one of the strongest companies that ever visited this city, but it was a frost. At that time Alice Rix was roasting the Baldwin in the Examiner. The company included Wilton Lackaye, Madeline Bouton and May Brookyn. It was during that engagement that May Brookyn committed suicide in this city. When Julia Arthur retired from the stage to marry a wealthy railroad man, she presented all her costumes and scenery for "As You Like It" to Henrietta Crosman. Alan Dale subsequently remarked that Miss Crosman made better use of them than Miss Arthur ever did.

A Book of Humor

"Around the Pan" is a piece of most excellent fooling. "Uncle Hank," a backwoods New England farmer makes a visit to the Pan American Exposition, clad in his countrified garments, and accompanied by his umbrella and old-fashioned carpet bag, and becomes as interesting an exhibit as there is to be found on the grounds. He is bent on seeing the whole show, and getting a dime's worth for every nickel he parts with, and the reader who accompanies him is sure of full value for his money, and plenty of fun, besides a little information picked up by the way. "Uncle Hank Slocum" is a loquacious individual, not backward about asking or imparting information or taking a hand in anything that is going on. His shrewd comments and jocular and epigrammatic speeches place him in the same rank as David Harum, and when the laug.. is on him he enjoys it as much as anyone else. It is not necessary to the appreciation of the book that one should have attended the exposition at Buffalo, for ever since the Chicago Fair the same features have been repeated in the main at all the big shows, and any one will answer for all. The fun, which consists largely in chaffing and joshing the people in charge of the various exhibits, is all spontaneous, clean, healthy and wholesome. It is rarely that anything of this kind is so absolutely free from any trace of vulgarity, and the illustrations, of which there are one or more to the page, are as good as the rest of it. If the book made pretensions to anything more than fun, one might question why, when Uncle Hank resurrects the old "memory's aid" to recalling the colors of the rainbow, he should give it as "vibyor instead of "Vibgyor," omitting so prominent a color as green, with the rainbow in full view to prompt him; and one might also inquire what advantage is gained in a dialect by changing the spelling of words whose sounds cannot be affected, as for example, beginning Custer with a "K," or changing conceit to conseet. But little matters of this kind will not interfere with the enjoyment to be had out of the trials and triumphs of this typical Yankee. The book ought to have an immense sale among all classes, and especially those who enjoy comic papers. The frontispiece is an excellent portrait of the late President McKinley, surmounted by the name and two stars, all executed in one continuous line.

Donnybrook Tactics

Apparently the twentieth century style of literary criticism is to be after the manner of the famous Donnybrook Fair—"When you see a head, take a whack at it." Francis Graham, in Westminster Review, has been having a turn at another of the gods, and characterizes Mathew Arnold as "not a man of the world, no psychologist, and unable to reason from cause to effect." One may not like to stand by and see his favorite author belabored, especially when the author is in no position to answer back, but it is a healthier sign of the times than that which has so long prevailed, of indiscriminate praise and wholesale flattery. The new criticism is not to be confounded with the "old blackguard slating" which prevailed in the early and middle years of the last century, and was more often an expression of personal spite than calm consideration of literary qualities, and indeed, was often based on matters entirely apart from literature. In these times we have learned that it is possible to admire a man, and yet not adore his books, or we may admire the books and despise the man. The tendency to write "Little Lord Fauntleroy" eulogies of authors who have been popular with their friends and the reading public was so overdone that it is only natural for some one to investigate and proclaim the statue a man, with faults and failings. There is nothing to cause excitement in this new development and no necessity for calling out the fire brigade. In the long run, no author's character, nor even his reputation will suffer. It is the inflated balloon that tempts the use of the pin. Those over-zealous friends who feel a call to fly to print in defense of their idols would do well to ponder the aphorism of the Gilbert and Sullivan opera, "Where everybody is somebody, nobody is anybody."

Pencil Marks in Books

Some one says: "There is a subtle sympathy produced by marked passages. Put faint pencil marks, then lend the volume, and you will know your fate." Marked passages are all right in their proper places, and that is in volumes privately owned, and marked by the owner; but there is no greater specimen of gratuitous impertinence than that displayed by marking books belonging to others, whether they be private or public property. It is quite evident that the average borrower from the public libraries is not aware that the regulations against defacements and mutilations refer as much to underlinings as they do to tearing text and removing pictures. The only possible use that can be made of marked passages is to give pleasure or satisfaction to the owner of the volume, who places some guide against his favorite sentences and paragraphs in order that he may recognize them quickly when he has need to refresh his memory, or desires to renew his pleasure by a reperusal. What possible satisfaction can be derived from underscoring in a borrowed book which in all probability will never be seen again, or what later reader is supposed to be attracted and edified by the vandal scribblings is beyond the comprehension of any but the idiot who will do the trick. It is a question whether even a sympathetic friend could be much edified by a marked copy, unless it were done by request, for discriminating readers prefer to make their own discoveries. Some people seem to be imbued with the idea that they are under an obligation to blaze the trail for all followers, and they go through books, pencil in hand, intent on making a mark on every page lest some one be lost for lack of a landmark. When two or three of these pioneers have forced their way ahead of one through a book, and the parallel lines in the margins, the underscores and the brackets are as thick as commas, there are but two things to do: return the book and try to find an unmutilated copy, or give up in despair. The fate of the book marker ought to be capital punishment.

MUSIC

Fanny Bloomfield Zeisler

Fannie Bloomfield Zeisler has a more striking personality than either Padarewski or Hofmann. Her face is white and thin, her hands like the talons of a bird. Her back is bent from constant stooping at the piano. The muscles and cords in her arm stand out, each one separately, in bold relief. Such a strange, uncanny looking hand and arm it is—and what wonderful genius lies within it and the mind that moves it. Memories of Mrs. Zeisler's last visit here, when there were many ready to declare her the greatest living pianist, should have insured her a crowded house at her opening recital this week. Instead there was a small audience. That it was cultured and attentive, appreciative and on occasions wildly enthusiastic, did not make up for its meagreness in numbers. But later recitals brought better audiences, as they usually do when the star is a star. Mrs. Zeisler decidedly is. She played on Tuesday night through a program of thirteen numbers, beginning with a scholarly rendition of Bach's prelude and fugue No. 2, C minor. The Beethoven sonate, op. 111, full of immense difficulties, was exquisitely played. A dainty interpretation of the third movement of a Schubert minuet was followed by the colossal "Marche Militaire," Tansig's solo arrangement of the Schubert piano duet, which is remembered as one of Hofmann's masterpieces. Mrs. Zeisler's rendering of this was magnificent. It is remarkable, the strength that lies in those slender hands that in repose appear so delicate. The audience simply thundered its applause at the close of this number, Mrs. Zeisler replying with an encore, Schubert-Liszt's "Hark, Hark the Lark." Four Chopin numbers were charming in interpretation and execution, particularly the Polonaise which I have never heard so well rendered. The two Leschetisky compositions, dedicated by the master to Mrs. Zeisler, were also very charming. But probably the most interesting number on the program was the Leschetisky transcription for left hand of the sextet from "Lucia." One could scarcely believe the work was done only with the left hand. It was marvelous. Two characteristic Moszkowski compositions and the great Strauss valse, "Man lebt nur Einmal," originally written for orchestra and transcribed for piano by Tausig, completed one of the finest piano programs ever given before a San Francisco audience. On Wednesday and Thursday occurred the second and third recitals, and this afternoon there will be given one at the same hall—Metropolitan—when the program will include the Mendelssohn-Liszt "Wedding March and Dance of the Elves" from the "Midsummer Night's Dream" music, a Brahms rhapsody, four Chopin numbers, and works by Moszkowski, Grieg, Schumann, Schuett, Saint-Saens and MacDowell.

The Neapolitan Concert

The rare concerts of the Neapolitan Mandolin and Guitar Club are always most enjoyable occasions, and invitations to them are eagerly sought. Therefore it goes without saying that a very large audience greeted the club at its concert on Thursday night of last week, when a program of nine numbers was most interestingly rendered. The ensemble playing of the young women composing the club reflected much credit on the painstaking care of their instructors, the Misses Theresa and Lily Sherwood, while the duets for mandolin and guitar by the latter proved their ability to so ably instruct in these popular instruments. The club was assisted by Mrs. Mary Carpaneto Mead, Mr. Harry H. Barnhart and Sig. S. Martinez. Mr. Barnhart's spirited rendition of the Toreador song from "Carmen" completely captured his audience, and Mrs. Mead's sweet and flexible soprano gave much pleasure and was well received. Sig. Martinez gave the "Prayer and Dance" by Grieg in his well known masterful and graceful style. The members of the Neapolitan Club taking part were: Mandolins, Mrs. A. Bower, Misses Claudine Cotton, Alice Merril Gardner, Dagmar A. Johnson, Edna Montgomery, California G. Meade, Helen Powell, Hael Pitcher, Marion F. Wright and Etta Yale; guitars, Mrs. Gertrude L. Gear, Mrs. J. F. McGauley, Misses Catherine M. Johnson, Mary Jessup, Grace E. Morey, Annie Montgomery, Arline G. Meade and Maud Simons.

Not Largely Attended

The concert given under the auspices of St. Barnabas Guild for Nurses was not so well patronized as that charity deserved. As is usual where the program is unnecessarily long to begin with, the concert did not begin until nearly nine o'clock, and was further lengthened out by that obliquity of perception on the part of some in the audience who didn't know when they had had enough and insisted on encoring such numbers as could least bear repetition. Without doubt "No encores" printed at the bottom of a program would be received with even greater gratitude than the announcement of "No flowers" at a funeral, and the overworked concert industry might receive an impetus that it stands much in need of today. The program was contributed by amateurs and semi-professionals, the honors of the evening being easily won by Mrs. Oscar Mansfeldt in her brilliant and intelligent work at the piano. Mrs. Paul Friednofer's pleasing, unforced soprano was well received, her German song being especially well done. Mrs. M. E. Blanchard's numbers were given with taste and expression. Harry Samuels gave a violin solo and other numbers were given by A. Rykert, tenor, and Dr. Hoffman, flutist.

A recital was given on Wednesday afternoon in San Rafael by the pupils of Esther A. Mundell, who lately returned from a long season of study in New York. The program consisted of songs and piano numbers, the composers represented being Moszkowski, Mascagni, Hahn, Webb, Grieg, Bachmann, Arditi, Holst, Godard, Bartlett, Bizet and Flotow. Those taking part were Misses Foster, Miler, Waterman, Dodge, Alexander, Dollar, Frances and Virginia Newhall, Margaret and Esther Mundell, Roy Max Smith and Philip Faymonville.

Julia Heinrich will go on the Orpheum circuit for a short engagement, prior to going abroad to continue her vocal studies.

Other People's Wit

From Eben Phillpotts' "Sons of the Morning":

Gaffer Ash: "Marriages be like bwoys playin' leapirog, wheer each lad have got to rucksey down, wan to t'other at proper times and seasons."

"'Tis awnly a small mind caan't take a favour wi'out worritin' how to return it."

Myles Stapledon: "All life's much like a ropewalk where we toil—walking backwards—with our faces turned away from Fate."

Mark Endicott: "Passions are bred out nowadays. I don't believe the next generation will be shook to the heart with the same gusts and storms as the last. We think smaller thoughts and feel smaller sentiments; we're too careful of our skins to trust the giant passions; our hearts don't pump the same great flood of hot blood."

From "I, Thou and the Other One," by Amelia E. Barr:

Cecil North: They who care and dare can do anything."

"There is a perverse disposition in human nature to keep with special care things that incriminate."

Mrs. Atheling: "No woman likes to think she has been fooled and deceived, and given her heart for worse than nothing. Nine hundred and ninety women out of a thousand would rather blame Fate or father or fortune, or some other man or woman, than their own lover."

Mrs. Atheling: "Troubles must come to all, but troubles need not be wicked; and it is wicked to be a destroyer of happiness. I think God himself may find it hard to forgive those who selfishly destroy the happiness of others, just because they are not satisfied, or have not the one thing they specially want. When you are going to be cross and unhappy, say to yourself, 'I will not.'"

From "The Master Christian," Corelli:

Prince Sofrani: "If there is any difference at all, the love should be greater on the man's side than on the woman's!"

Angela: "If man, knowing that a life of self-indulgence destroys his intellectual capacity, still persists in that career, and woman, studying patiently to perfect herself, refuses to follow his example of vice, may it not happen that the intellectual forces may range themselves on the side of right rather than wrong, and invest woman with a certain supremacy in the end?"

"It is strange how seldom a man can enter into the true comprehension of a woman's grief, though he may often be the cause of the trouble. A woman, if endowed with beauty and charm, ought

OUR OPINION

Vining's Fake System

It appears that General Manager E. P. Vining of the United Street Railroad Companies has been obtaining money under false pretenses for some years. He has been posing as a brilliant and expert disciplinarian, and it was the supposition of his employers that there was not the remotest probability of the men under his control ever banding themselves together for the purpose of asserting their rights. It was the policy of Mr. Vining to employ only such men as were willing to be herded like sheep, to take what was vouchsafed them and never to venture a demand of any sort. He prided himself on being a great judge of human nature, and he personally interviewed every applicant for a job so that he could be quite sure that no man of independence of character should ever obtain the uniform of a conductor or gripman. Moreover he operated a spy system by which he hoped to obtain prompt information concerning the inoculation of any of his men with the virus of trades-unionism. The directors of the railroads company had such confidence in Mr. Vining and in his ability to operate their roads without danger of a strike that they paid him a very large salary, and it now appears that they were duped. The men did organize and they did demand better wages and they did strike, and they tied up the whole system on short notice without the slightest difficulty. Mr. Vining's system has gone a-glimmering. It was no better than the system of the race-track habitue who thinks, poor fool, that he is going to break the book makers. The fact is, as we have pointed out many times, that Mr. Vining is a false alarm. A wiser man would not have wasted his time seeking to accomplish the impossible. It has been demonstrated time and time again that you cannot prevent men from organizing for their mutual benefit. The strike is on and we should hope for an early settlement. There does not appear to be anything unreasonable in the demands of the strikers. They have not asked for exorbitant wages. If an attempt be made to operate the cars with scab-labor there will surely be violence. There always is in such cases. Moreover, the longer a settlement is delayed the more apparent it will become to the people of the city that riding in street cars is unnecessary. We have such a poor system that people subject themselves to great inconvenience, and lose a lot of wholesome exercise by riding instead of walking to and from their homes. It is not advisable for the company to foster pedestrianism by prolonging a strike which compels people to learn that very little time is saved by taking a street car.

Why Not a Band?

It has been reported that Andrew Carnegie is so disgusted with the unseemly squabbles which have arisen over his library donations that he regrets ever having undertaken to die poor. So far as this city is concerned, he could hardly regret it more than do the sensible minimum of its inhabitants, who resent the attitude of mendicancy forced upon them no less than they do the rest of the miserable business. A public library is little more than a clearing house for novels, at best, and it is not even a question what good comes from the wholesale devouring of fiction. Mr. Carnegie did not have in mind the supplying of unlimited copies of the latest "boomer," when this scheme was formulated. He was thinking of his own boyhood and early youth, when books were so expensive that they were veritable luxuries for the wealthy, and when a poor youth, working long hours for meagre compensation, had no warmed and lighted reading room open to him in the evening. Times have changed greatly since then, and what with better educational facilities, cheap editions of standard books and the enormous growth of magazine literature, there is no reason why any one so disposed cannot collect a finer library in the point of contents if not in appearance, than gladdened the eyes of the learned men of the middle years of the last century. By far the larger portions of the library patrons are not youths and maidens bent on improving their minds and adding to the sum total of either their own information or human knowledge in general. They want amusement, pure and simple—amusement from the latest additions to current fiction. There is no more and no better reason for furnishing this at the public expense than there is for supplying theatre or picnic tickets, bicycles or automobiles. It is true that people might be worse employed than in reading novels, but it is not true that they gain more mentally in this way than from other relaxations. It is right enough for communities to furnish harmless amusement at public expense. It is not right or seemly that they should beg others who are under no obligations to do so for them. One of the purposes of a library is to promote culture, but we already have a good free library and also two semi-public libraries that do not receive adequate support. But literature alone does not produce culture. What San Francisco should have is a good municipal band, one that would stimulate a love of music among the masses. We have a beautiful band-stand in the park but no musicians to play in it and we are begging the street railroad companies to supply the talent. San Francisco should have open air concerts every day, and they should not be confined to Golden Gate Park. There are poor people that cannot afford to pay car fare to take all their children to the park, and there are thousands of them that would enjoy good music in the public squares. And perhaps if a fine band were to entertain in a down-town public square, the parsimonious railroad officials would deem it to their advantage to hire musicians to supply a counter-attraction in Golden Gate Park. The musical culture of the musical centres of Europe is due to the abundance of free music which the people are vouchsafed. We need a little more of that sort of culture here. And now that we have a musical Mayor it should be a propitious time to agitate the question of the advisability of organizing a municipal band.

The Mormon Peril

The "Mormon peril" is once more worrying the good dames of the jarring Protestant sects. Some years ago they undertook to wipe out Mormonism by securing legislation prohibiting polygamy, but it now appears that the right to enjoy more than one wife is not the only feature of Mormonism that wins converts from other sects. It is rather late in the day for a Mormon scare but one has been started by official representatives of the Baptist, the Congregational, the Methodist and the Presbyterian churches, and in the active feminine imagination the great peril threatens the civilization of this country. A delegation from an Interdenominational Council of Women has appealed to Congress to avert disaster by amending the Constitution and the home missionary societies are now trying to arouse public interest in a movement for the suppression of Mormon influence. They are circulating literature with a view of creating alarm, and they represent that Mormonism is increasing at an unprecedented rate, and that it will soon secure by colonization political control of Idaho, Wyoming, Montana and Nevada. The Mormons, they say, are twice as numerous as they were in 1882 when the Edmunds law, which it was hoped would wipe them out, was enacted. But there is nothing strange about that. The history of religious fanaticism demonstrated that persecution and measures to repress serve to stimulate rather than retard the growth of a sect, be it ever so absurd. Mormonism cannot be wiped out by legislation. And there is no reason to fear that it will destroy Christian civilization. The Mormons are a peaceable and industrious people, and their morality compares favorably with that of most civilized communities. There is a peril that should be more greatly feared than that of Mormonism. It is that of bigotry and religious intolerance which is responsible for the activity of the so-called evangelists of the missionary societies. They are constantly rushing to Washington with their troubles, demanding legislation to accomplish something which their theology has failed to achieve. They are pestilential meddlers and are a greater menace to the welfare of the country than the Mormons, the Christian Scientists and the expounders of the "New Thought" combined.

The Missionary Nuisance

Now that Miss Stone has been released and returned to her own country, we see on all hands announcements that this or that magazine or paper has secured exclusive rights to the publication of her story, that she is to lecture here or there and that fabulous sums have been offered her for the record of her experiences. One may be pardoned the passing curiosity to know whether Miss Stone contemplates devoting the proceeds to the missionary cause, or whether she has considered the idea of returning any portion of the sum subscribed for her release. What these missionary enterprises need is a good, sharp business man at their head, who will insist on results for value received and who will not be satisfied with vague and general reports concerning "the good work." As a result of the comparison of statistics, it has been made clear that the conversion of a single heathen, and only nominal conversion at that, costs more than the support of a whole Christian family at home. There is a constant and continual drain of funds, and an endless procession of missionaries, and there are large numbers of converts—on paper, but nowhere else. Nothing exact or definite is expected of the workers, and in the nature of things they cannot be looked to to produce a given number of proselytes each year, as if they were running a factory, but there is more than a shrewd suspicion that the average missionary enjoys a lazy life with his income secure and his household of native servants at beck and call. As a matter of business it would pay the missionary boards to appoint agents to visit the various stations and inspect the work, to see how many converts there are in actual attendance, and discover if possible how many of these are only bent on securing rations or clothes or a working knowledge of English. Missionaries whose privates business absorbs more attention than that of their employers, or conflicts with it in other ways, should be dropped from the pay roll. Stations that have failed to show a reasonable advancement after fair trial should be discontinued and the agent in charge either transferred or dismissed. There is something so alluring about "foreign parts" that there is always a call to do something in our neighbor's back yard. It is a great pity that the Sulus and the Morros are not Christianized and the Filipinos Protestantized, and the Chinese Americanized, but meanwhile the people at home do not go to church, and Voodooism and illiteracy are prevalent in the South. One reverend gentleman expressed his sorrow and surprise last week that so many of the natives of the lesser Philippine islands are not yet half-civilized, after four years of American occupancy. He might have given his attention to the Apache Indians, who are not Andover professors at the end of four centuries. The most successful, if indeed the only markedly successful missions of which we have record were those of the Franciscans here in our own State. The missionaries brought with them nothing but their knowledge of religion, handicrafts and books. They were practically severed from the base of supplies, and obliged to live with the natives and to raise their own supplies. There could hardly have been found less promising material than the Californian Indians, but the results speak for themselves. There is little left now to tell the tale, but the ruins of the buildings and gardens and the traditions of the tribes are eloquent. There is no record that any of them hired out to a lecture bureau or masqueraded in Indian garb for the delectation of a Sunday night audience.

The Hill Boom

The probability is that David B. Hill will be the Democratic candidate for President in 1904. His candidacy will depend on the gubernatorial campaign in New York this fall. The Democracy of New York hopes to run Hill for Governor again and if he be elected he will go into training for the Presidency. David B. Hill is one of the shrewdest politicians in the country, but he incurred the disfavor of the Bryanites by his failure to enthuse over the Silver champion. Nevertheless the Democrats of New York believe he is the right man to essay the task of uniting the party, and they have started his boom in a spirited manner. He was the orator of the evening the other night at a banquet in New York, at which General Joe Wheeler was the guest of honor, and he took occasion to throw out a few suggestions for a platform. He was introduced as the man whose proudest title, is "I am a Democrat" and he was received with cheers. Hill's idea of a platform is very simple. He thinks that Thomas Jefferson is all there should be to it and he set forth ten points of Jeffersonianism in substance as follows: Jefferson believed in State rights, he was opposed to the centralization of power, he believed in the principle of home rule, he believed that public taxation should be imposed exclusively for public purposes, he was opposed to immense standing armies because they involve military rule, he favored the general principle of bimetallism, he was conspicuous in his opposition to dangerous combinations of capital, he was in favor of popular rights and favored the election of United States Senators by the people. Hill argued that there should be no factional fights since the Democracy was united on essentials. He declared that the Administration of Roosevelt was all at sea and that its policy in the Philippines was a disgrace to civilization. Mr. Hill is a splendid campaigner, but his record is not of a character that should command admiration. He has been too closely allied with machine politics. He has always received the ardent support of practical politicians.

The Saunterer

She's the Warden's Guest

It strikes me as rather odd that for lack of an Executive mansion the wife of the Governor of California should make the residence of a penitentiary's warden her home. San Quentin is one of the most delightful spots in Californit. There is no more beautiful site for a residence in the State, but it is at present occupied by the penitentiary and is scarcely suitable as the abiding place of the Governor's wife. Of course, it is only temporarily her abiding place, for Los Angeles is the home of Governor Gage, but Los Angeles is a long distance from Sacramento, and Mrs. Gage likes to be near her husband. If there were an Executive mansion at Sacramento she would no doubt occupy it, though I believe she detests the town and finds it hard to assimilate with northern people. She is frequently a guest at the Palace hotel, but most of her time is spent at the penitentiary in the home of the warden.

Treasuring Campaign Material

To those who are aware of the fact that a strong bond of friendship exists between the Aguirres and the Gages it is not surprising that the Governor's wife should elect to live in San Quentin when her husband is attending to his official duties. It would be hard for her to find a more charming suburban retreat, but her presence there occasions a deal of comment and the circumstance is looked upon as available material for campaign purposes by the Governor's political enemies. They have not yet sprung it but they've got it up their sleeve as it were. The coming campaign is to be an exceedingly bitter one, and nothing will be overlooked that can be used for the purpose of disparaging Gage. It is perhaps their intention to charge him with supporting his family at the expense of the State, but that sort of campaigning is seldom effective and is frequently of the boomerang order. Nobody cares whether Mrs. Gage is enjoying the hospitality of her friend Mrs. Aguirre, the sister-in-law of the penitentiary warden, and surely nobody begrudges the wife of our Governor a pleasant time in a State institution with State officials as attendants. It only should be regretted that she has not a more suitable home in which to receive her friends. Governor Gage likes San Quentin and takes little jaunts over there on the State tug and occasionally receives his friends there but of course it is all very odd that the Governor of the State should occasionally seek seclusion in the penitentiary. To be sure the news that Mrs. Gage is a guest of the warden is not given wide publicity. She probably wouldn't like to have the social editors announce that she is "at home" in the shadow of the jute mill, but she enjoys the balmy climate of Marin. Let us hope that California will soon have an Executive mansion.

The Meanest Man

Some years ago an Eastern railroad man met C. P. Huntington in this city and informed him that a certain individual who was the chief of one of the departments of the Southern Pacific company was the meanest man in the world. A few years later the same Eastern railroad man visited this city again. He called on Huntington shortly after his arrival and said: "Do you remember when I was out here some years ago I told you that you had on your staff the meanest man in the world?"

Huntington said he remembered.

"Well," said the Easterner, "I was wrong. I've been in Omaha since and I met a man there who can give your fellow cards and spades and beat him out. He's in the railroad business too and his name is Vining." Huntington lost no time in hiring Vining to take charge of his street railroad system in San Francisco. Such is the story of how Mr. E. P. Vining, the man responsible for the railroad strike in this city, was discovered by the late C. P. Huntington.

How Nickels were Stolen

Within a very short time after Vining made his appearance in this city almost everybody was willing to approve of the verdict of the Eastern railroad man. From the very beginning of his employment he devoted himself to the devising of plans for subjecting the patrons of the roads to annoyance and inconvenience. One of the first rules laid down by him was that no person should be given a transfer unless a demand for it was made upon payment of the fare. This rule enabled the company to steal many nickels, but it provoked so many fights in street cars that Vining was compelled to rescind it. Being a resourceful individual however, he was not slow in devising other means to irritate the patrons of the roads. He has always proceeded on the "public-be-damned" theory and evidently with the warm approval of his employers. In many ways he showed himself to be an incompetent, but his system of economy was so stringent, and commanded the admiration of the railroad directors to such an extent that they were blinded to his shortcomings. They did not think that any harm could be done in making the railroads unpopular for Vining pointed out that the people had to patronize the system or walk. He made that argument to me on one occasion. Perhaps it has dawned upon him since the strike that unpopularity is not a blessing.

His Religious Side

But Mr. Vining does not devote all his time to the task of making it disagreeable for the public. He concedes his spare moments to God and literature. He firmly believes that religion should play an important part in the management of a railroad. Therefore he teaches Sunday-school, and spends a lot of his time trying to induce his conductors and gripmen to attend. Many of them attend church service for no other purpose than to win his favor, for it is a well known fact that those who do not go to church are on his blacklist. The men are of the opinion that Vining believes that the church-goers are easily controlled, and that they don't spend their time discussing unionism. He has attempted to dictate to them as to what they should do when off duty, and that is why they have demanded among other things that they be granted the privileges of American citizens when not on duty. Vining's faith in religion as a means to an end in the railroad business must have been shaken somewhat since his disciples proved him a bad prophet by going out on a strike.

The strikers were very fortunate in having Mayor Schmitz in office. Governor Gage won considerable political prestige by winding up the last strike, and now Schmitz believes that it is his turn to achieve a little glory. There was ample opportunity for him to do so. As Mayor of the city he should inquire into the business of the railroad company and ascertain whether the profits of the business warranted the raising of wages or lowering of fares. The railroad officials are not anxious to have the question of the right of the Supervisors to regulate fares tested in court. They fought shy of it when the rate for children was proposed some time ago. They consented to make the reduction not through generosity, but to avoid going into court. The Mayor could also consider the advisability of starting quo warranto proceedings to forfeit the franchises of the syndicate in the event of their failure to operate their roads. The franchises are held upon condition that street railroads be operated. Quo warranto proceedings could not be started without the consent of the Attorney-General, but at present the Attorney-General of the State is the hired attorney of the syndicate. Mr. Ford would find if the strike continued that it was embarrassing to hold both jobs.

Lask-Greenlee

The marriage of Hermione Marguerite Lask and Frederick Sackett Greenlee will be solemnized next Tuesday evening at the home of the bride's parents in California street. Miss Lask is the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Harry J. Lask and her uncle, George E. Lask, is the well-known theatrical manager, now in New York. She is a piquantly pretty girl with vocal talent above the average. At one time she had a very persistent worshiper in the younger son of Rev. J. A. B. Wilson, in whose church choir Miss Lask's sweet voice has many times been heard in solo. Mr. Greenlee, the bridegroom-to-be, is engaged in the brokerage and commission business in this city.

A Fatal Change of Atmosphere

They were discussing the decadence of the Art Association under the Mathews regime the other day, at the Bohemian Club, and one old-timer suggested that it was in a measure due to the change of atmosphere effected when the association moved from its old quarters contiguous to the old Bohemian Club rooms in Pine street over the California market to the present sumptuous palace on Nob Hill. Those were the days of Virgil Williams whose classes used the Italian fish laddies and fruit men for models, and secured ideas for still life studies in the stalls belowstairs. And those were the days when the Bohemian Club men and the artists were hand in glove. The Art Association was then at its enthusiastic best. One night at a dinner in a French restaurant given in honor of Randolph Rogers, the great sculptor, his friend, Virgil Williams replied to the toast, "Painting." He was then putting all his energy into the upbuilding of the School of Design, and he predicted that "with the beneficent forethought of our wealthy and cultured citizens, the institution would grow and expand, perhaps rival the art centres of the old world, while from its centre there would perhaps arise noble and enduring monuments to the aesthetic sense of the American people." How little of his prophecy has come true!

A Painting by Williams

During Virgil Williams' tenure of office as director of the School of Design there was a much livelier interest taken in Art by Society than is the case today. If the society girl of that period could not paint a picture, or at least make a bluff at daubing a canvas, she was regarded as quite without the pale. One bud who hadn't an atom of talent, and knew it as well as the next one, entered the class at the Pine street school. She made a wager with a chum that she would secure a painting by Virgil Williams that would cost her only the price of her lessons. She therefore started a fruit or flower piece or some such peculiarly feminine study but religiously refrained from doing a stroke of work upon it. Every time Mr. William came around, he did a little touching up to the society girl's painting until it was finished. But when the last dash of paint adorned the canvas, the master told his pupil in kind tones, so as not to wound her feelings, that he was afraid if she could not do better she was wasting her time. The bud, a matron now of many years' standing, still cherishes her easily gained picture by Virgil Williams. But she never dabbled in art again after that admonition.

"I'm glad Maude's married."
"Yet you refrained from congratulation, she tells me."
"Yes, I pitied the bridegroom."

An Historic Barn

A correspondent reminds me that Alice Hoffman, in building her barn before her house, had a precedent in the Shawhan barn. In the early seventies the Shawhans built their barn, expecting later to associate the handsome structure with a handsomer house. But stocks slumped and they had to bury ideas of future greatness and be satisfied with a more modest possession. "Shawhan's Folly" was a sensation in its day and some of the spectacular preachers made it the subject of sermons. Charles F. Hanlon, it will be remembered, was the Shawhans' attorney in their various lawsuits. He married one of the daughters, but they were divorced some time before her death.

Another Slang Poet

Mr. Edward Salisbury Field of Los Angeles is a great admirer of the genius of Wallace Irwin which gave to us that quaint volume of "Love Sonnets of a Hoodlum." To express his admiration of the skill which juggled slang into melodious cadences he wrote the following which I am pleased to publish at his request:

I like a Guy, I don't care who he is,
Who thinks there's something left in Poetry—
Who doesn't think the World is Up a Tree
Since the Immortal Bard went out of biz.
The Critics guzzle Gin that's mostly Fizz;
And when, for once, they have a chance to see
The Muse appareled as she ought to be,
They say: "O Rats! the Poet Crop is frizz."

To take a bunch of words, and make them walk
In sonnet-time is easy—I don't think.
They start all right; but Hully Gee! they balk
When Little Willie gets to slinging ink!
And my advice to Lobsters, with a hunch
That it's a cinch is this: go start a bunch.

Traffic Precludes Honor

A press despatch from Paris the other day announced the death of Mr. Aurelien Scholl, the well-known critic and man of letters. Scholl was, I believe, the highest authority on dueling in Paris. As the editor of L'Echo de Paris he wrote what he pleased about men, and when they objected a duel was arranged, and he would proceed to kill or wound his man. He came into prominence as one of the two members of the court of appeal which decided that J. Coleman Drayton had no right to challenge Hallett Alsop Borrowe to a duel. The Duc de Morny was the other member. Drayton wanted to fight Borrowe because of the latter's attentions to Mrs. Drayton, who was Miss Augusta Astor, daughter of Mrs. William Astor. In the course of negotiations for the duel, as I was subsequently told by one of Borrowe's seconds, it came out that Drayton had been jealous of Borrowe for five years and had done nothing about it except to complain to Mrs. Astor, who agreed to give her son-in-law five thousand a year for his support. Borrowe's seconds decided that Drayton had not only waited too long, but had deprived himself of the right to appeal to the code of honor by accepting money from his mother-in-law. This ruling was submitted to Scholl and de Morny who sustained it. Scholl wrote his opinion to the effect that where there is a question of money there can be no question of honor. There is no longer any honor when there has been traffic, when honor has been conditionally sold. As to the taunts and insults of a man balked in his hope of gain they are null. Mrs. Drayton is now living in London with her second husband and thanks to the influence of her mother she is again in the swim.

Flourished in the Second Empire

With Aurelien Scholl disappears another one of the interesting figures of the naughty, gay Paris of the second Empire. And he was one of the most reckless blades and dashing lovers of that rollicking period. He belonged to the old crew of journalists that made the old Figaro, the brilliant Figaro, the power it was. Sharp, witty, a conscienceless swashbuckler, and a picturesque boulevardier, he never became serious or sedate under the Republic, but doted on memories of the old regime. He was the comrade of Offenbach, the chum of Alexander Dumas and a patron of the Buffes Parisiens. There was brilliancy in Paris then, and a man had to have brains to become marked for wit. Scholl had his full share of that gay life. His favor and friendship were courted by the ravishing divinities of the stage for they feared the rapier thrusts of his sarcasm. It was Scholl that first exploited the story of Sarah Bernhardt's coffin, a story by the way, that has been frequently told incorrectly by newspaper writers.

A Bit of Yellow Journalism

One familiar with the facts repeated them to me a short time ago, and they may be of interest now for the divine Sarah is tottering to the close of her career. She is growing fat, I read in a French newspaper the other day, and of course that is the beginning of the end, for what is Bernhardt without her sinuous, svelte and supple form? She is past the aid of the masseuse and the superfluous tissue is crowding her waist line and swelling those delightful hips of yore so that they have lost their ravishing contour. It was in 1876 that Bernhardt, then "a mere scabbard of white silk" as Rostand called her, decided upon preparing for death. She was playing "La Fille de Roland" at the Comedie Francaise and every evening she was prostrate with fatigue. She became haunted with the fear of death, and she had herself measured for a coffin, a delicately beveled and burnished toy of pearwood ornamented with her initials in silver and her motto, "Quandmeme." In those days Scholl was her bon ami and to him she exhibited the coffin. He wrote the story and elaborated it with a yarn about the souvenirs which Sarah had placed beneath the satin lining. He faked a love-letter and affixed the signature of a rival journalist. The incident nearly led to a duel.

Alice's Latest Conquest

The announcement in the press despatches that Alice Neilsen and Lawrence Irving are engaged to be married was not unexpected. I am surprised that the fair Alice's press agent was so slow in making use of the devotion of the actor's son for the fair prima donna. When Miss Neilsen landed in London and opened in "The Fortune Teller," the Rialto gossips immediately began to comment on young Irving's palpable passion. He used to attend every performance and sit gazing with his soul in his melancholy eyes at the soprano. At that time everybody said that he had an awful crush on the fair Californienne. Then when Alice was "taken up" by a noble lady, the patoness of musicians and artists, the rumor about Lawrence Irving fell into desuetude, and the greater news of Alice Neilsen's ambition to become a grand opera prima donna took its place. London forgot the frost that the Perley productions had gathered and watched with interest Miss Neilsen's departure for Paris where she was to study with a grand maitre. Then she returned to London, appeared in concert, made a small success but was not engaged for the Coronation concerts at Covent Garden Now bobs up again Lawrence Irving, and the "news" of the prima donna's matrimonial engagement. When Ethel Barrymore and young Irving were engaged, a good many years ago, the affair was broken off almost before it was well on. Irving is a morose sort of a fellow, morbid in temperament, and was not at all a suitable match for the beautiful, brilliant daughter of Maurice and Georgie Drew Barrymore. Little Alice, though she must be considerably older than her reputed fiance, is of the disposition that would banish his blues forever. Alice has had the experience that should render her a constant mine of good cheer to a melancholy Jacques like Lawrence Irving.

When Gertrude Hid from Ella

Gertrude Atherton is destined to achieve more fame out of her latest work, "The Conqueror," than was derived from all her previous efforts. The book may not sell as well as some of her earlier works but it will certainly occasion more comment, especially among thinking men. The gifted authoress is now receiving considerable attention, and many stories are being written about her. I happen to recall that she once had a controversy with Ella Wheeler Wilcox. Though she was well able to handle Ella in an argument, she was reluctant to meet the Poetess of Passion face to face. Mrs. Atherton has the mind of a man but the timidity of a woman. I was told the other day the story of her meeting with Mrs. Wilcox. It occurred in the private office of Editor Stoddard shortly after the controversy in the course of which Mrs. Atherton had referred to the passionate rhymester as "mouse-colored.' Mrs. Atherton screened herself behind a man in the office She remained concealed in a dimly lighted corner until Ella departed, and then she breathed more freely.

Cornelia and Allen

The story has drifted to New York that Mrs. Hugh Tevis is already thinking of breaking out of widowhood and that her next marriage may be to a young New York millionaire. The young man referred to is none other than Allan Wallace of whom I wrote last week. The circumstance of his sojourning in Monterey suggested the story. But if Wallace has matrimonial intentions he has managed to conceal them from his most intimate friends. He is spending his time at the bungalow of his friend Bruguiere and in the company of some of the old residents of Monterey. He declares that he finds their company much more congenial than that of the society youths of San Francisco. Though Mrs. Tevis has betrayed none of the familiar evidences of an impending matrimonial venture, she has demonstrated that it does not take her long to make up her mind about the bestowal of affections. So it would not be safe to assert that there is no likelihood of an engagement between the alluring widow and the rich young New Yorker. I can only declare that up to date there has been "nothing doing."

The Billy Irwins

Apropos of the recent visit of Mrs. E. Moore Robinson to her sister, Mrs. W. G. Irwin, a story is told in an Eastern paper about the tact of their mother, Mrs. Ivers. The story is related that Billy Irwin fell in love with Ailene Ivers but that the latter was too young and didn't like him, and that her mother then showed her generalship by introducing him to her other daughter. Irwin, it is stated, was rich to the tune of millions, and Mrs. Ivers was anxious to get him into the family. The fact is that Irwin was a poor man at the time of his marriage. He acquired his wealth subsequent to that happy event. When he married Mrs. Holladay he was a clerk in the employ of the Spreckels family. He started his fortune with a lucky investment of ten thousand dollars which his employers gave him for a Christmas present. He loves to tell how he made his money and of the days when he was a poor man. Mrs. Irwin, by the bye, is one of the few women in the local smart set who is fitted for leadership. She is handsome and cultured, and the quality of her unaffected graciousness is superb.

Julia Lost but Crest Retained

James Neill and his crest are back in town. Neill flaunts his crest on the dead walls, but it hasn't the drawing capacity of Julia Dean, and that clever actress is to leave his company at the end of next week. What will the Neill company be without Julia Dean? Mr. Neill has not advertised the fact that the clever actress is about to leave him. Indeed the fact has been kept very quiet. Julia Dean is the artist of the Neill company. Long ago I predicted for her a brilliant future, and I was surprised that she was content to stay with a second class road company on the California and Montana circuit so long. There are splendid engagements for her in the East, and when she comes to San Francisco again she will be with a company short on crests but long on talent. Speaking of crests, I am constrained to inquire whether it is the proper thing for a gentleman with one of them to use it for advertising purposes. Never having had one, and never having made any research with a view of ascertaining whether I was entitled to one, I am not qualified to discuss the conventions so far as they relate to coats-of-arms. But whenever I see Neill's crest on the dead-walls I cannot avoid the thought that it is in the nature of vulgar parade.

Mrs. Paul Neumann of Honolulu has taken to chaperoning young ladies on European trips. She is expected here soon. She was preparing to go abroad with the young Campbells just before the marriage into the family of Sam Parker and Prince David. The marriage upset her plans.

The Ping-Pong Craze

Ping-Pong has addled the brains of the town. It is played from morning till night. The tennis players are finding that they are carrying off all the honors. The Henry Crockers are devoted to it and have a ping-pong room in their home. Mrs. Sam Buckbee and Miss Florence Ives are among the experts of the smart set. Margaret Salisbury and Ethel Cooper spend a good deal of time at it. That the game is not to be scorned is evident from the fact that it is played by the athletes of the Olympic Club.

The Corinthian Yacht Club has issued invitations for its opening day at the club-house in Tiburon, on May third. In the afternoon there will be dancing, but "towards sundown," as the invitation reads, "the appearance of Captain Tracy will give assurance to the assembling shellbacks that Terpsichore is a dead one, and that it is high tide in the chowder kettle." The features of the evening's jinks will be two lively sketches, "Old Times in Norway" and "St. Douglas at the Wicket."

The Husband of "Betsy B."

The late Joseph Austin, ex-Park Commissioner, and Bohemian, distinguished himself mainly by his first marriage. He enjoyed the distinction for many years of being "the husband of 'Betsy B.'" and it was usual to refer to him as such. "Betsy B." was the nom de plume of Mary Theresa Hart who wrote dramatic criticisms for the Argonaut, and who was one of the brilliant writers who helped make the fame of that paper which for a time enjoyed a world-wide reputation. Her criticisms were noted for their wit, their truthfulness and their charming literary style. The Austins lived at the Palace hotel and Mrs. Austin's informal at homes were the nearest to a Salon that a San Francisco hostess has ever been able to attain. Her husband, genial and hospitable Joe, used to bring his Bohemian Club friends home with him to sup after the play, and around the generous board would be gathered men and women who were later destined to shine in California's constellation of wits, artists and musicians. One time Mrs. Austin had invited some congenial spirits to a picnic, but it rained on the day the affair was to be pulled off. Not to disappoint her friends, she converted her rooms at the hotel into an ideal picnic spot, with green carpet, boughs and moss. There they enjoyed themselves as if they had really been out of doors. Peter Robertson of the Chronicle is one of the few survivors of that happy gathering. Mr. Austin's second choice of a wife was Mamie Sesnon, who though not inclined to literature was of a congenial temperament. She is a sister of Rev. Father Sesnon.

Followed by a Deep Silence

It was at a post-theatre cafe the other night that a distinguished society leader and matchmaker met a young matron who is expecting a visit shortly from the stork.

"Why, Fannie, how charming you are looking," exclaimed the society leader. "Why, you are really looking childlike."

Thereupon was precipitated a deep silence.

We are Too Natural

Society did not turn out at the opening night of the Dog Show in such legions as I expected at an affair given in sweet charity's name. The few smart people that were there were not smartly dressed, and were not therefore distinguishable from the Common Herd. And the latter, instead of rubbering to see Who was there, looked at the dogs. I fear San Francisco is hopelessly provincial. Fancy looking at Dogs when one may look at People. In New York nobody looks at the blooded canines at the bench shows. At least they don't look at them when everybody else is looking. The smart people go to see themselves, chat, flirt and criticise one another's clothes. If they have a desire to see the dogs, they indulge it surreptitiously or in the afternoons. Our swells, on the contrary, really enjoy examining the occupants of the benches. They like to pretend to a knowledge of dog breeding, if they have it not. The show this year is well worth looking at, by the way. It is the best exhibition of bench products that has ever been given here. Last year fox-hounds and French bulls had the right of way. This year it seems to be collies, greyhounds and cocker spaniels. Mr. John Davidson of Monroe, Mich., judged on Wednesday. It was a very good idea, that of having expert judges pass upon the merits of the different breeds, instead of having one judge for all as at preceding shows.

Some of the Dogs

Vera Montez, Mrs. J. P. Norman's great mastiff, has an array of medals equal to a field marshal's decorations, and she captured more honors this year. Close beside her was George W. Freeman's beautiful cream-colored San Mateo Queen, which also wrested a ribbon from the judges. Mrs. H. M. Bosworth, wife of the organist, has a handsome Great Dane in the novice class, King Edward. Since the Bosworths moved from their old California street home to Castro Heights they have become more interested in dog breeding than in music. Mrs. W. B. Hooper's deer-hounds Marco and Lassie H., are fine animals. Mrs. Hooper is one of the most enthusiastic sportswomen in society, and could give an Englishman points on horses and dogs.

Sport Looking Up

The San Rafael and San Mateo Hunt Club show rival lists of foxhounds. Will Tevis' pointers are as well bred as the bull terriers that his kennels sent to a former show. There has never been a year when such a showing of pointers has been made. California is improving in sporting culture. The English setters also cover a good-sized bench. Mrs. W. C. Ralston has her cocker spaniel. Hampton Promise, in the show, and Mrs. Joe Tobin's aristocratic Colonel attracts considerable attention from connoisseurs in cockers. I cannot mention all the blooded dogs on view that are worthy of it, but cannot omit naming among the collies Miss Ella Graves' Verona Braw Laddie Mrs. Phoebe Hearst's Champion Old Hall Admiral and A. B. Spreckels' Danum Wonder.

Not Up to the Average

This year's exhibition of the Sketch Club is by no means a fair showing of what the members can do. For the most part the work is without distinction, and reflects no credit upon the exhibitors, who have done so much better work in the past. There is far too much of what the artists call "Christmas cards." Lillie V. O'Ryan's miniatures are of course interesting even though we all saw them at the Hopkins. Some of the blacks and whites are admirable, and Olga Ackerman's portraits are always good. There is a "Corner in Boston Museum" by Kate C. Thomson that is particularly well treated. Alice Best has several studies that are decidedly the most original works shown. Mrs. Best has evident talent as an illustrator, and her figures are full of life. Maren Froelich has a bright little Chinese girl. But in a club which contains so many clever artists, this spring exhibition falls far below previous standards.

Some Who might have Hung

Why did not some of the absent members send contributions to the hanging? There is Carrie Callahan, who is in Paris; surely she must have had something on hand worth sending. Then there is Blanche Letcher who is very busy in New York. Any one of her fine blacks and whites would have given eminence to the exhibition of the club of which she was one of the original members. Isabel Morrison Niles is another resident of New York who appears to have forgotten the club. Joullin has said that she had more genuine art in her little finger than most of her fellow students had in their whole bodies. Mrs. Niles is getting on finely in New York, I hear. It is unfortunate that she did not send at least one sample of her work to adorn the Sketch's walls. Some of the local members, too failed to contribute. Perhaps they are growing apathetic.

When Perkins Met Oscar

Senator Perkins was a sailor in his youth and he tells this story of meeting King Oscar of Sweden: He was lying in Stockholm in a ship that had taken cotton there from New Orleans and one Sunday he and a boy shipmate named Harry Branscombe went ashore. Their curiosity led them to crawl under a hedge into the royal gardens. They had not had time to brush the dust from their clothes when they were arrested by a party of gendarmes. Only one of their captors, a distinguished looking man, could speak English and he asked them what they meant by trespassing.

"We wanted to see the king," said Perkins.

"But don't you know that you could be put in prison for trespassing?" asked the man.

"Oh," said the boy, "we don't want to hurt the king; we only want to see him."

"Well," said the stranger, "I am King Oscar."

A soldier was then detailed to show the two youngsters the palace and grounds. Thirty years afterwards the Senator was cruising on the Southern California coast and one day he discovered that Harry Branscombe was among the sailors. He sent the man to San Francisco and gave him a berth in one of his ships, just for old time's sake.

Funston Bridled

It is refreshing to learn that President Roosevelt has decided to bridle the tongue of General Funston. That spectacular young officer has been too diligently engaged in rocking his chin-cradle. With the exception of General Miles there is not a man in the army who seeks newspaper notoriety more industriously than Funston. He is undoubtedly a gallant fighter as well as a glory seeker, and he has done some creditable deeds, but he should keep off the rostrum. General Funston should know that an officer of the army has no right to indulge in criticism of members of the United States Senate.

Love-Smitten Seminary Maidens

A wealthy Californian matron whose daughters are being educated in Berlin to please their Teutonic father tells a good story in a letter to a friend in this city. It is a story that proves that William Second to None is not without a sense of humor. It appears that the girls in the school which the Californian maidens attend are very ardent admirers of Wilhelm von Hohenzollern, not solely because they are good and loyal subjects of His Imperial Highness but on account of his handsome face and graceful figure. His photos adorn their rooms, and they occasionally write sonnets to their Emperor. A short time ago they sent him a bouquet of choice flowers, and a piece of pink note-paper adorned with fat Cupids sleeping among roses on which, in carefully scanned hexameters the virgins sang of their love for King and country, of the consuming flames which day and night tortured their hearts, etc.

The Emperor's Answer

The flowers and poetry having been sent to the Palace, the whole school waited in breathless suspense for an answer. The answer came in the person of a pastry cook bearing two quarts of delicious vanilla ice-cream and a note on white paper and minus the Cupids and the roses. In this note William II expressed his thanks for the lovely flowers, and for the devotion the young ladies professed. He incidentally expressed the hope that the ice-cream would extinguish the torturing fire that consumed their insides which he feared was extremely painful and no doubt interfered with their studies.

Mason street between Clay and Sacramento is a heavy grade down which children delight to ride on coasters, or roller-skate sleds. Pedestrians have a horror of the hill because it is so slippery. A prominent citizen was horrified the other day to see a group of boys coasting down the hill on improvised sleds to the imminent danger of pedestrians, and he instructed the policeman on the beat to arrest any child caught in the dangerous sport. A day or two later he received a message to the effect that his son was in jail. He rushed to the station to bail the boy out and learned, much to his indignation, that the young fellow had been caught in the act of coasting down Mason street hill.

The Perry Birthday

John Perry Jr. was the honored guest at a reception last Friday at the Pleasanton. It was the eighty-seventh birthday of this typical fine old American gentleman, and his friends gathered in large numbers to extend their good wishes. "May he live to see many more birthdays—a round century," was one of the toasts offered over the fragrant punch-bowl. Those who were bidden to this birthday fast felt it was a privilege to be present. With the color of youth on his cheek, the sparkle of wit and good humor in his bright blue eyes that many a man twenty years his junior might envy, Mr. Perry received his friends with that courtesy of the old school for which he is noted. The guests were largely of the Unitarian set, as Mr. Perry is and always has been a devoted member of the First Unitarian church of this city, and was one of the late Dr. Horatio Stebbins' most beloved friends. Mr. Perry was assisted in receiving his guests by his charming niece, Miss Laura Kimber. Among those present were Rev. and Mrs. Bradford Leavitt, Mr. and Mrs. A. McK. Sutton, Mrs. Oulton, Mrs. James Goewey, Mrs. Lucy Otis, Mr. and Mrs. James Otis, Mr. and Mrs. Bates, Mr. and Mrs. E. B. Cutter, Mr. and Mrs. J. M. Pierce, Mr. and Mrs. Fisher Ames, Mr. and Mrs. Osmond, Mr. and Mrs. W. H. Mills.

When She was at Blingum

The New York critics are peeling off the rind of Margaret Dale's cleverness and discovering layers of true genius underneath. The way she handles her part in "The Importance of Being Earnest" has won her large slices of praise that usually go to Margaret Anglin, the leading lady. A New York critic has discovered that Miss Dale fits into a society play with the genuine drawing-room air. So the San Francisco smart set decided when she was out here. Her face is an affidavit and her clothes the notary's seal that prove she was not born for cotton-back upholstery. Burlingame opened its arms to Miss Dale and she was a frequent guest down there. Miss Dale confessed to one of the polo players that she doted on horseback riding and the next day he brought around a high stepper for her to enjoy a morning canter. Miss Dale's riding habit was the correct thing even to the snaffle on her scarf and the way she mounted her horse was a lesson to the bystanders. But evidently she was only used to park or academy riding for she couldn't control the high-spirited animal and would have been thrown in front of the club house had not her gallant rescued her. It is said that he proposed to her then and there and the Blingum matchmakers had a dose of compunctions when they thought another eligible had wandered from the fold. They blamed each other for turning a pretty girl like Miss Dale loose in their preserves and suddenly discovered that Miss Dale was only a subordinate in the company after all and it was doubtful whether her ancestors wore silk hats. But when it was certain that Miss Dale had refused the impetuous youth they managed to regard her with less jaundiced eyes. However I understand he has still a standing order with a New York florist to properly scent Miss Dale's dressing-room and his joy at her recent success has not been hidden under a bushel. So the matchmaking mammas are not yet out of the bog.

A Hoodoo in the Party

Walter Wiley and Frank O'Kane, disciples of Sir Isaak Walton, went fishing last Sunday, and concluded before the close of the day that at least one of them was a hoodoo of the most Jonahesque order. They brought a bottle of whisky to keep the dampness out, and their first item of ill luck was the accidental breaking of the bottle. Their boat was somewhat cranky, and the second item was an involuntary dive by O'Kane. He investigated the mysteries of the vasty deep for fully a minute. Later on he had trouble with a fish-hook that had worked into posterior parts. Then he was seized with chills and Wiley undertook to row him ashore. After rowing ten minutes without apparent progress they discovered they were at anchor. When they reached the bath-house O'Kane proceeded to dry his clothes and burned them to a crisp on the stove.

Merely a Separation

Some people are ever on the qui vive for a pretext to speculate on the status of a man's domestic affairs. Assessor Washington Dodge and his wife having separated some of their acquaintances are already wondering when "proceedings" will be started. They seem to forget that it has become quite fashionable for married people to drift apart even when have not the slightest intention of suing for a divorce. Some fashionable people like the McCreerys and the Mackays put an ocean and a continent between themselves without arousing suspicion of domestic differences. The Dodges have merely drifted a few blocks apart, and yet their friends have made the circumstance a pretext for sensational gossip. They appear to be quite sure that a serious breach has occurred. Dr. Dodge is not in good health. His political and professional duties have proved too strenuous and he has deemed it advisable to live at the Olympic Club where he can enjoy the salt water baths and the services of the masseur.

The Romance of Two Lives

Mrs. Dodge is a vivacious little woman, handsome and interesting and fond of social gayety. There is a romance in the lives of the Dodges. Mrs. Dodge was the doctor's first love but he was not her first husband. Their original courtship took place in a country town where the doctor was teaching school. He saved enough money to pay his way through college, and when he went away to pursue his medical studies it was with the expectation of returning to claim the hand of his sweetheart. But there is nothing so monotonous as waiting for a husband in a country village. Before Dr. Dodge became a full-fledged medico the object of his affections became a bride. It was an unfortunate match that she made, however, and it was not long before she separated from her husband. Meanwhile Dr. Dodge prospered in his profession. He became one of the leading physicians of the city. His practice grew and so did his income, but the thought of taking unto himself a wife never occurred to him. He had not forgotten his early love.

Courtship and Divorce

Yet the physician had lost track of the pretty girl he had wooed in the far-off country town. He knew she was married, and never expected to see her again. One day while riding along in his carriage in the northern part of the city he happened to look up, and the face of a woman arrested his gaze. She was seated in a window engaged in housework. Dr. Dodge recognized the face. It was that of his erstwhile sweetheart. He stopped his carriage alighted, went upstairs and was not long in renewing the old acquaintanceship. He soon learned that though there had been a marriage, it had proved an unfortunate one. He also learned that though there had been a separation, no divorce had been obtained. The future Mrs. Dodge was living with her mother, and was far from being in affluent circumstances. The old courtship was renewed the mismated woman applied for and secured a divorce and then became the happy wife of Dr. Dodge. How unfortunate it would be to end such a pretty romance in the divorce court!

The Hetherington Tragedy

The news that Mrs. Bessie Hewes-Hetherington, recently divorced from her husband, Commander James H. Hetherington was married to J. W. McCannoughey of Seattle caused much surprise in naval circles at Mare Island. It had been whispered over the teacups for some time that a divorce was on the tapis, and when Mrs Hetherington left Mare Island for her girlhood home in Delaware and stayed away a year it needed nothing more to cement the various rumors. The divorce was granted to Mrs. Hetherington last summer on the grounds of desertion, and Mrs. Grundy has been on the settee of impatience ever since. While Mrs. Hetherington was out here it was noticeable that one of the most eligible bachelors in the matrimonial mart was very devoted, but the idea that Mrs. Hetherington would really marry again was not taken very seriously. After the divorce the gossips naturally hinted at wedding bells but it has taken many months to tune them.

The Killing of Robinson

The news of this second matrimonial venture has stirred up the ashes of the past. At the officers' mess and over the tea-tables of society they are discussing the tragedy of the Hetheringtons. Ten years ago Lieutenant Hetherington killed George Gower Robinson in the main street of Yokohama. When the bullet pierced his heart Robinson moaned, "It serves me right, I deserve to die." That night at tiffin the foreign colony said out loud what it had been surmising for months. When Bessie Hewes Hetherington came to Yokohama with her girl baby to await the coming of her husband's ship, the Marion, she was welcomed as a winsome addition to the naval colony of the Asiatic station. The story of the Hetherington romance had preceded them to the land of the chrysanthemum. Every one knew how Lieutenant Hetherington had met Bessie Hewes at Cape May Point, New Jersey, and straightway fallen in love with the beautiful young girl who was still a student at Vassar. Three years later she was graduated from college and almost immediately after their marriage took place.

He Forgave Her

The girl-wife was two months in Japan awaiting the arrival of her husband's ship. The gallants of the colony did their best to amuse her and no one exerted himself more than George Gower Robinson. When Lieutenant Hetherington arrived he found her transformed from a demonstrative wife into a cold, distant woman. He did not suspect Robinson as the cause of his unhappiness until the discovery of some love letters. Then Hetherington met Robinson in the street and shot him through the heart. The case was tried in the United States consular court and Lieutenant Hetherington was acquitted. Robinson had made a will leaving the bulk of his wealth to Mrs. Hetherington but she refused to accept it. To the unbounded surprise of every one Lieutenant Hetherington refused to apply for a divorce and together they left Yokohama. So ten years after the tragedy they apparently lived as husband and wife. Commander Hetherington's duties have kept him at Mare Island much of the time and until Mrs. Hetherington left for Delaware to establish a residence there it was thought that they would finish their lives together. Lieutenant Hetherington did not contest the charge of desertion and the divorce was quietly granted without uncovering the old blot on the family scutcheon.

Notwithstanding the rain last Sunday, J. Dalzell Brown took a party of five to San Mateo, in three automobiles. After luncheon in the grill room of the hotel they made a quick return to town.

Oelrichs' Royal Feast

That seven thousand dollar banquet given by Herman Oelrichs at the Pacific-Union Club the other night was the most sumptuous stag function ever pulled off in this city. But it wasn't the gastronomic features that cost so much money. It was the decorative display that came high, and it was of a most elaborate character. Mr. Oelrichs is a royal host, and now that the Fair estate is in process of distribution one may expect some more glittering and gorgeous epicurean revels such as the old philosopher of Gargettus might have enthused over. Mr. Oelrichs is an epicure and believes that the crown of happiness is to be attained by yielding up one's soul to a voluptuous unconcern with one's legs stretched beneath a groaning table. And as this is the sort of Omar Khayyam spirit that stimulates trade I am in favor of encouraging Mr. Oelrichs.

Henry Crocker's Mot

The banquet will be discussed for many days in club circles for it was unique in more senses than one. It was a feast of plutocrats as well as a plutocratic feast, but Mr. Oelrichs, shrewd fellow that he is, rounded up a few club wits to relieve the dignity of the millionaires. The flow of reason therefore had some sparkle, but strange to say one of the cleverest things said at the feast fell from the lips of Henry Crocker. The inspiration came from a jumping frog, for be it known there were live frogs at the banquet. The tables were arranged so that they formed the brink of a miniature lake which was nearly the width of the club dining room. In the centre of the lake was a Japanese pagoda, and across the water were tiny bridges. In the lake were water lilies, and swimming in it were gold-fish and frogs. One of the frogs jumped into Henry Crocker's plate, and a waiter rushed to him to remove the intruder. Crocker stopped him, saying:

"Leave that frog there; when I see him turn pink I'll know it's time to quit drinking."

Oelrichs Joshes Preston

Mr. Oelrichs was in his happiest vein throughout the dinner, and his humor was as effervescent as his wines and almost as stimulating. But I understand that he unintentionally wounded the feelings of one of his guests. The sensitive individual was the pompous and somewhat ponderous Colonel E. F. Preston. Mr. Oelrichs referred to the Colonel as an ex-Governor of California. The fact is that Preston seriously hopes to annex himself to the gubernatorial chair, and that he cannot appreciate a josh on the subject. He left the banquet-board early and I am told he was in a huff. Mr. Oelrichs referred to Horace Platt as the President of a railroad, and contended that he therefore classed with Mr. Harriman. "The only difference," said Oelrichs, "is that Mr. Platt's road isn't running today." The host dealt out some airy persiflage at the expense of his friend Harriman. He reminded the railroad man of the days, long ago, when they were both employed in Wall street. "I worked at a desk in my father's office," he said, "and you were a curbstone broker next door." John W. Mackay was invited to talk about the Pacific cable, and all the millionaires prepared to listen attentively but the Bonanza King disappointed. His speech dealt only with commonplaces. He had evidently banished business from his mind. "This is an awful nice dinner Hermann," he said, "I enjoyed it very much. I wish to congratulate you on your artistic decorations. I have spent a most enjoyable evening." And then the man o millions sat down.

Preston's Pet Delusion

Apropos of Preston's indignation over the Oelrichs joke, I am assured that the attorney never was more confident in his life of getting the nomination for Governor. Preston is one of the luckiest men that ever practiced law in this State, for he is one of the richest, though far from being the most brilliant. Indeed he does not rank with the leaders of the bar. But it has been his good fortune to have been retained by some of our wealthiest citizens, and his fees have always been large. He is reputed today to be worth two millions. It is almost incredible that a man who has had sense enough to accumulate that amount of money should permit himself to be deluded into the notion that he will win the nomination for Governor when he hasn't a ghost of a chance. It is when confronted by persons of such gullibility that I am constrained to believe it is better to be born lucky than wise.

The Pretty Merry Girls

Edith Merry, who was married to Henry Frederick Meiggs in Brooklyn a week or so ago, is one of a string of pretty sisters. They were the inseparable friends of Anne Field when they lived here, Edith and Anne being particular chums. Captain William Merry's eldest daughter Lena married Rev. Mr. Mason, then the curate of Grace Episcopal church. She broke her engagement with Jerome Watson to marry the young clergyman. The Merry girls attended St. Luke's and were always in at every social function of the swim. They were rather devoted church workers, too, and were missed when they left San Francisco.

Cook-Noble

At high noon on Wednesday, at the home of the bride's mother in Sutter street, the marriage was celebrated of Miss Inez A. Cook and Dr. Paul Bliss Noble. It was a quiet but very pretty wedding, only relatives and intimate friends being present. The bride is a charming young girl and an heiress, too. Her father, Pardon A. Cook, died not long ago. He left an estate that when divided will give to each of his daughters an income that will insure the wolf's being kept for all time many leagues from the door. Inez is the youngest daughter. One of her sisters is married but the rich dot of the eldest is yet unclaimed. Dr. Noble is a recent graduate from the Cooper Medical College, and is a brother of Miss Maude Noble and Mrs. Edward Abramson. The young couple are visiting the Yosemite. They will make an extended honeymoon trip and upon their return in August will occupy the new residence now being erected for them at the corner of Sutter and Scott streets.

Burial of "Baby Bob"

A few weeks ago New York society expended its tears over a dead monkey. And now comes the story of the funeral of "dear little Baby Bob," a pampered canine who managed to endure his mistress for eighteen years before he was laid in his white satin-lined casket, covered with flowers, and conveyed to his resting place in the Hopedale cemetery, followed by the weeping throng. It is a notorious fact that these women who go to such extremes over their pet animals are neither kind nor considerate to their children. They will show small concern about the baby's illness unless it interferes with some social function, and then it is annoyance, not concern that agitates them. Puggy is not infrequently bathed and combed by his mistress' fair hands, and at all events, under her immediate supervision, but the baby is turned over to his nurse. Puggy rides on the seat of the carriage and is taken for his airing in the park, but who ever saw the baby out with mamma? Puggy goes along when my lady has Parisian shopping to attend to, but baby is much better off with his nurse. Baby does not know mamma by sight, nor would she recognize her offspring, but the "dear little Baby Bob" is another story. His cute ways, his appetites and his prejudices are more familiar than the catechism and church service. From time immemorial children have buried their pets, and animals that have earned the love or gratitude of their owners have been saved from the dung heap but this freak of giving over the drawing-room to the display of dead dogs, laying them out in coffins, with flowers and other decorations of woe and providing cemetery lots, vaults and tombstones is a comparatively recent innovation. It may be only another manifestation of new womanhood, or only the freak of the idle-minded plutocrats but it looks suspiciously like a reversion to second childhood, or the dawn of a new decadence.

He had Business There

The strike has brought out the usual number of amusing incidents, but none more laughable than an occurrence on a California street car. On Tuesday the crowds were large and men and women hung on any old way, so that they could secure a ride. A policeman was there to preserve the peace. All at once a man made a spring for the back of the dummy and attempted to clamber over the rail. He was leaning over, when the policeman spied him. "You can't get on here," he cried, and held the man off by that portion of his clothes in easiest reach. The man persisted in his intention, and the policeman in his counter-effort. The man was good-natured, and laughed at the rough treatment he was receiving. At last he said: "Say, when you get tired let me know. I'm a brakeman and my orders are to fix the brakes on this car."

The Maurice Caseys with their little daughter are at the Hotel Mateo. Others at the hotel are Mrs. A. C. Morrison of New York, P. J. Towle and family of St. Paul, the H. W. Neubauers and Charles T. Randolph.

Passing of Another Belle of Long Ago

Last week I noted the passing away of Mrs. Cornelia Selby Kempf, one of San Francisco's early day belles. This week another, but a more prominent member of the social world of that day has joined the great majority, in the person of Mrs. Lucy Gwin Coleman. Her mother, Mrs. Gwin, wife of one of California's earliest Senators, was a born politician and ably assisted her husband in his political aspirations. In the early fifties their home was in Jackson street just above Stockton, and here they resided while Dr. Gwin was seeking the election to the Senate. Mrs Gwin always had a house full of attractive women who were a great attraction to the politicians and statesmen.

She Wanted the Vote

A little anecdote will illustrate Mrs. Gwin's methods. At a ball attended by members of the Legislature one of the young ladies of her party was asked for a waltz by a man scarcely in condition for such exercise. She appealed to Mrs. Gwin as to what she should do, and that lady replied, "Oh, yes! give him a turn by all means," adding sotto voce, "he has a vote, you know."

When Gwin was Elected

Dr. Gwin had a hard and bitter contest with Mr Broderick for his seat in the Senate. The night the balloting took place in Sacramento Mrs. Gwin held open house at her home in Jackson street and all their friends who were not with the doctor in Sacramento were with his family in town. A game of cards was being played to help pass away the time while awaiting the verdict from the Capital city. At last a telegram was handed in which read, "The doctor elected on the third ballot." Great excitement ensued and congratulations were exchanged Mrs. Gwin was almost hysterical in her delight. Miss Lucy Gwin flung her cards high in air exclaiming, "Hurrah for Washington!" At the commencement of the Civil war the family went abroad, and it was during their residence in Paris that Miss Lucy Gwin became the wife of Evan J. Coleman. She and her husband accompanied the rest of the family when they returned here in 1868. The Gwins always entertained handsomely and for years their latter day home in Harrison street (where the Irving Scotts now reside) was the scene of unceasing hospitality. Mrs Coleman leaves one sister, Miss Carrie Gwin, and a brother of William M. Gwin, whose beautiful daughter, Mary Bell Gwin, married Richard Follis.

The Page Family

Much interest has been aroused by the engagement announcement made last week of Miss Meta Page to Horace Hellman. Miss Meta has always been considered the most popular of all the large Page family. She is a charming young lady and Horace Hellman, who is himself a nice fellow, is to be congratulated upon winning her for his wife. One of the dailies made a mistake in giving the bride-elect a family connection with the Athertons and Rathbones, they being simply old Chile friends of the family. The Page connection is large enough in all conscience without the Menlo Park contingent. The bride elect's father, Dr. Thomas Page, sought his fortune when a young man, in the South American Republic of Chile and found it in the person of a native daughter whose dot enabled him to purchase what is now known as the Page ranch in California, which divided up so well some years ago that it made his descendants well-to-do.

Relatives Galore

Of the seven sons and three daughters of the immediate family five of the former reside here: Charles the lawyer, Wilfred who oversees the ranch in the country, Arthur who married a daughter of the late William C. Ralston, George whose wife is a daughter of the pioneer physician, Dr. William Hammond, and William the society beau. Two daughters reside here. One married Mr. John Maillard of San Rafael—whose brother it was that suffered the loss of his wife, a niece of Mrs. George C. Boardman, through her infatuation for a farm hand on their place. For his sake she left her husband and her children. The remaining daughter is the chosen bride of Horace Hellman. By her marriage Miss Page will increase her already large connection in California by those of the Hellmans, Hoges and Delmases. Mr. Hellman's brother "Tony" is the noted Mardi Gras jester. He and lawyer Delmas married two of Judge Hoge's daughters.

Frigid but not a Frost

The Bowie fete at San Mateo last Saturday proved a thing of beauty but that was not surprising to those who know Mr. Bowie's good taste and his ability to spend money in gratifying it. Neither was it surprising that the entertainment he offered his friends was of a strongly Japanese flavor. Japanese decorations were in evidence partout, Geisha girls danced and posed, and fireworks from the Mikado's realm were set off in quantities and varieties to the great delight of the younger portion of the guests. If there could have been a "but" it would have been the weather, for although the sun shone brilliantly, the air had a decidedly nipping quality and some of the girls told me they feared red noses, while they felt sure Allan Bowie would have a cold in his head because he took his hat off so often. Had the day been soft and warm the pretty wraps might have been entirely discarded and the lovely white and dainty costumes exhibited.

Some That Weren't There

Mr. Bowie's sister, Mrs. Bowie-Detrick, who assisted him in receiving the guests, looked stunning in yellow, that tint being particularly becoming to her brunette coloring. Mrs. Hobart was exquisite in a pink gown trimmed with white lace. Mrs. Will Crocker always looks distingue and her grey frock was a charming creation. Mrs. Reid, the guest of honor, was gowned in a Parisian creation of spangled black lace over white. Mrs. Tim Hopkins in a costume of blue and white was the sole representative of the clan Hopkins present, the Hopkins-Taylor contingent not having been bidden to the feast. The absence of Mrs. Salisbury from the invited guests was commented upon freely as proving conclusively how successful a function could be which she had not "arranged." It was much regretted that the families of Parrotts, Selbys and Willie Howards were among the missing owing to the recent deaths of Madame de Guigne, Mrs. Kempf and Mr. William Howard.

The Host and His Fortune

Mr. Henry Bowie is one of the lucky ones in life to whom good things fall. He is the second son of the late Dr. A. J. Bowie from whom he inherited a courtly manner and cultured tastes. He married in 1879, Mrs Agnes Poett Howard, the widow of George H. Howard. Mrs. Howard was the widow of William D. M. Howard, the pioneer, when she married his brother George, so it was their dual fortunes that she brought to her third choice Mr. Bowie. Although he has never re-married, gossip of late years has been busy mating him to a fair Japanese maiden of high degree.

An Enterprising Clergyman

That picturesque divine, Rev. J. A. B. Wilson, he of the strong right arm, can never be truthfully accused of neglecting his business. There is not a more active clergyman on the coast. Some time ago I pointed out that he was always on deck when there was a matrimonial knot to be tied, and that he adjusted the knot with such neatness and dispatch that he was building up a very lucrative business in that line. Dr. Wilson is an enterprising clergyman. He believes that advertising is the life of trade, and that it is an important element in soul-saving. I have been presented with Dr. Wilson's card and it is somewhat unique. On one side he advertises the fact that he is Chaplain of the "Actor's Church Alliance"—whatever that is—that he is pastor of the Howard Street Methodist Episcopal church, 643 Howard between Second and Third; that he "receives" in his study between one and two; that his residence is at 643 Howard, adjoining the church, and that his telephone is Black 961. On the other side he advertises the Strangers' Sabbath Home where you may have "a comfortable seat, a courteous greeting and a cordial reception." And he sets forth the hours of church services and the "directions for finding the church." Moreover he announces at the bottom of the card that he is "always available to the profession for pastoral services." He refers no doubt to the theatrical profession, for his card was presented to me by a theatrical press agent.

The Annual Hegira

Now is the time of year when all our belles, our swells and the swagger set generally are debating the most pleasant as well as the most profitable place for their pastures new. Many will hie them to San Mateo and thus, as it were, hang on to the skirts of Blingum. Others will try to rub up against an element of the smart set at the Baron's famous resort in San Rafael. And there they will meet Mrs. Hort, a woman of keen observation, and a verit able mine of information on social topics. She has become a feature of the Hotel Rafael, which is once more to figure in the Baron's famous libel suit, a new trial having been granted.

Ballet Dancing in Society

Hildegarde McKenna is the originator of one of the most sensational fads that has ever made Washington sit up and take notice. To span the deadly dull weeks that intervene before the summer hegira, she has formed a class of girls who for three weeks will devote their time to ballet dancing. It is not to be supposed that they are cultivating the nimble art for the edification of their masculine friends. On the contrary they practice behind closed doors, at Boundary Castle, the home of Mrs. John B. Henderson, and their only object is to become more graceful. The Countess Cassini, the Leiter girls and half a dozen others are as enthusiastic about it as Hildegarde McKenna. The girls love the dansant and twirl their toes the better part of the day. The master of the ballet has been engaged for three weeks at the end of which time the girls expect to out-gazelle the Graces. Their families did not take kindly to the idea at first but Mrs. Henderson championed the idea and offered her house for the dancing lessons. The San Francisco smart set once stood on the dizzy edge of a ballet class. The idea was suggested by a young woman from Boston. She had letters to Mrs. Kip and both Mary and Clementine Kip were won over to the cause. They interested several other society girls and the class met just once. The young lady from Boston gave them a lecture on the sin of awkwardness and then explained that a light course in ballet dancing was a sure stepping-stone to grace. "Dancing calisthenics," as she called it, was confessed to be another name for ballet dancing manufactured to placate conventional mammas. The young ladies were told to have their measures taken for ballet slippers before the next lesson. Mrs. Kip was horrified when she realized that she had founded a class to Kiralfyesque the smart set. The San Francisco ballet class adjourned sine die and it remained for Hildegarde McKenna to pioneer it in Washington.

In Far Away Hawaii

Miss May Buckly of Berkeley was the guest of honor at a reception on April third at Ainahau, near Honolulu, where Princess Kaiulani resided until she passed away some years ago. The reception was given by Mr. and Mrs. J. G. Rothwell. The magnificent old residence with its surrounding acres of cocoanut groves was gay with laughter and mirth. The two drawing rooms, divided only by fluted pillars and a grilled archway, were used for dancing. At the foot of each arch were potted palms, while in one corner, high upon the table were stalks of white striped bamboo, cherry hibiscus, ferns and feathery palms. The hallways and verandas were similarly treated. Behind a curtain of palms and ferns a quintet of Hawaiians played and sang native melodies, to which the guests danced. The dance began at nine o'clock and the first number was led by Prince and Princess Kawananakoa.

Our Special Ambassador

An occasional correspondent writes me that Mr. Whitelaw Reid evidently intends to represent this country in proper style at the Coronation for he has engaged a house in Park Lane for six months with servants and trimmings complete for which he has contracted to pay twenty thousand dollars. "This may strike you as extravagant," says my correspondent, "but it is not. America has the reputation here of being curiously stingy to its foreign representatives, and Americans in Europe are often ashamed of the manner in which their country is repsented abroad, for if the Ambassador or Minister has not large private means, and must fall back on his official residence he makes a very poor social show even in comparison with the showing of Spain's representatives. Fortunately, Mr. Reid has abundant means and is willing to spend his own money for the honor of representing his country. And by the way the sum which he is to pay for his official residence is precisely the sum which Sir Edward Thornton, the British Ambassador at St. Petersburg, paid for an equally short tenure of a mansion in Moscow at the Coronation of Alexander III."

Edward and His Queen Separate

The same correspondent has sent the following morceau of gossip about the King and Queen:

Their majesties are enjoying themselves after the manner of married folks in the American swim—by separating and living apart. The King is on his yacht somewhere off the coast of Ireland and the Queen has gone to the home of her childhood in Copenhagen. And it is whispered—very quietly, of course—that Edward has some very congenial company aboard. Gossip of that sort is seldom heard outside the clubs, for the loyal Britisher feels that the royal family should be immune from scandal. However the Queen's visit to Copenhagen at this time, just as preparations are being made for the Coronation, is regarded as significant, notwithstanding the fact that Edward accompanied his consort to Charing Cross and there took what appeared to be an affectionate leave of her. By the way, the Coronation festivities will commence on May thirtieth, the date set for the celebration of the King's birthday. Edward was born in the month of November, a time of year which is not propitious for royal pageants and military display. Consequently Edward, who is an up-to-date impresario, has officially announced that his birthday will be celebrated in the merrie month of May. The Coronation services will take place at Spithead, June twenty-eighth. The Abbey program for the Coronation will commence at eleven o'clock and the spectators will have to be in their seats two hours earlier. Their Majesties will ride to the Abbey from Buckingham palace in a chariot being built for the occasion.

A Cashier Bound for the Orient

Quite a sensational story is being told in down town commercial circles anent the disappearance of a young man who was employed for many years by a large firm engaged in the manufacture and sale of bags. The story is that he is a defaulter for thirty thousand dollars, and that though his former employers know that he is en route to the Orient they have no intention of reporting the matter to the police. When questioned concerning his disappearance they state that he was discharged because of his incompetency, but another story is told to the effect that his arrest might provoke an unsavory scandal. Before his departure, I am told, the cashier acknowledged to a friend that he took the money, and added that he had no fear of being arrested. He vaguely hinted that it would be to the interest of certain people to square his case. A few days ago his wife obtained a decree of divorce.

A Boom in Gas Stock

Those who hold shares in the Oakland Gas, Light & Heat Company are jubilant over the offer of the California Gas and Electric Company to buy all shares offered at $70 a share. This is $13 above the price quoted on the Exchange the middle of this week and is about $20 above the rate which prevailed prior to the opening of negotiations of purchase. There are 30,000 shares of stock in the Oakland Gas, Light & Heat Company. These are held by two hundred and seventy-five different people, and the directors have not more htan one-twentieth of the stock. The syndicate making the offer of $70 a share, stipulates that at least 51 per cent of the stock shall be in deposit by September first. The California Gas and Electric Company which makes the offer is the big syndicate headed by John Martin, which now controls the Bay Counties Power Company, the former San Francisco and North Pacific Coast Railroad, and lighting plants in San Rafael, Santa Rosa, Napa, Woodland, Chico, Colusa, Fresno, Nevada City and Grass Valley. The syndicate will pay cash for the shares it buys, and undoubtedly these shares will soar within the next few weeks. Their selling will make a neat profit for those fortunate investors who bought as low as $50 or $55.

The Hardware Trust

Stock will be offered for sale shortly in the International Hardware and Metal Company, a consolidation of more than fifty large hardware jobbers all over the United States. The company will be incorporated under the laws of New Jersey, with a capital stock of $120,000,000. The common stock will be $80,000,000, and the preferred $40,000,000. The preferred will be a 6 per cent. cumulative stock. This $40,000,000 represents the actual, conservative, estimated value of the concerns making up the trust. St. Louis will be the general headquarters, and New York the financial headquarters. Much money is expected to be saved by closer and larger buying, by the elimination of individual catalogues, etc. I cannot say anything as to the value of the stock as yet, for a stock is never recognized in financial circles as an "investment" until the company has been existence for a number of years, and has demonstrated its earning capacity over a series of good and bad years. Because of this fact many securities are not recognized as investments. This does not mean that the securities will not prove valuable; it simply means that the companies have not been in existence long enough to have demonstrated their average earning power over a number of years, and that therefore no fair estimate can be made of the value of the stock. Of course these securities are not handled here on the San Francisco Stock and Bond Exchange, and have not a particular interest for Pacific Coast investors. The hardware trust however will have a local interest, as two well-known San Francisco firms will be in it—Dunham, Carrigan and Hayden, and Pacific Hardware and Steel Company, while Harper and Reynolds Company and Union Hardware and Metal Company of Los Angeles will also be merged in the combine. Doubtless a block of the stock will be handled here through some leading banking firm. While the trust certainly has strength to start with, I cannot advise the small or moderate speculator to buy into it.

The Anaconda Mining Company's dividend for the quarter is only 50 cents a share. This makes the second cut of 75 cents a share in six months. The previous dividend was on the basis of $1.25 a share, the usual extra division of 75 cents a share being omitted at that time.

Rumble Still at It

Five or six weeks ago I exposed the swindling schemes of G. W. Rumble of the Sunset Mining Company, whose office is in the Chronicle Building. Rumble is still going on defrauding investors of their money. In the last few days he disgorged $12,000 rather than stand a suit for that amount brought by one of his victims; but is still advertising extensively that the Sunset Mining Company will pay two per cent. a month to all stockholders, and he is still selling stock, as fast as he and his agents can. Rumble is one of the coterie of mining swindlers who have made for California in the East and in Europe a very bad name, and who have fattened on the simplicity of those who covet more than the usual interest on their capital. There is a bank in this town which seems to be particularly allied with these dishonest schemers, and in which many of them keep their ill-gotten gains. The head of this bank poses as an enthusiastic Christian, but I suspect that his Christianity is mere graft.

The Stock and Bond Exchange

Sales on the Stock and Bond Exchange during the week were moderate in volume and investors were not inclined to do much business. Bonds continued to lead in point of demand but the aggregate exchanges fell far below the reported transactions for several weeks. Prices, however, showed a certain steadiness and offerings generally were limited. The 6 per cent. bonds of the Sierra Railway Company were still held in a favorable light and ruled firm at about $115 bid. Sacramento Electric, Gas and Railway 5 per cents continued one of the most popular bonds and there were but few offers to sell at $102.50 bid. Several small transactions in Southern Pacific bonds were recorded at steady prices. In general shares, trading was rather disappointing in volume. With the publication of the unofficial statement of the Oceanic Steamship Company the shares fell rapidly, selling as low as $29.50 but subsequently recovering to $30.50. Without any particular reason values for Spring Valley Water Company's securities receded a shade but with the payment of the dividend quickly recovered and ruled steady at $92.50 bid with sellers demanding $93. No particular interest was manifested in sugar securities and there were no marked fluctuations in values. The announcement that the Onomea Plantation would pay a dividend of 20 per cent. on May 5th had little effect on the demand for that stock and prices showed but a slight improvement. Gas shares were a trifle more active than for some time past and values were slightly firmer. The car strike had no effect upon values for the few lots of Market-street stock still held outside the Eastern syndicate and prospective buyers continued strong in their $100 bid. Eastern holders of the securities of the new combine show no alarm over the strike and Monday's prices on the Wall-street curb showed a slight gain. The shares of the American Bank and Trust Company were listed on the Stock and Bond Exchange late last week with $100 bid but with the announcement of the organization of the Board of Directors of the concern, the securities were quoted strong and the bid was raised to $105. The new Board of Directors is as follows: P. E. Bowles, president, James J. Fagan, cashier, W. H. Chickering, Louis F. Monteagle, George P. McNear, Francis Cutting and George A. Batchelor.

The unofficial statement of the Oceanic Steamship Company from March 18th to April 15th, 1902, shows total earnings of $198.425.68, to which should be added $20,870.84, mail earnings steamship Sonoma, voyage 6, which was credited in last month's account, leaving a net loss on vessels of $6,943.04. Expenses and sundry disbursements amounted to $116,425, of which $80,408.69 was charged to betterments, $76,429.17 being an account of work on the Mariposa. There was due John D. Spreckels & Bros. Company from the steamship company, on April 15th, $964,124.04, deducting $114,193.20 for various amounts due, coal on hand, etc., leaves net overdraft of $849,930.84.

In accordance with its proposition to the shareholders of the Oakland Gas Light and Heat Company, for an option on their holdings, the California Gas & Electric Company has placed a bond of $100,000 to secure the former concern. A consideration in the proposition is that a majority of the stock is to be placed in escrow with the First National Bank of this city before September 1st. If this is done, the California Gas and Electric Company, to have until March 1st, 1904, to purchase the stock at $70 per share.

Dividends payable during the week were, Spring Valley Water Company, monthly, 42c. per share, amounting to $58,800; California Fruit Canners' Association, regular monthly, 60c. per share, amounting to $17,109.60; Pacific Coast Borax Company, $1 per share; Union Oil Company, $1.35 per share, amounting to $67,500. The Peerless Oil Company will pay a dividend of 5c. per share on the first.

At the recent half-yearly general meeting of the shareholders of the Toyo Kisen Kaisha held in Tokyo a dividend of 12 per cent. per annum, amounting to $475,000, was declared and $196,-720 was carried forward to the next account. The steamers of the company ply between this port, Japan and China and the line is becoming quite popular.

Oil stocks have shown some little activity of late and business on the Exchange during the week was of quite liberal proportions. Slight advances were noted in values for several stocks and prices were generally well sustained. Sterling and Sovereign continued the leading stocks, the former touching $1.75 but receding some with the freer offerings to sell, holders taking advantage of the advance and endeavoring to realize a profit. Petroleum Center came in for some little attention at steady prices. —The Financier

A new act has been substituted for the remembered supper club scene in "When We Were Twenty-One." The more prudish playgoers did such a lot of carping against that particular scene that Maxine Elliott persuaded her husband to ask the author to write a different kind of an act to fill its place. Unlike most authors, Esmond did not object to making the change. He did not stand on his dignity but wrote the act which practically makes a new play of the old one.

Musical entertainment is the most refined and satisfying

The Pianola must have a direct interest for you. It is an ideal entertainer in the home and gives you the full value of your piano. It may be purchased by partial payments.

Fannie Bloomfield-Zeisler and the PIANOLA

The Aeolian Company,
Kohler & Chase,
San Francisco Representatives:

Ever since the Pianola arrived I have wanted to express to you the great pleasure it has given me and my family, but I really did not have a leisure moment.

I consider the Pianola a remarkable achievement, one calculated to exert a powerful educational influence. By means of this wonderful invention those who love good music, but have not had the advantage of musical training, can reproduce the most difficult compositions with much the same sensation as though they were themselves manipulating the keyboard.

Many pianos that in the past were merely mute pieces of furniture have now been endowed with a voice.

The Pianola may and ought to do away with that army of incompetent and ungifted players, who might be better occupied otherwise.

The technical perfection of the Pianola performances are, of course, the envy of even the most brilliant virtuoso. The opportunities offered for taking pedal, increasing and decreasing the tempo, and producing dynamic effects, such as accenting, crescendo and diminuendo, seem almost incredible in a mechanical instrument.

Altogether, I feel that the world is under a great debt of gratitude to the inventor of the Pianola.

Most sincerely yours,

FANNIE BLOOMFIELD ZEISLER.

"'Inside heat for outside heat,
Good for both the head and feet.
Give me love and give me wine,
Give me both or I'm not thine—
Tra la!'"

The tall, thin woman with a body as sinuous as that of the arch tempter of our first parents ended her song with a twist of her muscles that was reminiscent of the Egyptian corner of the Midway Plaisance.

"Hooray, Paula," cried Dixon, "did you compose that on the spur of the audacious moment?"

"Me—compose?" returned Paula coming down from the table with light steps and a spring that would have done credit to a gymnast, "why don't you know all my brains were addled long ago? Blow on the head, you know, in the honeymoon."

She laughed a hard little laugh with no mirth in it.

"No, indeed, Dixie, me darlin', that is not my effort. Kitty read it in a book lately. You know Kitty will read, and that little bit she picked out for me. Gay, isn't it?"

She hummed again, through puffs at the cigarette Dixon handed her, "'Give me love or give me wine, tra la!'"

"Where's Kitty, anyway?" asked Lenox, looking up from his glass, "why isn't she here to help us celebrate the success of her mother in the greatest play ever written?"

"Thanks," said Dixon, rising and bowing. He was the author of "Mademoiselle Ma Soeur," the comedy in which Paula Devos had scored a success on its premier, by creating the leading role.

"And her step-papa, don't forget him," added Paula, a sneer deforming her charming mouth, "what would 'Ma Soeur' have been without Pierre Devos?"

"Oh, dash Pierre!" cried Lenox, "I thought you said you never wished his name spoken in your presence."

"How can we help it—tonight? Did he not contribute to his beautiful, talented wife's success?"

"Speak of angels," murmured Dixon, as a big dark man entered the room.

"Ha! feasting yet?" cried the newcomer, "glad I could get here for the end of it at least."

He filled himself a glass from the bottle at his wife's place. Then he looked around inquiringly.

"Where's Kitty?" he asked.

"At home," answered Paula hastily.

"At home? Good God! what right has she to be at home? Send for her at once. What! she to be absent at the moment of our triumph? Why did she not stay at the theatre until we were at liberty?"

Not understanding Paula's warning glance, Lenox said, "Kitty was not at the theatre."

"Not there?" Devos' voice rose in an angry roar. "Paula, why wasn't she at the theatre?"

"Because I told her to stay at home," returned Paula, irritation obtaining the better of her judgment, "I do not care to have Kitty see plays like 'Madame Ma Soeur.'"

"Ha, ha!" laughed Devos, "what do you think of that, Dixon? Mrs. Devos won't let her precious little daughter see your play."

Dixon looked startled for an instant, then he recovered himself.

"I guess Paula's right," he said gravely, "you see Kitty's just from her convent and—and—well, Mrs. Devos has her own ideas about those things. Some day perhaps I will write a play Kitty can see, with her mother's sanction."

"Oh, Lord! I say Paula's a d——d fool, and if her daughter can live at our house and eat at the same table with us she's not too good to see us act and come to our apres soupers."

He pressed the button for a waiter.

"Go, Francois, to the 'phone and call up Miss Kitty Esten. Tell her to call a cab and come here directly."

Paula's expostulation was of no avail. The waiter went and returned with the information that Miss Esten would be with them in fifteen minutes.

Paula looked around at her companions. There were ten or twelve of them, the women flushed from wine and excitement, the men approaching a state of reckless and rakish familiarity. She hastily smoothed her own dark hair and dabbed some powder on her reddened cheeks. A line from the song she had sung so lately passed through her mind. "Inside heat for outside heat"—oh, how disgusting that her little daughter should see her thus, and Devos, and Dixon and the others. She had been so careful of Kitty. What if the girl should ever come to—this? Her gaze swept the scene, and a fierce, unreasoning hate of it all stung her almost to madness. Then she looked at Devos. There was an ugly light in the eyes he turned upon her. She saw resistance to his will was impossible.

* * * * * * * * *

Blood trickled from a nasty cut in Paula's forehead. It was not the first time Devos had struck her. If it had been, with her greater independence of spirit that had come with years, she would have left him. But she had forgiven too many times for this blow to inspire her to start out alone. If she could save Kitty she would count this but a scratch. She rose from the floor, steadying herself against the table whose sharp edge had caused her wound, and approached her husband.

"Pierre, you will not—please grant me this thing."

"Grant nothing," wrathfully returned Devos, "my stepdaughter shall earn her salt at least."

"But she does not need to—I surely earn enough. I have a right to spend my own salary as I will."

"Well, I say Kitty shall be your understudy. You have failed twice this week—fainted, and God knows what you'll do next. Kitty shall learn your lines. She's the dead image of you in face and figure. She's clever—"

"She shall not."

Paula came close to him and spoke rapidly.

"Fainted? Yes, and why did I faint? Oh, you brute! But I shall save my daughter. She's not to be in your power. Never, never shall she go upon the stage, to lead a life like mine."

"She shall. And if you put your will against mine, I'll tell Kitty all."

The last words were emphasized in a manner peculiar to Devos, a manner which was highly taking in the roles that were his forte.

"What do you mean?"

But her eyes were downcast. A low laugh was his only answer as he turned on his heel.

"Where is Miss Kitty?' asked Devos' dresser as he entered Paula's dressing room at the beginning of the last act of "Mademoiselle Ma Soeur.'

"Not here," returned Paula, calling her maid to bring the waist of her gown.

"Well, why should you be inquiring for Kitty?"

"Mr. Devos told me to do so. He wishes her to observe your acting tonight and every night, and he says in a week he'll have Miss Kitty taking your place so that you can take a vacation.'

Paula laughed gently.

"How kind of my dear M. Devos, the most thoughtful husband in the world.'

The other did not note the irony in her tones.

As two of the actors in the play met in the wings while the soubrette and the leading juvenile were going through their little love scene one of them said:

"What's the matter with Devos? Looks wild tonight."

"Drunk, perhaps,' was the reply.

But Devos had not been drinking, though he was drunk—with rage. His prey had escaped him. The girl whose mind he would have debauched as he had done that of his wife was far from his influence. Paula had just told him the truth. She had sent her daughter to her elder brotner's care. Better deprive herself of her child's companionship than to subject the eighteen-year-old girl to the future her step-father had mapped out for her.

Devos' anger knew no bounds. After the play he went into his wife's dressing room. He was there a long time and when he emerged he was still alone. As he crossed the darkened stage on his way to the exit, after changing to his every day attire, he met Dixon.

"Good evening," said the playwright, "has Paula gone yet? I'm having a little supper tonight."

"Damn you, muttered the actor, "what do I know about it?"

Dixon stared at him, not comprehending his ill humor, and then passed on to Paula's dressing-room. It was all dark there and he would have turned away only that a faint sound arrested his attention.

"Pierre!" a weak voice cried, "Pierre!"

Dixon pushed open the door and lighted the gas. A figure was huddled up in one corner of the room and blood bespattered the garments lying about the floor.

"Why, Paula," cried Dixon, "this is horrible. It is that brute, I know; don't you say a word. Where's your maid?"

"He sent her away just before the last curtain," gasped Paula, "oh, Dixon, I guess he's killed me this time."

"No, he hasn't," said Dixon, proceeding to wash the blood from her face. He helped her to rise, and took her street gown from one of the hooks.

"You must leave him now," he added, "God knows you've stood enough from him."

"Kitty's safe, anyway," said Paula, her lips trembling, "I wouldn't have her know this for the world."

"She must know. She must take you away."

"Oh, no—no," said Paula, sinking down again at his feet, "I can't go."

Dixon filled a glass for her at a decanter on the dresser, and held it to her lips.

"'Give me love and give me wine,'" she quoted.

It made Dixon's heart sick to hear the gay words from those pale lips

"But you don't love him," he exclaimed, "the worst brute that ever came into the world."

She put a white hand over his lips.

"Perhaps not," she said, "but I'm used to him, you see"; then, with an assumption of gayety, "I can't say why, my dear—but he's my Bill."

And Dixon went away, pondering on the things in heaven and earth that were beyond his ken. —The Melodramatist.

STAGE

Anna Lichter Going

Anna Lichter will leave the Tivoli at the close of the run of "The Fortune Teller." The prima donna is dissatisfied, I believe, because greater prominence is not given in the Tivoli's casts to Mr. Schuster who happens to be her husband. Such charming devotion is worthy of a better cause. Mr. Schuster never will be missed, and it is unfortunate that he is not content to have his clever wife earns laurels and a good salary. The Tivoli engagement is not one to be thrown up without regret, and in abandoning the Tivoli Anna Lichter shows herself capable of great self-sacrifice. Annie Meyers will play the prima donna role in "The Singing Girl" which is to follow "The Fortune Teller." She is probably better suited than Anna Lichter to the leading roles in Alice Neilsen's operas, for there is a soubrette flavor to them. "The Fortune Teller" appears to be on for an indefinite run, for it is being heard with the same enthusiasm that was aroused by "The Serenade." When Alice Neilsen presented it, the complaint was heard that it was too apparent that it had been written to exploit her talents, and that as a consequence there was too much star. But the Tivoli's production provokes no such comment. The ensemble work is sufficiently prominent, and though Anna Lichter is the central figure she does not enjoy all the honors. Arthur Cunningham sings the baritone role in a spirited manner and his resonant organ is heard to good advantage in the songs that won applause for Cowles.

Miss Wakeman's Voix D'or

Miss Keith Wakeman of Oakland and ex-leading lady of the Frawley company is in London and has been getting herself well advertised there. Her press agent tells the credulous of London that she has what the French would term la voix d'or, and that one of the first to take note of this extraordinary gift of utterance was Edwin Booth. One night, so the story goes, when the veteran tragedian was about to make his entrance as Shylock, he happened to be chatting with a friend in the wings, and he heard Miss Wakeman, the "new girl" who had been suddenly engaged to play Nerissa, and her deep rich tones reached the sensitive ear of the great actor. "That is a glorious voice," said Booth, "I will make her my leading lady next season." Unfortunately, however, Booth died before the end of that season and Miss Wakeman had to peg away unaided. After many years, the press agent might have added, Miss Wakeman's voix d or tickled the ear of the great Frawley and for him she played Sapho at seventy-five, fifty and a quarter.

Miss Roberts' Tour

Though Florence Roberts has been playing "Zaza" successfully all along the line from Oregon to Fresno, she has had more than the average difficulties to contend with. When she was acting in Oakland her only sister died, but rather than disappoint her managers she continued her tour, though her heart was not in her work. Then Marie Howe fell ill, but fortunately Georgie Woodthorpe was there to take her place. Lucius Henderson, the leading man, has not been well. He has had a bilious fever most of the time and when in Fresno his pulse registered 102. But he has managed to act his parts all right. The Sacramento Bee warned the people there not to attend the "Zaza" performance, as it was unfit for refined audiences. But then Mrs. Leslie Carter had to contend with that sort of thing. The Fresno people, who are a church-going set as a rule, had their doubts about seeing "Zaza" but they went nevertheless; also to see "Sapho" and "Camille" which Miss Roberts produced there. Chester Rowell, who does the dramatic criticism for the Republican, wrote that he considered "Zaza" not a pleasant play but a tremendously moral one. He said that Miss Roberts "brought out with striking force the element of human sympathy" in the play. The star's costumes made a hit with the women in the raisin city.

It is a splendid tribute to the excellence of the Pianola that Madame Fannie Bloomfield Zeisler contributes to the many testimonials gained by this remarkable instrument. Mrs. Zeisler says: "Many pianos that in the past were merely mute pieces of furniture have now been endowed with a voice. The technical perfection of the Pianola performances are the envy of even the most brilliant virtuoso. I feel that the world is under a great debt of gratitude to its inventor."

Willard's Garrick

Every grand opera prima donna is said to cherish a desire to sing "Carmen." And nearly every actor, on a similar line of reasoning, feels a longing to show what he can do with "David Garrick." I have seen a good many Garricks. The first was an amateur, Dick Hotaling, who was a mere youngster when he essayed it. But he did it well. The Eastern critics did not like Nat Goodwin's idea of the actor hero, but I saw Goodwin in the role in Chicago and considered his conception very truthful. Lawrence Hanley was an ideal Garrick, his personality fitting the part like a glove. The character calls for all shades of expression, grave, gay, lively and severe in quick changes. Garrick was an historical character. He really lived and acted, and he was one of the most wonderful figures in stage annals. To make that character live again is what actors have striven for in more than one revival of the play bearing the great actor's name. Mr. Willard's conception is different from that of any other I have seen. In looks he is unlike the impression conceived from portraits of the real David, but he has a remarkably intelligent grasp of the character. It is hard to imagine the real Garrick giving the famous drunken scene with more faithful expression.

The weak points in the American character are brightly set forth in "The Two Escutcheons" at the Alcazar. It is George Osbourne who has the part of the Chicago pork-packer with the Gibsonesque daughter for whom he wishes to buy a Baron. His impersonation is very lifelike. Marion Convere has the role of the sprightly Milwaukee widow. She looks pretty and gives evidence of being in a congenial role.

Earle Browne, formerly with Henry Miller's company, joins the Belasco-Thall combination next week.

My sympathies went out to the female baritone when she made her appearance at the Orpheum Sunday night. Orpheum Sunday night audiences have met female baritones before and they don't take kindly to them. They can conjure up visions of the fierce and freaky Emma Carus, any time, but they don't care to do so. The female baritone is always suggestive of the female impersonator. You cannot help thinking that one is as unfortunate as the other. A man's voice, be it ever so sweet, is never captivating when you hear it emanating from a woman's body. The pony ballet is still the piece de resistance at the Orpheum. Those agile young women that compose it are remarkable for their industry and their grace. Milton and Dollie Nobles are among the newcomers. They present an entertaining sketch. Milton does nearly all the work but you are not sorry for that. The triple, horizontal bar act of the Wilton brothers is novel and amusing. Manager John Morissey left for New York Sunday night to enjoy a brief vacation. He has not been in New York in eight years.

When Nat Saw Neill

James Neill and his crest are at the California this week. The play is "Captain Letterblair." The performance reminds one of that of E. H. Sothern. It is so different. Mr. Neill is a good mimic. In "The Gilded Fool" he reminds you of Nat Goodwin. In "The Parisian Romance" he revives recollections of Mansfield. An imitation of Sol Smith Russell is also in his repertoire, so it is evident that he is versatile. In this connection I am reminded of a story. Nat Goodwin is said to have witnessed, once upon a time, a performance of "The Gilded Fool" by Neill.

"He is giving a good imitation of you,' said a friend. "What do you think of it?"

"One of us is rotten,' said Goodwin.

Boys vs. Girls on the Stage

They've a little boy actor in the Belasco-Thall stock who is one of the best of his kind. His name is Norman Phillips and he is as good as Jimmie Horne was before Jimmie grew too old to play little boy parts. He goes at his work with a vim, and seems to forget that Norman Phillips is in existence at all. All his energies are devoted to making Willie Melville a success. Why is it, by the way, that boys are so much more natural than girls on the stage? When Wallie Eddinger alternated with Elsie Leslie in "Little Lord Fauntleroy" the difference in their demeanor was generally commented on, and generally in favor of the boy. In our local stock companies there has not been much opportunity to contrast juvenile sexes, because girls usually take the boy parts. But boys are the best interpreters of their own sex.

Maggie Moore Married

A few weeks ago I wrote a paragraph about the hard luck of Maggie Moore, the old-time favorite, who came back from Australia after a long absence, and found a frost at the California which has a copyright on frosts. Now comes to me, from the East, the news of Maggie Moore's marriage to an actor named Roberts in Leslie Carter's company. She met Roberts in Australia about the time of her divorce from J. C. Williamson. Actresses are never too old to marry.

Willie's Wit Requires Lots of Room

Willie Collier having been engaged by Weber & Field for next season, the question arises: How will a Weber & Field's farce manage to contain other stars when the only Willie is in the cast? The only co-stars Willie Collier ever managed to play even with were Charlie Reed and Fay Templeton. Since he started out as a single constellation even his own wife, agile-footed Ray Allen, had to take a round far below his on the ladder. The Sun said of his latest vehicle, "The Diplomat," that it is only Willie Collier traveling under an assumed name. On its first night, Martha Morton, who wrote "The Diplomat," was not present. The reason leaked out afterward. It appears Miss Morton wrote to Collier asking that the author's box be reserved for her at her play's premier. "I am very sorry," was the answer the comedian returned, "but there isn't any author." Most of the jokes in "The Diplomat" were inserted by the star.

"Did De Koven write Carmen?" begins one of these.

"Not yet," is the reply.

Daisy Darling, the ex-Casino Florodora girl who is the heroine, presents her card with "O. S." after her name.

"What's that for?" asks a character.

"Original Sextette," says Willie, "I know eight hundred of them."

Daniel H. Harkins, the veteran actor, who was a member of the McKee Rankin company at the old California theatre, broke down last week in the opening performance of "The Last Appeal" at Wallack's theatre. He is suffering from that form of nervous protration called aphasia. He was letter perfect in his lines at the last rehearsal, but in the second act of the opening performance, he mumbled something, made a gesture and looked appealingly in the prompter's direction. Everybody knew that something serious was the matter for "Old Dan Harkins" had never acted that way before. The prompter prompted but Harkins' memory had gone. At the close of the act a physician was called and Harkins was removed to his home.

When Ernest Howell left business life to become an actor, a good many prophesied that his ambition for a stage career would soon die. He played small parts for Belasco and Thall, and it seemed as if he would never grow beyond these. But he kept on gaining experience until now he is considered one of the best men in the stock. He plays a bootblack in "A Child of Fortune" that is a very good bit of character work. Howell was a newspaper man before he went into Andrew McCreery's office as a real estate clerk.

Louise Dresser, who will be on the Orpheum's bill next week, is a sister of Paul Dresser, the "Wabash" man. Her turn is a burlesque picture song, in which the illustrations—which do not fit the words—are thrown upon a screen upside down. The Nosses, also on the Orpheum bill, have a novel stage setting for their turn. It is Venetian, and the troupe arrives in a gondola.

It was in this city that Edward Harrigan received his first salary as an actor and he has always been a favorite here. In New York, at one time, he played exclusively at his own theatre, presenting his own works. It was in a Harrigan farce that Ada Lewis, the original tough girl, first made her mark.

Julia Dean, the artist of the Neill company, has a very poor part in "Captain Letterblair." She is soon going East where her talent will be appreciated. The Playgoer.

LETTERS

Biographies and Letters

The biography of Sir Walter Besant, now nearing publication, is said to omit personal details and family matters and deal fully with literary affairs only. It is safe to predict that in this case the book will have a limited sale. It is idle curiosity and the hope of hitting on scandals which is the chief inducement to the prying into private lives. In the matter of biography or autobigraphy there has not been anything more interesting in a number of years, than the two volumes of "Gail Hamilton's Life in Letters." Gail Hamilton, or Mary Abigail Dodge, was sister-in-law to James G. Blaine. She was right in the midst of the political and literary life of the country, and she must have known at first hand about all that was going on. The letters are most interesting, but they have been so carefully and conscientiously edited by H. Augusta Dodge that there is absolutely nothing left for the seeker after sensations. The result is that the copy belonging to the Mercantile Library of this city has been taken out just seven times during the year and three-quarters that it has been on the shelves. For one period of thirteen months it lay undisturbed, and for the rest of the time once a month is the average number of times it has been called for. How many of those who have done even that much have read the book there is no means of discovering. And yet I'll venture the opinion that there are more graces of style and common sense, not to say information here than in all the output of epistolary literature that flooded the English-speaking world a little while ago. The difference is that in the one case there either was, or was supposed to be a cnance of prying into private secrets and getting behind closed doors and barred windows. In the other there is absolutely nothing but the opinions of a very bright and observant woman. There are no malicious comments or spicy stories, and the result is that though Gail Hamilton was a shining light of literature in her day, her biography is without interest to the masses who devoured the Browning letters and that much discussed collection of pseudo Love Letters of an Englishwoman. If Sir Walter Besant's executors have cut out the personals they have cut down the interest, and sales of the biography will be proportionately small.

It is said that the royal family of England is surprised and chagrined at the number of autograph letters of Queen Victoria which have appeared on the market since her death. It is supposed that this can be accounted for only by the documents having passed into the hands of servants, but the supposition itself calls for some explanation, inasmuch as that many of the letters are those written to foreign monarchs. The breach of etiquette which would lead thrifty royalty to turn an honest penny by their sale could hardly be greater than that which would permit them to fall into the hands of subordinates or menials. Nothing has been said of the prices current for the royal penmanship but when rapacious publishers pirated the "Journal in the Highlands" and sold it in paper covers for ten cents, it is not impossible of belief that Royal letters are not beyond the possibilities of a fairly modest purse.

Juvenile Literature

Some one has graciously come to the defence of the blood-and-thunder story on the ground that people, youth especially, who read nothing else can be interested in these romances, and once they have formed the habit of reading they can be taught to substitute something more desirable. It is a plausible theory, but an untenable one. As well expect the grown man, accustomed to a meat diet, strong drink and a quid of tobacco to go back to patent baby diet. An occasional highly spiced romance, provided it is within the bounds of decency, will not necessarily corrupt even a youthful reader, but the habitual devourer of nickel detective yarns and annals of crime is beyond hope. The reader, man, woman or child, who deliberately chooses the dime-novel style of literature, knowing that there is a choice, could not be led, coaxed or driven to anything else, and the habit of reading, in such, is in itself a vice. It indicates mental idleness rather than mental activity. The habit of reading is an excellent thing when rightly pursued, with some system or some end in view, even if the end be only that of present enjoyment, but the habit of listlessly taking up a book and idly dreaming over its pages is a vice. Because teachers or preachers enjoy reading, they have somehow impressed it on the rest of the world that every one should prefer reading to any other amusement in hours of relaxation, and not to do so is something extremely reprehensible.

Any book is better than no book, and the natural result is that those to whom reading is not more than meat and drink fall into a habit of poring over yellow-backs in order to keep themselves awake. There is a large number of the inhabitants of the earth, perhaps fully fifty per cent, who get greater enjoyment out of doing things, or listening than they do out of looking. But a child who wants to whittle, to hammer, saw, or build block houses is commanded to "be still and get a book." In a vast number of households no other provision is made for children than a card at the public library as soon as they are old enough, and no supervision whatever is made of the books the little folks handle. They go to the shelves and help themselves, aided only by the advice of some comrade as benighted as they are. They read through the juveniles which have received the endorsement of their little friends, and there is no one to show them the next step upward. It is not astonishing that they buy trash, but it ought to astonish the parents who think they are doing well by their boys to know that dealers in cheap circulating library fiction of the lurid brand say their regular customers average five exchanges in a week. It is doubtful if any boy who has gorged himself on this trash for a year or two in the formative years could be induced to take an interest in anything else, and it is probably this same vitiation of taste which leads little lads in knickerbockers to stand on the points of their tip toes while they spell out the details of some crime from the files of daily papers on the reading desk in the libraries and move from one sheet to another in order to absorb all the details. Boys take to blood-and-thunder novels, and girls to love stories, not so much from natural depravity as because they do not know there is anything else at first, and later on, because it is easier to follow a habit once formed than to create a new taste. In these days of cheap books and cheap reprints of old books there is no excuse for any family being without its own library, no matter how humble the beginning must be. The price squandered each year for "Three-Fingered Jack" and such trash, with absolutely not a leaf to show for the expenditure, would fit any boy out with a goodly show of standard, classic stories. The old-fashioned custom of reading aloud a few chapters in the evening and of discussing the books read would create an interest in good literature such as all the school courses and all the "dime novel and trust to luck" plans have failed to accomplish. Meanwhile, there is no reason whatever why every one should read in every moment not specifically devoted to other occupation.

Not Old Bachelors

One of the local reviews of Josephine Dodge Daskam's stories of children, published under the title of "The Madness of Philip," takes occasion to remark that the three books dealing with children, "Timothy's Quest," "The Madness of Philip," and the "Emmy-Lou" stories, have been written not by the mothers who might be supposed to know, but by two spinsters and a "mere man." Now "Timothy's Quest" is the work of Kate Douglas Smith-Wiggin-Riggs. She has been twice married. Miss Daskam is still a spinster, but how could any one read even one of the delightful chronicles of "Emmy-Lou" and imagine that the author is a "mere man"? The masculine cognomen counts for nothing. No one who had not been a little girl and could not remember that same little girlhood could be capable of looking at things from the standpoint of little Emmy Lou. These tales are not yet collected in book form but when they are their audience is waiting. Mrs. Martin could want no higher testimony of their success than the discussions that went on amongst the readers of McClure's when Emmy's unpleasant experience with Miss Lizzie in the fourth reader class made it a question of taking her out of school, and her admirers feared that this boded the conclusion of the series. —The Bookworm

MUSIC

Delightful Programs

The concert given at the Park Congregational church on Thursday evening of last week was spoken of afterwards by the large audience present as one of the most delightful affairs ever given in that auditorium. There were some changes in the program which consisted of eight numbers. Mrs. Jessie Dean Moore, under whose direction the concert was given, was unable to render her solo owing to a cold, and instead of the quartet as a finale the prison scene from "Il Trovatore" was given. Mr. Leo B. Pomeroy's organ number, Smart's March in G, and Mrs. Charlotte Gruenhagen-Gwynn's violin solo were very warmly received. Dr. A. J. Brown, baritone, Madame Yda de Seminario, soprano, and Algernon Aspland, tenor, all gave numbers that were highly appreciated. Miss Esther Macomber's recitations were especially charming; her imitation of a crying child was perfect. Mrs. W. J. Batchelder was the efficient accompanist of the evening.

The San Francisco Musical Club's meeting last Thursday brought forth an exceptionally fine program. Miss Eleanor Connell read an interesting paper on Bayreuth, giving her impressions of the little Bavarian town and the Wagner operas she saw there. As illustrations the prelude to "Tristan and Isolde" was given as a duet by the Misses Manning and Clement, the "Rhine-daughters' " trio by the Misses Heath, Craig and Feldheim, and the famous "Walkure Cry" by Miss Heath. Mrs. Cecilia Decker Cox gave two groups of exquisite French, German and English songs, and the D minor trio by Mendelssohn for piano and strings was played by Mrs. Cushing, Miss Heine and Mrs. Holden. Miss Inez Strauch accompanied Mrs. Cox very sympathetically and Miss Tharp deserved her share of applause for her work with the other vocalists. The program was in charge of Mrs. Williams.

It is not likely we shall hear again the "Midsummer Night's Dream" music as it was given by Fannie Bloomfield Zeisler last Saturday afternoon. The familiar wedding march seemed a new work beneath those magic fingers. Mrs. Zeisler's audience last Saturday was much larger than at any of her previous recitals, but I should like to have seen the hall packed as it was on the occasion of Nordica's last matinee.

A Clever Little Girl

Baby Zena Keife made a speech at her benefit entertainment on Sunday night. At least she made a beginning: "Ladies and gentlemen, I thank you for your kindness," etc., and then, as she said herself, she "got rattled." The speech didn't go on for the tiny speaker couldn't think what came next. She burst into a ripple of laughter and the audience joined in the chorus. Baby Keife is one of the brightest children that I have ever seen on the stage, either as singer, actor or dancer. She is only five years old and in private life is just a dear little girl with no thoughts except for her dolls and games. The Baby Keife who sings and dances is quite an impersonal affair to the Baby Keife who is her mamma's own girl. She is a pretty, brown-eyed little thing, plump and the picture of health. The natural grace of childhood has been added to by education, and Baby dances like a sylph. At her benefit she gave several proofs of her proficiency in the arts vocal and terpsichorean—"Hi Le Ha Lo,'" a whistling solo, cake walk and other things. Her sabot dance was perfect in its clever Dutch way. "La Femme de Chambre," an imitation of Miss Kate Cutler's Suzette at Terry's theatre, London, W. C., was equal to Anna Held. The petite performer was costumed as a French maid, with coquettish cap and apron, and every gesture was prettily piquant. —The Music Critic

OTHER PEOPLE'S WIT.

From "The Greater Glory" by Marten Maartens:

"Surely no woman was ever wholly bad. Surely not even the best of men was ever entirely worthy of a good woman."

Father Bulbius: "Our most meritorious acts are not those which impress us most vividly with the certitude of their meritoriousness."

Freule van Weylert: "You cannot endeavor to act right and please relations who want you to act wrong.

The Baron: "There is nothing unbearable. Hell must be bearable, or Satan would die. We must not count on incapacity for suffering."

The Countess: "A good stove is like a husband—ca rechauffe. But the sun is like a lover—ca brule."

Une Dowager: "Society scandals are society suicides, and should be punished by society as such. * * * Live as badly or as madly as you will, but build your park-walls high."

* * * * * *

From "Arrows of the Almighty," by Owen Johnson:

"Before a man is capable of a great love he must have felt the burning need of it in his life; the longing and the hunger for the companionship it alone can give."

* * * * * *

From "Joshua," by Ebers:

"We are most ready to be angry with those to whom we have been unjust."

Nun: "I do not like to inquire about our fate beyond the grave, which Moses himself does not know; but whoever has lived so that his or her memory is tenderly cherished in the souls of loved ones, has, I think, done the utmost possible to secure a future existence."

* * * * * *

From "Diary of a Superfluous Man," by Turgenev:

"While a man is living he is not conscious of his own life; it becomes audible to him, like a sound, after the lapse of time."

"A facetious gentleman said that I was the forfeit my mother had paid at the game of life."

Alexy: "Of anything in the world one may speak with fire, with enthusiasm, with ecstasy, but with appetite one talks only of oneself."

"If women knew how much better, nobler, and wiser they are than men—yes, wiser—they would grow conceited and be spoiled. But happily they don't know it."

OUR OPINION

Score One for Schmitz

Mayor Schmitz has made his first big hit. The opportunity came and he grasped it. By refusing to permit policemen to be detailed for street car duty during the strike he averted trouble and hastened the end of the tie-up. He is entitled to the congratulations of his friends and the thanks of the community. It has always been customary to call out the police as soon as a strike occurred, and the inevitable consequence has been prolonged bickering and bloodshed. If Mayor Schmitz had heeded the demand of the railroad officials special police would have been engaged, and they would have provoked trouble. They always do. By refusing to order the police to co-operate with the railroad magnates the Mayor deprived the strikers of a pretext for violence, and if they had resorted to it under the circumstances they would have turned public sentiment against their cause and defeat would soon follow. The attitude of Mayor Schmitz was just what should have been expected, but he cannot be convicted of unjust discrimination. His conduct throughout the strike was manly and dignified. He appeared to regard the interests of the community as paramount and to be sensible of the rights of all parties concerned. Score one for Mayor Schmitz.

Hearst for President

Perhaps the end which Mr. William Randolph Hearst is striving to attain is the Presidency of the United States. That such is his ambition appears quite likely after perusing an article in the current number of the Cosmopolitan on the subject of the young Napoleon of journalism. The magazine began, in the May issue, the presentation of brief sketches of our Captains of Industry, and Mr. Hearst is classed with them. He has on more than one occasion referred somewhat sneeringly to our Captains of Industry and it is therefore just a bit startling to find him in the same category with John Pierpont Morgan and the other plutocrats. But the pen sketch of Mr. Hearst was written by Arthur Brisbane, an editorial writer employed in the Journal office and the author of those freak editorials which appear simultaneously in the Journal, the American and the Examiner, and which have a peculiarly academic tone. Mr. Brisbane is recognized in the Hearst newspaper offices as the Hearst mouthpiece, and undoubtedly his Cosmopolitan sketch was submitted to his employer before it was sent in for publication. Therefore it may be accepted as authoritative, and in view of the fact that Mr. Hearst is today a man of exceptional power and importance it should be read with great interest. And one cannot read the article without deriving the notion that the aim of the author was not merely to exalt Mr. Hearst as a journalist. This is one of the significant paragraphs:

"The writer believes that the actual intention of W. R. Hearst, through his newspapers, is to fight persistently the cause of genuine democracy—not merely the Democracy of a political party, but the real democracy upon which the government is founded."

This is another suggestive paragraph:

"He has established his newspapers and he is working hard, not to get a few more millions which he does not need, but to get what money can't or ought not to buy, a share in the government of the country."

Mr. Brisbane also takes occasion to announce the Hearst platform in this language:

"The public schools should be so good, the public wealth should make them so far superior to any private schools, that no father could afford to send his child to any save a public school. He believes in public ownership of public franchises. He believes in the election of Senators by the people, and in the control of all other public matters by the people. He is a Democrat in politics as was his father. He favored expansion from the first, declaring that if our system of government was not good it ought to be changed, and if it is good it cannot be spread too far over the earth."

Incidentally Mr. Brisbane tells us that Hearst's idea is to establish newspapers in all the great cities of the United States, that he will undoubtedly begin the publication of a fourth paper during the coming year; that he drinks nothing but water and milk, does not smoke and has absolutely no interests outside of his newspapers, except a mild interest in the collection of paintings and other works of art. What's the matter with Hearst for President?

To Discourage Bad Writers

Librarians are agitating the question of the advisability of excluding novels from the shelves until they have been published at least a year, arguing that a large part of the output of the press has no value whatever and the money spent in the purchase of the worthless lot is thrown away. There is no question about the common sense of the argument. Mr. Carnegie recommended to the librarian of his native town, which was the first to profit by his benevolence, that no novels less than five years old should be purchased, on the theory that a work of fiction which was worthless after that period was equally worthless in the first place. So far as the general public is concerned libraries are simply collections of novels, and so far as the majority of the patrons are interested, they might as well contain only "the latest." Statistics show that there are issued daily something like eighty-five new novels, not to mention reprints of old ones, and it is manifest that if even a tenth of these were to be included in libraries there would be no room for anything else. When a book is enjoying a boom there are waiting lists of twenty-five or thirty applicants, even when renewals are not granted and half a dozen or more copies are supplied. At the end of six months it frequently happens that the books are not called for at all. Any one who is in the least curious on this subject will find food for reflection by taking the books in hand and examining the librarian's stamp. Sometimes the books had no merit whatever, and sometimes they owed their vogue to some interest of a temporary character, but in either case, once dropped from prominence they were utterly forgotten. Though it is theoretically set forth that one of the functions of a public library is to educate public taste, the fact is the public has a decided antipathy to being educated. A library maintained by private subscription, which failed to supply the subscribers with what they called for would soon be obliged to close its doors for lack of the means of subsistence, and one maintained by public taxation would be in the midst of a whirlwind the instant tax-payers failed to receive what they considered they were taxed for. The result of any attempt to cut down the bulk of fiction would be the establishment of circulating libraries in connection with stationery shops, where for a nominal sum per week, all the novels one could read would be supplied. For that matter, there are a number of such places in this city now, where new books in substantial cloth covers are given out, and one may read one or a dozen in a week. There is really no means of telling a good book from a poor one, unless by paraphrasing the advice about distinguishing mushrooms from toadstools. One may reasonably expect a good book from a good author but the rule is not infallible, even if one gives no heed to the difference of opinion as to what constitutes a good author. There is something to be allowed in the matter of age, temperament, nationality, pursuit and environment. Boys take as naturally to adventures as ducks do to water, and the man who has not altogether outgrown his boyhood will still prefer a modification of his first love. The hair-splitting niceties of Henry James have no attractions for him, though they may represent the highest ideal to his cultured sister. Some people never advance beyond a certain stage of mental development. If they read at all they want their "Duchess" or Carey. It is waste of time and energy to try to interest them in anything but the simple, elemental situations of a pair or more of lovers who live through three hundred pages of variegated courtship and marry each other in the last chapter.

Hysterics and Law

A short while ago an aged man was assaulted in his own home, beaten to the verge of death and robbed of his small savings. It developed that the scheme was hatched by his vicious daughter and her criminal associates. When the case came up for trial the woman made a theatrical display of affection for the parent she had dishonored and all but murdered, and when the old man repulsed her the papers, one and all, exploited the incident in sensational headlines and pictures. Of course the object was served. It was intended to make an impression on a soft-hearted judge and to work up public sympathy, and whether or not it succeeded in influencing the poor old father, it would not have been altogether wasted. This time the father was unmoved and the judge unimpressed, but the trick is one which rarely fails to have some effect, especially if there is a jury, and it is usually worked for all it is worth, in one form or another. Instead of regarding a trial as a scientific investigation in which the only object is to arrive at the truth, it is made a sensational appeal to the emotions. A smart lawyer will see that his client and his witnesses make the proper impression and the device of having them dress the character is as prevalent now as when Dickens wrote "Great Expectations." The tableau of the interesting family group has won many a case and the widow who weeps picturesquely is more potent than her attorney's eloquence. The apparently artless sayings and doings of little children are never overlooked in a case where sentiment may be supposed to count. To such an extent has extraneous influence been worked in New York that steps have been taken to exclude it in a measure by banishing children from the court-room. But to try a case on its merits is impossible while lawyers are to be found who are willing to put clients and witnesses through rehearsal before going into court with a view of suppressing evidence and distorting truth. And there are many of that class in the profession. If juries were composed of hard-headed men of sense who could sift evidence and weigh facts apart from extraneous embellishment there would be less danger from hysterical outbursts and theatrical displays but it is almost impossible to guard against the tricks of astute lawyers who are not reluctant to manufacture an alibi or to suggest the benefits that might accrue from a bad memory. It is sometimes possible to expose a fictitious defense, but it is hard to prevent a lawyer from selecting a jury for its gullibility. A trial is a battle of wits in which each counsel does his best to befog judge and jury. The most preposterous theories are brought forward and the most absurd hypotheses sustained.

Misdirected Sentimentalism

Convict Joe King, recently released from the penitentiary, has been going about the country under the auspices of certain benevolent philanthropists, and dilating from the vantage-points of pulpit and rostrum, on the hardships meted out to the honest thief who tries his hand at occupations requiring less skill. Incidentally, convict Joe King has done some good work at his old trade and proved that his hand has not lost its cunning during his period of temporary retirement. Convict Joe King has been captured and stands a good chance of being given further opportunities for meditating on the misfortunes of the "honest tradesman." No one but the gentleman himself and his impresario is in the least surprised at the outcome of the affair. No one but the professional philanthropist ever expects any other result. The man who has been a thief from choice and who has spent half his life in prisons for his crimes will not be reformed over night. There is some hope for the one who yields to impulse and opportunity but it is safe to treat a second offense as a sign of incorrigibility. This King made a strong point of the abuse suffered by convicts in the penitentiaries, but it does not appear to have been sufficient to inspire him with any dread of going back. He appears to think that in addition to board, clothing, medicine, recreation and other luxuries and necessities, the thugs and thieves should be treated to free theatrical performances, horse races, base ball games, or whatever else they see fit to demand, and that honest people who keep within the pale of the law should humbly crave the pardon of these gentry that they have nothing better worth stealing. Of course impresario Montgomery does not for a moment believe that his favorite is guilty. Anyway, he falls back on the time-worn argument that the discharged convict has a hard time getting any one to put him into a position of trust; business men and house-holders are so wickedly hard-hearted and unjust that they will refuse to trust to the honesty of the ex-thief or ex-embezzler. They persist in their short-sighted methods of employing only such men as have not been proved untrustworthy, and what, then, is the poor thief to do? He must have a living and it serves the public right if he collects by force what ought to be brought to him as a voluntary tribute. The truth about our whole prison system is that it is made too comfortably easy for the average convict. Legislators and professional philanthropists visit these institutions and measure the life by their own. They conclude that because the coarse fare and prison clothing would humiliate them, therefore the convicts are humiliated. They think that because they would hang their heads in shame amongst their friends, therefore the prisoners will be bowed to the earth. They compare the cells with their luxurious homes, and in like manner, they go through the whole gamut of "tortures." Josiah Flynt, who is authority on all questions of penology and tramp life, gives it as his deliberate opinion formed from experience and observation that one cause of crime is the ease and comfort enjoyed in the prisons. They need not be made institutions of torture, but they should assuredly not be so comfortable that except for the inconvenience of having a previous record cited, a man has no particular objection to a second, third, or even fourth and fifth term. Convicts, as a rule, do not go home to luxurious mansions. Those of them who belong to the aristocracy are usually pardoned out and restored to citizenship. The ordinary run of them go back to their lodgings and tenements where their term of confinement has not affected their social standing. They meet their friends and associates as before, hear the news of the outside world and give in exchange such pointers as may be useful to any of the rest of the gang who may happen to get pinched. They are better clothed, fed and housed, as a rule, while incarcerated, than while free. Last winter some investigation into the complaints of convicts in a rural section of New York brought out the information that the pampered malcontents were living on food that the farmers in the neighborhood could not afford to put on their own tables. All this sickly sentimentalism wasted over the hardships of the scamps would be put to better use if it were exerted for the rescue of merely mischievous and uncared-for children who drift into crime through idleness. Prison Gate societies and Helping Hands are well enough in their way, if they were not so greedy of notoriety. They like nothing better than to have some loud-mouthed egotist going about the country under their banner, pitching into everything as it is, and giving them a glorious advertisement. It never seems to occur to them that there is anything unseemly in the setting up of a thief to preach honesty to honest men. Hence the jeers of the ungodly when the idol is tumbled from its pedestal.

The Saunterer

That Unsavory Libel Suit

Judge Angelotti has occasioned a deal of anxiety in smart society by granting Baron Von Schroeder's motion for a new trial in the notorious and unsavory libel suit, the scent of which still clings to the Hotel Rafael. It was sincerely hoped that that nasty litigation involving the Baron's reputation would never be revived, but the German nobleman is a persistent chap and I have no doubt that his motion for a new trial had merit, for Judge Angelotti is both a wise and a just judge and his decisions have ever commanded the respect of the bar. I do not believe he was influenced by public sentiment, but it is a fact that public sentiment was with the Baron in San Rafael, though a jury of Marin county citizens decided against him. Yet San Rafael is not a community of easy virtue. The good people over there argue however, that Von Schroeder is neither gayer nor naughtier than other men, and therefore he should not have been condemned. They concede that he is somewhat of a flirt, and that he is addicted to the habit of bestowing an eye on beauty as though inspired by the hope that it would become a joy to him forever, but those are mere peccadilloes that contravene no ordinance of Marin county.

A Compromise Predicted

But it was the Baron's hot-headedness that led to his discomfiture. He should never have invited deep scrutiny into his voluptuous diversions. I remember urging him to be less eager for a vindication, and pointed out to him that gallantry should dictate the protection of the women who were destined to be drawn into the affair, but he proceeded on the assumption that his 'scutcheon was paramount to the reputation of all the women in the land. Therefore I have never sympathized with him though I have always believed that some of the witnesses against him had steeped themselves in Balzac before going into court. And now there is a prospect of those unwholesome yarns being reiterated. To add to the horror of the thing somebody has started the story that on the second trial the names of the women involved will be mentioned in open court. Hence the alarm in smart social circles. On the other hand friends of the Baron are assuring people that there is to be a compromise. They say that the Call has agreed to publish some sort of retraction and that the case will then be dismissed. Let us hope that such will be the wind-up.

New York Honors a Californian

Louis Durant Mead, son of the L. R. Meads of Byron Springs, has been appointed to the regular staff of house physicians at Roosevelt hospital in New York City. This is the greatest honor that could possibly be bestowed upon a medico just out of college. Young Mead is a recent graduate of the College of Physicians and Surgeons in New York. As his duties do not begin until January of the coming year, Louis is going to spend the summer with his parents in California. The Meads are rebuilding their hotel which was destroyed by fire last year. There was a strike among the carpenters, which somewhat delayed matters, but everything is going smoothly now.

Gossip from Washington

From Washington there comes to me a denial of the report that James D. Phelan betrayed signs of a matrimonial inclination while sojourning in that city. He was a guest of the McKennas but as he is an old friend of the family that was quite natural. They are now discussing in Washington an innovation in official social customs instituted by Mrs. Hay the wife of the Secretary of State. She has laid down the rule that the wives of Cabinet officers, Senators and Supreme Court Justices shall pay the first calls on the wives of foreign Ambassadors. This rule is in recognition of the official status of ambassadors who are ranking next to the President in all public functions by virtue of the fact that they are the personal representatives of their sovereigns. A hint has been given also to the wives of foreign representatives below the rank of Ambassador that they must make the initial calls on the wives of Senators. Official circles in Washington have been greatly agitated over the question of who should call first. It has been a troublesome question since the days of Madison when a Cabinet meeting was called to discuss it. Ambassadors in Washington are comparatively new. The first to this country was appointed in 1893. Heretofore the wives of Supreme Court Justices and Senators have refrained from making the initial call and have trusted to chance meetings to put them on terms of acquaintanceship.

An Embarassing Question

Another social question that is agitating official circles in Washington, writes my correspondent, is whether the wives of United States Senators should call upon Countess Cassini, the niece and only lady in the household of the Russian Ambassador. The latter tried to fix the status of that charming young woman, about whom there has been a deal of unpleasant gossip, by adopting her as his daughter, but the wives of officials have not yet given her the stamp of their approval. The Ambassador contends that she should be given recognition but the wives of Senators have decided that as the Countess is not his wife she cannot rank as such. The position of the Countess is therefore somewhat embarrassing.

An American Man of Letters

Not half enough was said in praise of Frank R. Stockton, who passed away last week. Of all the American humorists none was so absolutely original as Stockton. He had as lively a fancy as that of Lewis Carroll who wrote "Alice in Wonderland." Stockton's fairy tales, mostly published in St. Nicholas when that magazine was in its palmy days, were distinguished for their quaint style, the remarkable plots and the amusing divagations of the characters. "How the Aristocrats Sailed Away" was one of these. Stockton's first reputation as a humorous novelist was gained through "Rudder Grange," the odd little story of the couple that lived in a canal boat, with their boarder and Pomona, the hired girl. Later, he wrote works that were finer in a literary way, but "Rudder Grange" has never lost its popularity. It is only a few years ago that all the reading United States, and our cousins across the water, were laughing over the adventures of Mrs. Lecks and Mrs. Aleshine and the board money in the pickle jar. "The Late Mrs. Null" and "The House of Martha" have plots that though simple are strikingly unique. The charm of Stockton was the general atmosphere of amiability that pervaded all his works. All his characters were genial creatures. His criminals were good-tempered fellows and his ghosts were sympathetic and friendly. His whimsical imagination in which ingenious perversions of the laws of nature were evolved never led him into malice or bitterness. His were the qualities that elevate the mind and banish the blues.

Can Write M. D. After Her Name

Among the graduates from the Cooper Medical College, who were awarded diplomas on Tuesday night, was Miss Millicent Cosgrave. She passed very high and looks forward now to making good use of her learning. Miss Cosgrave is a thorough Latin scholar and brilliant in mathematics. Incidentally, though this will by no means intrude upon her more solid attainments, she is a fine musician. She was a member of the Abbey Cheney Amateurs, the little musical society founded by Mrs. Cheney's pupils and named after their teacher. Mrs. Thomas Magee, senior, belonged to that club, as did Margaret Cameron Smith, Oakland's clever young playwright. The soci-

Brains Run in the Family

Dr. Millicent Cosgrave's sister Patricia is also a brilliant woman. She has studied all sorts of abstruse subjects, is versed in modern languages, and particularly shines in conversation. She is the friend and companion of Kathryn Dillon with whom she is at present touring the Orient. Another brainy member of this brainy family is J. O'Hara Cosgrave, familiarly known as "Jack." Jack Cosgrave started the San Francisco Wave when in his early twenties; though now he is only in the early thirties he has made Everybody's magazine of New York one of the best periodicals in the United States. He has the faculty of knowing what the public wants in literature, and of satisfying its honest mental cravings In New York he is regarded as the typical twentieth century magazine editor. The Cosgraves, by the way, are not Californians by birth. They were born in New Zealand.

A Young Philanthropic Club

The Alden Club which has been organized for philanthropic work held its first annual meeting last week at the residence of the President, Miss Mabel Adams Ayer, at 1622 Clay street. An interesting report was made by Miss May Morton, chairman of the visiting committee, and the members listened to an informal address by Mrs. John F. Merrill. A pleasant feature of the meeting was the presentation of a gorgeous bouquet of pink roses to Miss Ayer. Considerable time was spent in discussing plans for the entertainment of Mrs. Westover Alden, founder and President of the International Sunshine Society in honor of whom the Alden Club was named. The Alden Club has accomplished much good during the year. Its officers are: President, Miss Mabel Adams Ayer; Vice-President, Miss Jennie McFarland; Recording Secretary Miss Jean Pedlar; Corresponding Secretary, Miss Abbie Edwards; Business Secretary, Miss Grace Garoutte; Treasurer, Miss Elizabeth Edwards.

A Prize Collie and Other Things

While at the Bench Show last week my attention was attracted by the beautiful collies entered by Andrew Welch. The following day my attention was directed to an automobile which I was told was the fastest in town and was the property of Mr. Andrew Welch. Two days later my admiration was aroused in Golden Gate Park by the handsomest team of high-steppers I ever saw, and they were being driven by Mr. Andrew Welch. Here, thought I, is a young man who appears to know how to enjoy life, and who is given to wholesome recreation without making much noise about his achievements. Mr. Welch is one of the most modest of our rich young men, and that is perhaps why the dailies have failed to exploit him as one of the eligibles of society. His collie Gypsy Queen, which he imported, captured four prizes at the Bench Show, and he exhibited there two white collies which are the rarest of their species. Evidently when Mr. Welch was in Europe recently he found some things worth having.

A Novel of the Sand-Lot Era

Two weeks ago I announced that Mrs. Fremont Older had gone East to interview a publishing house in reference to the publication of a novel. Within twenty-four hours after reaching New York city she learned of the acceptance of the novel by Funk & Wagnall, one of the highest class publishing houses. The book will make its appearance early next winter. This first effort of Mrs. Older in the field of novel writing is likely to attract considerable attention for it deals with a subject that is of absorbing interest at this time. The title of the story is "The Socialist and the Prince." The socialist of the story had for his prototype none other than the famous labor agitator, Denis Kearney, and woven into the romance are many incidents of the sand-lot era. One of the scenes is founded on the threatened mobbing of Stanford's residence on Nob Hill. Mrs. Older was aided in her research by Kearney himself who is today a bloated bondholder. He supplied her with some valuable material and explained to her the methods by which he swayed the multitude in those stormy days of the Kearney riots. He even repeated to her many of the speeches that were delivered from the sand-lot rostrum. Mrs. Older's manuscript was first read by Edwin Markham, who pronounced it a powerful story. His opinion was confirmed by the publishing house readers.

How Howes Settled a Wager

It is hard for some men to realize that they are unpopular, and as a rule those who crave it most and prize it highly have it not. It is not every man that is so confident of his popularity that he is willing to play eavesdropper on his fellow citizens for the purpose of gleaning their frank opinion of him, but that is what Alexander Murgotten of San Jose did recently, and he obtained the desired information. Mr. Murgotten is a good "joiner" and he belongs to so many fraternal societies that he concluded that he had a host of friends. But one night recently one of his acquaintances tried to convince him that he was not popular. They discussed the matter in a saloon, and the candid individual offered to bet Murgotten that of the first twenty men that entered not one could be induced to say a kind word for him. I don't know whether the friend had put up a practical joke but at any rate Murgotten made the wager and then hid behind a screen. Each man that entered thereafter was questioned and the first ten or twelve threatened to dispossess the man behind the screen of his twenty. They happened to be fearful knockers and their opinions were unanimously adverse to Murgotten. Presently one Sam Howes entered.

"Say, Sam, what's your opinion of Alock Murgotten?" he was asked.

"Oh," was the reply, "he's a poor d—— fool, but he's harmless."

"Come on out, Sam, you win," said the man who had made the wager, and he paid the bet.

In Hanlon's Hat

When the clerk of a court says a good thing it is worth recording. The other day, Bob Fitzgerald, clerk of Judge Hebbard's court missed his brand new derby. In its place was a faded and soiled and battered hat, that had undoubtedly been worn by John Hanlon, the briefless barrister who had been in court that day. It had been worn by him so long that it looked like him. If you knew John Hanlon, and you saw that hat surmounting a telegraph pole, you would immediately exclaim, "There's Hanlon's hat!" When Fitzgerald discovered that it had been substituted for his head-gear he was frantic, and he stormed indignantly.

"Why don't you go after Hanlon?" queried Judge Hebbard.

"Where could I find him?" asked Fitzgerald, as though he felt that Hanlon was an incessant wanderer.

"Where is his office?" asked Hebbard by way of suggestion.

"In my hat," was the clerk's reply.

Was Probably a Millionaire

The press despatches tell us of the filing of the will of the Rev. Thomas De Witt Talmage, and about some costly presents received from foreign potentates, but no information is vouchsafed as to the size of the estate left by that renowned Barnum of the pulpit. Talmage was a cautious man, and perhaps he objected to having posterity know anything about his financial affairs. The probability is that he took the precaution to provide for the distribution of his estate without the ordinary probate court procedure. I am of the opinion that Talmage died a millionaire, and I have no doubt that he was just a bit reluctant to have it known that a worker in the vineyard of the Lord amassed such a handsome fortune. He was undoubtedly the richest clergyman in the world. No other divine ever had the knack of turning an honest penny so highly developed. Soul-saving was his business and he probably did a lot of good in the world, but he was always out for the long green and he pocketed it with a relish. His salary was twelve thousand a year. He syndicated his sermons for ten thousand a year and a religious paper paid him five thousand more to permit his name to be printed at the top of its editorial column. But those were small items. Talmage lectured, and he courted the favor of rich men and he plunged in Wall street on tips from the plutocrats.

His First Theatrical Stunt

Talmage was a natural financier. The profession of the clergyman was exploited by him solely on account of the facilities which it offered for money-making. Theology bothered him very little. Sect and dogma were incidents, and the higher criticism wasn't worth while. He began as a Dutch Reformist and turned Presbyterian because he objected to the responsibilities of the vestryman and the presbyter, and saw in Presbyterianism greater opportunities for his enterprises. To him all theatrical clergymen that depend on theatrical stunts to draw houses owe the credit for having pointed the way. It was over thirty years ago that he first tried the effect of theatrical antics in his first Brooklyn church. He threw something that looked like a fit on the church platform, and after prolonged writhing he stepped calmly to the edge of the stage and in sepulchral tones exclaimed:

"Young man, you are rushing to destruction."

It made such a hit that Talmage improved on the stunt, and by varying it somewhat and introducing accessories he succeeded in making himself the strongest drawing card among all the scriptural vaudeville artists of the pulpit. Talmage was a good man in his way and preached good lessons but he was a faker, and he didn't always try to conceal the fact. Being his own press agent he spent a lot of time with newspaper men and they had many opportunities of seeing him in his true light. He knew how to supply them with "good copy" and to do so he resorted to various tricks that aroused the envy of theatrical stars. One of his most notable achievements was the administering of compulsory baptism to a tramp in the river Jordan. He was once tried by a jury of Presbyters on a charge of "falsehood and deceit" and only five of them voted against him.

It is said that England contemplates putting a tax on wedding presents. At the rate that the public debt is piling up, it must be a decided temptation to the government to tax anything that there is a possibility of securing a revenue from, but wedding presents have been a tax on the givers for such a length of time that it seems only fair to turn the tables.

Bradlee Strong Not Financially Broke

The despatches from the East mentioning the arrival of Putnam Bradlee Strong and May Yohe in New York say nothing about any expected additions to their menage. They mention a Japanese maiden, and that is all. But some time before Bradlee Strong and La Yohe left Yokohama, in a letter from Japan I had the news that the stork was hovering over their domicile. It was then rumored that after the expected arrival, May would return to the stage. Strong is probably right in saying that he is not broke, and has plenty of money to invest in Wall street. He made over two hundred thousand dollars in Northern Pacific just before he eloped from New York with the sloe-eyed contralto. He disposed of his house in New York at that time and that gave rise to the rumor that he was hard pressed for money. It was also said then that his mother protested at the sale, but Strong told a friend in Honolulu that, on the contrary, the property was sold at Mrs. Strong Sr.'s request. She owns several country-places and no longer cares to retain her large town house. Strong said that he was never at odds with his mother at any time, that she never gave him any money and that he had a good income from his father's estate. In Yokohama the Strongs, as they were known, paid spot cash—and gold at that—for all they bought. They maintained a sumptuous establishment with a retinue of servants. All along the line from Honolulu to Gibralter the tale was the same—plenty of gold and cash payments.

When May Met Annie

Apropos of the return of Lord Hope's ex-wife to her native country I am reminded of the story of her meeting with an old friend at the Tivoli when she visited this city about three years ago. She came hither with Lord Hope, and one night she visited the Tivoli with Edna Wallace Hopper who was sojourning here at the time. Between acts they went behind the scenes to meet Ferris Hartman. and while there Edna Wallace introduced Lady Hope to Annie Meyers.

"Permit me to present you to Lady Hope," said Mrs. Hopper, and Lady Hope bowed with an air of great condescension.

"Hello, May," said the Tivoli soubrette.

"Have we met before?" asked Lady Hope in a haughty tone.

"I should say we did," said Annie Meyers. "It was many years ago in the McCaull opera company. You were in the chorus and I was the soubrette."

Lady Hope confessed that she remembered, but the recollection did not appear to fill her with joy.

"The good die young," said the farmer's boy as he wrung the neck of a spring chicken.

Political Plans Disturbed

It is becoming quite evident that if the astute politicians that are handling Governor Gage's political machine do not chain the wheels of the Schmitz band wagon it will soon lead a very big procession. The wise men of the Gage council have been cooing into the Schmitz ear in the most persuasive sort of way. They patted him on the shoulder affectionately, and tried to convince him that it was to his interests to enter into a combination with them. They assured him that they would be with him for Mayor again, and of course they expected him to join forces with Gage. But Schmitz has plans of his own. He believes that the labor unions are more confident of his loyalty than of Gage's. They have just had strong proof of that loyalty, and they are very enthusiastic over his successful handling of the street railroad strike. Schmitz knows that he can depend on the unions and therefore he has decided to try for the gubernatorial nomination.

A Complicated Situation

The Post which is the most ardent supporter of Gage has been boosting Schmitz upon the theory that he could be kept out of the gubernatorial race. The Post has also been very earnest in the espousal of the labor union cause but with both Gage and Schmitz in the race that journal will find the situation somewhat complicated. Schmit has become so closely identified with the laboring element that disapproval of his policy would be construed to mean opposition to unionism. Gage's claim to union suffrage is based solely on his attitude during the big strike of some months ago. He helped settle the strike but he did no more than any conscientious man would have done under the circumstances. His sympathy with the laboring element is not so clearly understood as is that of Mayor Schmitz. Hereafter Schmitz need not expect any booming from the Gage forces.

A Maryland Marriage

Those who met Mrs. William Bernard Duke and her daughter, Miss Jennie Abell, during their late visit in San Francisco will be interested to learn of the latter's recent marriage. The bridegroom is Mr. Francis Theodore Homer, and the wedding was celebrated at the beautiful country home of the Dukes, "The Ridge," at Sherwood, a few miles from Baltimore. The bride is the daughter of Mrs. Duke by her former husband, who was one of the proprietors of the Baltimore Sun. She is a very charming young woman and made many friends during her stay in San Francisco. She has traveled all over the world, and been to Europe several times, but that was her first visit to California.

He is Qualified

According to the press despatches Earl Russell has introduced a Divorce bill in the House of Lords. Earl Russell has had such a long series of marital troubles that he should be well qualified to draw a divorce bill. He is the gentleman who was married in Reno, Nev., about two years ago to Mollie Somerville Cooke. Upon his return to England he was arrested for bigamy. He was tried by the House of Lords, convicted and sentenced to three months in jail which he served. The first Countess Russell then secured a divorce and a few months later Earl Russell remarried Mollie Somerville. It was in 1890 that Earl Russell's first marriage took place. His wife was the daughter of Sir Claude Scott. A year after the marriage she sued him for a divorce and made sensational charges against her husband. She lost the case and had to pay the costs amounting to twenty-five thousand dollars. The case caused a great scandal. The mother of the Countess was convicted of libeling the Earl and the Countess was convicted of libeling H. A. Roberts, a master of Bath College who was mentioned in the charges she made against her husband. The Countess is now on the stage.

"Your wife is a rose of sweetness," said the bachelor guest.
"I wish she was anything else," returned his host, "for she makes me feel the thorns."

Driscoll and Cupid

The matchmakers annually list Celia Tobin and Tom Driscoll among the matrimonially inclined, but now they are beginning to realize that they have missed their guess. Celia Tobin has always frankly declared that there was "nothing in it." Tom Driscoll and Ed. Tobin have been inseparables since their kite and marble days and the Tobin girls have always regarded Tom as a brother. But there was no doubt that at one time his feelings for Miss Celia strayed from the brotherly boundary lines into dangerous ground. However Miss Tobin did not meet him half way, and though the gossips insisted otherwise, no engagement has ever existed between them. But now Mrs. Grundy has cast a new horoscope for Tommy and by all the signs and symbols he has found his affinity in a schoolteacher who is noted more for her beauty and wit than for any pedagogic talents. She is not a society girl nor has her family ever owned a stall in Vanity Fair but she has been "rushed" by several sprigs of the smart set despite the fact that her days are spent training the young mind. Society girls long ago tagged her as dangerous, but when several eligibles had taken turns at her altar and no wedding bells pealed, they pronounced her a harmless flirt. About two years ago there was a scare over one of the Tobin boys who was reported engaged to the fascinating young school teacher. As the young lady is not a Catholic nor in the Tobin set, his family were very much stirred up over the rumor. However Tobin was induced to cool his ardor and now, according to Mrs. Grundy, Tommy Driscoll appears to be serious, and a wedding is believed to be calendared for no distant day. The Driscolls still have the Voorhies house but their lease soon expires and then Mr. Driscoll is billed to start a nest of his own. Whether or not this affair evolutes to the altar there is no doubt that at present Tom Driscoll is very devoted to the stunning school teacher.

Reuben a Guest of Miss Hager

The feminine wing of the smart set has gone over, goggles and oilskin, to the automobile. Every week sees another chauffeur in the embryo, learning to guide the dizzy-wizzy machine and mastering the mechanism of its little insides. The latest aspirant is Ethyl Hager whose new automobile created a sensation at the junction of Kearny and Market streets the other afternoon. It was one of those footsore days when the cars were on a vacation. Miss Hager's mobe has been dubbed the "yellow devil" thanks somewhat to the splash of yellow on the black background, and partly due to the high rate of speed with which she whirls along. Miss Ethyl had passed the park examination with neatness and dexterity but there was still Market street in the thick of the traffic to conquer. She chose an hour when the streets are jammed and made the run to Lotta's Fountain without an accident. There she stopped for a moment and was surprised to hear a voice ask, "How much a ride?" Miss Hager was puzzled for a second and then noticed that all around her were vehicles flaunting signs of ten-cent fares to various quarters of the city. It was a white-haired old gentleman with a bright-eyed little old lady leaning on his arm, evidently pa and ma up from the ranch for a spring dose of the city. They were so keen for a ride in one of those "durned newfangled machines" that Miss Hager did not like to disappoint them. "I won't charge you anything," said the chaffeur, "if you're not going too far." So carpet bag and reticule, the elated pair climbed in and went with the wind up Market street. They were properly impressed with the horseless carriage and peppered Miss Hager with exclamations and interrogations. The old lady thought it "real smart" of the owner to hire a young lady to run the machine for that must draw lots of customers; and the old gentleman feared lest the "boss" would discover that she had given them a free ride and "dock" her wages. Miss Hager let them play ping pong with her identity and the old couple will probably never know that their chaffeur was one of the most exclusive members of the smart set.

Glass Veils Instead of Goggles

Apropos of automobiling, Lurline Spreckels has sent the glad news from Paris that at last something has been invented to replace the hideous deforming goggles that the chaffeur has been obliged to wear to protect the eyes from the sting of the wind. A Frenchman has put on the market veils made of spun glass that do the work of the erstwhile goggles and yet at a little distance look like ordinary heavy-net mesh veils. Glass veils are still an unknown quantity here, but several of the ardent chaffeurs have sent to Paris for them, for the average girl in goggles looks like Johnny Bostonbeans.

A Guest of Honor

The program at the Women's Press Association on Monday was not of half so much interest to those present as the presence of Gertrude Atherton, who was the guest of honor. It is a long time since the club had hold of such a nonne. It will be something to talk of long after Mrs. Atherton has returned to England. I see the papers say that Mrs. Atherton was interested in the formation of this association of women writers when she was a resident of San Francisco at the beginning of her literary career. While this may be true, it must have been a very faint interest that was shown. If ever there existed a press club that found less support from press people, it has yet to be found. When Emilie Tracy Y. Swett Parkhurst founded the Women's Press Association of the Pacific Coast, she had hard work to drum up sufficient members to make the thing go. The dilettante rushed in with outstretched hands begging for permission to pay dues and he called authors and journalists, but the majority of working writers held aloof. Mrs. Parkhurst's idea was to have the association a genuine press club, but she died before she could press her plans to completion.

Why Press Clubs Among Women are Impossible

In time most of the active workers in journalism and letters resigned from the club. It was not the sort of organization they had expected, not like a man's Press club. Their defections were filled by the dabblers in poetry and prose, and society women looking out for new paths of culture. The club is now a strong factor among the women's clubs, but it has nothing especial to distinguish it as a press association. It ranks with the California, Sorosis and Philomath and Laurel Hall On its membership roll may be found almost the same names as are on the books of those clubs. It is not likely that there exists among women writers, hard-working every day newspaper hacks or brilliant writers of novels, the esprit de corps that could make a real press club possible. That bon esprit seems to be known only among men.

If one first acquires a reputation for veracity one can tell stupendous lies without fear of discovery.

Glascock's Mot

Attorney Glascock perpetrated a bon mot the other night at a jinks given by his college fraternity. This fraternity was big pumpkins in the days when Glascock was at the university but the years have somewhat tarnished its lustre. It has fallen into the habit of drawing its members from the fast set. But there are many prominent men who in the past have worn the frat pin and Glascock is one of them. When he arose to make his little speech at the jinks a man called for a comb by way of jocular reference to the attorney's baldness.

"With so many rakes in sight, I don't think I need a comb," said Glasscock.

A Californian Song Writer

Anne Buckler Lake has turned composer and from New York I have received three charming songs, the product of her muse. One of them, "The Hills of Skye," is a little classic in its way. "The Wild Bird's Song" is another, and one of Browning's sonnets has been set to charming music. It is a long time since Anne Buckler Lake—she was Mrs. Toland then—left San Francisco. I had not known she had become a composer, though her work in letters is remembered as ranking high. The late Fred Somers of Current Literature considered Anne Toland one of the women writers of our time whose work could favorably compare with that of men. Her songs are characteristic of her genius—strong though tempered with woman's delicacy. Mr. Somers, by the way, gave the San Francisco woman much encouragement when she first went to New York. She became prominent there in magazine literary circles and she is still recognized as a brilliant writer.

Of the Southern Set

Mrs. Lake's father was that fine old physician, Dr. Buckler. Anne and Jennie Buckler were the intimates of all the young girls in the Southern set whose homes lined South Park and Rincon Hill. They were dashing and clever and Anne was even then distinguished for her great independence of character. Young Charles Toland, who was her father's medical colleague, fell in love with her and they were married. Later they were divorced and still later Trella Foltz married Dr. Toland.

Angelotti's Compact

There is a deal of manipulation going on these days over the high-backed seats on the Supreme Bench. There are more aspirants for the jobs in the Republican party than ever before. And as a consequence, Judge Angelotti, I have learned from a reliable source, has agreed to keep out of the fight. If ability and integrity were the only qualifications essential, Judge Angelotti would get the nomination by acclamation, but owing to the varied and complicated combinations that are made in Republican State conventions, a peculiar pull is necessary. Judge Angelotti did not pull out of the fight however, until it was suggested that he could have a Supreme Court Commissionership. He agreed to take it in lieu of the nomination for a justiceship. And now, I suppose, District Attorney McIsaac of San Rafael will prepare to succeed Angelotti. McIsaac became District Attorney immediately after leaving law college. There is nothing too high for him to aspire to, and he has a cinch on the Marin county vote.

A Chance for the Rich

A few months ago I told of Rev. Father Crowley's Agricultural College project, and suggested that it should receive the aid and encouragement of our wealthy citizens who occasionally give evidence of a desire to do something philanthropic, but whose munificence is often misdirected. Father Crowley is that broad-minded priest and practical guide of the small boy who has won for the Youth's Directory the confidence of the whole State by his splendid management of the institution which is now regarded as the most worthy charity in the country. Father Crowley has lately bonded a large tract of land in Napa county upon which he purposes establishing his Agricultural School, and he needs eighty thousand dollars to secure the deeds to the land. Here is an opportunity for some of our rich men to aid in the enterprise which is not only charitable in its object but which will surely be of great benefit to the State. There is need in California of farmers who will be at once practical and scientific, and the cry everywhere is to divert the drift toward cities. The College of Agriculture at Berkeley is nothing more than a chemical laboratory. It graduated last year only one student, and that one graduate was a woman. The fact that the Napa project is in the hands of Father Crowley should be sufficient assurance of practical and successful management, but it has also received the endorsement of Archbishop Riordan.

The Wedding of the Week

For the want of a horseshoe nail a battle was once lost. For the lack of a necessary pin Wednesday's wedding at Trinity church was on the verge of being delayed. As the bride entered the sanctuary her tulle veil slipped from the orange blossom wreath in front. It was an unpleasant moment. But Clara Huntington inherits supreme self-possession from her father. "A pin," she whispered. None was forthcoming from her attendants but a lady in one of the back pews relieved the bride from her dilemma by supplying the necessary pin. The veil was adjusted and the wedding went on without a halt.

Old Friends were Invited

It was a beautiful wedding. The effect of the festoons of tall St. Joseph's lilies in the aisles was out of the common and very artistic. The church was packed, nearly everybody in the Blue Book having received cards. A good many of the guests were old friends of the family who had known them in Sacramento. The Huntingtons were just like everybody else then, neither moneyed nor swell, but they have not in their prosperity turned their backs on the old set. Mrs. Huntington as Mary Prentice was a very popular girl in her set. She is more loyal in her feelings than Clara, who married a Prince, and who is now the haughty Princess Hatzfeldt. The Princess alienated the people of her own blood. It pained her when she was reminded that she was the daughter of a Sacramento grocer. Once she was asked as to the health of her sister, Mrs. Huntington, and in a frigid tone she replied, "I have no sister."

The name of Henry Bothin has appeared quite often of late in items dealing with real estate transactions, and as a consequence the envious are heard to remark something about how nice it is to have a multi-millionaire for a father-in-law. But the fact is that Mr. Bothin has been quite successful in business. His wife, Jennie, is her father's favorite daughter.

His Majesty the Stork

The stork is once more threatening to get busy. He has been seen winging his flight out Pacific avenue of late, and he betrayed signs of an inclination to flutter over the home of the Rudolph Spreckels'. He has been there so often, and received so hospitably that he finds it hard to pass without a call. He has also been taking easy jaunts Blingumward of late which probably explains the absence of Mrs. Will Taylor from social functions.

They were Merely Holding Hands

The green-eyed monster has been somewhat active since the Bowie fete. He was stimulated by an incident which has been the subject of much jocular comment. Somebody took a snap-shot of a little scene that was not intended for exhibition purposes. Those that figured in it were the husband of a jealous woman and the eldest daughter of a gray-haired matron whose powers of fascination have been compared to those of Mrs. McAllister. The man and woman were caught in the act of holding hands, a harmless diversion, but it has nevertheless caused a lot of talk. If it were not for the fact that the man is known as an incorrigible flirt it would probably have passed without comment.

Californians at the Throne

California has been well represented at the English Court this week, according to telegraphic reports. No less than three of her native daughters were among those presented to King Edward. They were Mrs. Richardson Clover who, as pretty brown-eyed Dora Miller, daughter of the late Senator J. F. Miller, is so well remembered here, Mrs. Charlemagne Tower, daughter of the late attorney G. Frank Smith, and Miss Helen de Young, daughter of Mr. M. H. de Young of the Chronicle. Apropos of Mrs Tower a funny little story has been told of how her father G. Frank Smith began to part his name in the middle. At one time he associated with the late Frank Pixley, and he was then known as George Frank Smith, but Pixley had a habit of reminding his partner that he was going ahead too fast, by shouting "Gee, Frank Smith." The name clung to and was finally adopted by him.

Strategic Mrs. De Young

That Mrs. M. H. de Young is a clever woman none can deny who has the pleasure of her acquaintance, and in nothing has she shown more cleverness and tact than in the management of the debut of her daughter, Miss Helen. Although, strictly speaking, not yet "out," the young lady, fresh from her school life abroad, appeared here at several functions in the early part of last winter's gayeties, and then was whisked back to Europe by her parents to see more of the continental world. As Mrs. de Young expressed herself, "I gave society a taste of my daughter, and to whet their appetite for more I shall take her away." Now having been presented at the English court she has received the cachet of Royalty which will entitle her to the entree to society anywhere. So we may expect the fair Helen fresh from triumphs in Paris and London, to capture San Francisco next season.

A Clothing Dummy's Debut

The coup de canon at the Town and Gown Club's production of Mrs. Sexton's clever society sketch "The Knickerbocker Dames" was made by a wooden man. He was a stern, blue-eyed, gray-haired and gray-moustached gentleman hired for the occasion from a San Francisco ready-made clothing emporium. He had often stared from the windows of that concern at crowds of smartly attired people, but at the Town and Gown he was introduced for the first time to the elite of Berkeley. When the president of the Knickerbocker Dames requested the custodian to "remove this man" it was the hit of the piece. The cast of the play was what in stage parlance they call a "picked" one embracing all the flower of the club: Mrs. Wilkinson, Miss Carlin, Miss Loring, Mrs. Lloyd, Mrs. Rickard, Mrs. Pierce, Mrs. Torrey, Mrs. Robertson and Miss Day. The accessories were nine aristocratically awful old pig-tailed Dutch heads, done in charcoal by Ray Carter, a senior at the U. C. who made the best of Blue and Gold's cartoons this year.

One of the best stunts was that of Ruth Loring as Mrs. John Jacob Astor. She can act as well as play the piano. She wore a diamond ring on every finger, which she admired during the others' "old long-winded grandaddy's stories." Though all the gowns were elegantly in keeping with the Dames' social standing, Mrs. Victor Robertson's carried off the palm for beauty—pink chiffon over pale green silk, with pink chiffon hat to match.

The Industrious Reaper

News has been received here of the death in Santiago, Chile, of Mrs. Isabelle Edwards who was a daughter of the late Mr. and Mrs. Faxon D. Atherton. The grim reaper has been busy of late among our oldest residents, members of the Parrotts, Selbys, Gwins and Atherton families having joined the great majority during the past month. Though not quite such old residents as the others above mentioned, the Athertons can come under that heading for they arrived here from Chile in 1858. The late F. D. Atherton going to Chile before the mast, won the heart and hand of a native Chilena with a competence which he invested so judiciously he was enabled in later years to rank among California's capitalists.

They Made It Fashionable

The Parrotts and Macondrays at San Mateo, the Gordons and Athertons at Menlo Park were the pioneer settlers of that nowadays fashionable region. The Athertons made their place at Fair Oaks—which they called Valparaiso Park—their permanent home until the death of old Mrs. Atherton several years ago, and here the younger members of the family grew up, and at the old homestead all the daughters were married. They were Alejandra—who is the wife of Major J. L. Rathbone, Helena, who first married Fred Macondray and after his death, Percy Selby, Isabelle, the late Mrs. Edwards, and Florence who is now Mrs. Perry Eyre. The Athertons have always been what might be termed lackadaisical in social affairs. Materfamilias never mastered the English language, but her two eldest daughters were accomplished and were great belles in the swim of their day.

A Secret Atherton Marriage

The Atherton family have at different times furnished fruitful themes for gossip. George, who was the husband of Gertrude Atherton, the authoress, being no exception. Faxon, who married the lovely daughter of ex-Mayor Selby, had previously secretly married by the contract system the daughter of an humble neighbor. The discovery of this "contract" was a bombshell socially, as it was not made until several years after his marriage with Miss Selby. It became known upon the legal adoption by husband and wife of a child born by the first union. This is not the only instance of a previous "marriage" turning up later to annoy members of our swim who had incurred other splicing.

Another Case

Take for instance that of Miss Flora Hastings who married W. Scott Keyes the present mining magnate. A claimant for the lady's hand appeared several years after she had wedded Mr. Keyes, in the person of a man named James O'Brien Kelley. He was the son of an inn keeper at Sweet Chalybeate Springs, Va., where, he asserted, he and Miss Hastings were married at the railway station. The lady explained that she had married him "for fun," but it required a double divorce, first from Keyes, and then from Kelley, ere she was deemed by the Courts free to again marry Keyes, which she did as soon as the Supreme Court decision was handed down.

A Leaf From the Past

Some interesting reminiscences of the Rulofson family have been revived by the unpleasant divorce suit of the younger Rulofsons. The reminiscences deal with the story of an old man's darling, the demon jealousy, a literary venture by way of revenge, a chorus—nay, a roar of indignation—that went up from one end of the country to another, and then the author's death. In the early seventies the name of Rulofson was the synonym for all that was elegant and artistic in photography. To have one's photograph taken at any other studio than Bradley & Rulofson's was quite out of the question, and the junior of the firm was the favored. Rulofson's wife died leaving him with several children. In due course of time he married again—a beautiful girl of eighteen, the embodiment of all feminine virtues. To his children she became a mother and won the affection of girls almost as old as herself. She entered heart and soul into their pursuits and helped make their lives pleasant. She was a charming hostess and a much sought-for guest in the homes of the inner circle.

The Dance of Death

It was not long before her husband, who was greatly her senior, began to be wildly jealous of his young wife. He made her life a hell by his spying, his suspicions and his unjust accusations. He vowed that he would make her suffer, that he would be revenged upon the beautiful woman whose only fault was that she was so attractive. And soon his revenge developed. It was a book called "The Dance of Death," a choice bit of pornographic literature, in the perusal of which those whose minds were not already filled with base images and impure imaginings could have them supplied at a moment's notice. The book was a diatribe against the waltz. Things unmentionable were detailed at length. There were liberal citations from Byron's salacious poem on the same theme. Rulofson exulted in the thought that his excoriation of the waltz would humiliate his pretty wife because of her devotion to the terpsichorean art. It was a book that pandered to the prurient and therefore it was widely read.

General Sherman's Wife Approved It

The book had a tremendous vogue. Sensational preachers rushed into their pulpits to gain a little free advertising by preaching commendatory sermons upon it.

Society leaders were interviewed and indignantly repudiated the charges therein contained. The anonymous letter writer was out in full force, while not a few of the country's notables were heard from on the subject. One of these was the wife of General Sherman who wrote a letter to the author of "The Dance of Death," praising him for his courage in attacking the waltz. By way of endorsement for the sentiment of the book and its suggestions she said it was all true, for she had felt that way herself. Slips of girls read it under vows of secrecy and silence, neither of which was kept. Callow youths absorbed its suggestions and went out to search for sensations. Altogether it was a great success from the standpoint of the panderer to vice. If republished today perhaps it would not make more than a ripple in the reading world. We are used to bonny hugs nowadays.

The Author's Fate

Social ostracism finally overtook the author of "The Dance of Death." True, the authorship was for a time kept a secret but at last it was out. Rulofson did not deny it, but after he had enjoyed his malodorous sensation for a time there were those who suggested a different author. They said Rulofson was not clever enough to write a book, but had hired the jeweled brain of Pen Johnson to do it for him. Whether he wrote it or not, misfortune marked him for her own. He lost his business and one fine day he went up on the housetop to oversee some repairs, and fell off the roof into eternity.

"Blingum has filled his house with strangers for the shooting."

Peculiar Legal Practice

The Widow Craven who still enjoys her liberty though it is generally understood that she mothered some forged deeds is still hoping for a compromise settlement. Her only hope now is to delay the distribution of the estate, pending a settlement, and her attorneys are still sticking to her. And the most faithful of them is James G. Maguire, the "little giant" whose virtues have so often been extolled in campaign times. To the layman unfamiliar with legal ethics the attitude of Maguire is anything but commendable. Here is a lawyer engaged in trying to extort money from people upon threats to tie up their property. Of course if it wasn't all right to do that sort of thing somebody would petition for Maguire's disbarment. Ordinarily when a man threatens to harass you unless you put up you regard him as a blackmailer, but if a lawyer resorts to that sort of business he is not even frowned upon by the court. Judge Maguire is an old practitioner and no doubt he is as well aware of his duties to his client as of his obligations to the court of which he is an officer.

A Direful Threat

Yet here he is trying to force a compromise for a woman who presented to a court deeds which have been pronounced forgeries. If she were innocent surely she would want vindication and she cannot get that by submitting to being bought off. It is strange indeed if a lawyer may, without violating the ethics of his profession, assist in the furtherance of such a project. Judge Maguire has sent to the attorneys for the Fair heirs a letter which he received from his client which is in the nature of a demand for a settlement upon the penalty of being subjected to some terrible fate. "If in after years," she wrote, "some of Senator Fair's children have cause to regret, as they most assuredly will, they will not do so without having been made fully acquainted by those in whom they have implicit confidence and know that the position I am about to take in defense of my honor, and the protection of other rights, was forced upon me by their own attorneys." I have been told that the Fair heirs have consistently declared that they would never give Mrs. Craven any more than what they estimated it would cost them to fight her. Mrs. Craven has been holding out for a larger amount.

The Passing of Mrs. Tevis

The death of Mrs. Susan G. Tevis, widow of Lloyd Tevis, was not unexpected but it caused a shock to many people who were sincerely attached to her. The dailies have made the public familiar with the story of her life. She held a conspicuous place in society here since early days. The Tevis hospitality was cordial and at times lavish. As their wealth grew their home changed from the modest dwelling in Stockton street to a more modern abode in South Park, and finally they built the present residence at Taylor and Jackson streets which for years has been the centre of a refined and exclusive circle. Although possessed of wealth and position, Mrs. Tevis had many trials which she bore with Christian fortitude. She was an active member of Grace Episcopal church. She Tevis, the youngest son, who was always considered by his father to be the business man of the family, married Mabel Pacheco and they reside at Bakersfield. News has just been received that Florence Breckenridge, a granddaughter of Mrs. Tevis, is in a sanitarium under treatment for a form of melancholia similar to that which afflicted her unhappy brother, Lloyd. Naturally grave fears are expressed as to the effect upon her of the news of the death of Mrs. Tevis.

How Hobart Lost His Home

The rumor that Walter Hobart is broke will not down. Yet he does not look like a young man who is having a hard time keeping the wolf from the door. But he was such a prodigal blade, and given to such reckless extravagance, that having ceased to throw money to the birds his friends have concluded that his purse is depleted. Only a few years ago he was known as Prince Fortunatus, for he had money to burn, but now there appears to be nothing but the ashes to recall the days of his dazzling diversions. His was a meteoric career. Born under a propitious planet, inheriting millions before he reached his majority, he set the pace at Blingum and a fast and furious pace it was. His polo ponies, race horses and equipages were the envy of his acquaintances. He married a beautiful young woman, the acknowledged leader of her set, and then he built a sumptuous mansion at Burlingame fit for the menage of a Croesus. But alas and alack! according to gossip in the homes of our exclusives, his two brothers-in-law with highly developed commercial instincts called a halt. They took charge of the estate, and it was found that wilful Wally had been plunging impetuously and imprudently. The Hobart home has passed into the hands of Mrs. Lester, and the place that knew Mr. and Mrs. Walter Hobart will know them no more.

End of Love's Young Dream

The climax of the marital troubles of the Rosenfelds is an unfortunate culmination of one of the prettiest romances of recent years. Max Rosenfeld was a jolly, good-natured high school boy when he met winsome little Miss Smedburg, a cute maid of sixteen who was teaching the kindergarten of which her aunt was matron. Theirs was a boy and girl love affair. Max was an athlete and one day when he saved Miss Smedburg from drowning in the bay near San Mateo, he became a great hero in his sweetheart's eyes. Later on when the youth entered the commercial world and became identified with the business founded by his father, the engagement was announced. At first there was strong parental opposition on the part of John Rosenfeld. Not because of religious differences, but the old gentleman did not think that his son's personality was all that won the girl's admiration. Though threatened with dismissal from the office, the young man stood by the girl of his choice, and finally objections were smoothed away. And now love's young dream is over, and already there is whispering of a second marriage.

Snobs in Their Variety

An unknown correspondent has taken me to task for mentioning the forbears of some of our smart society folks. I suspect my correspondent of being a snob ashamed of the occupation of an ancestor. But such contemptible vanity is not uncommon. It was lately learned that Mr. Edmund Gosse, in his life of Robert Browning, deliberately suppressed the fact that the poet's great-grandfather was a butler. No doubt the worthy footman was relegated to obscurity to spare the feelings of some of his snobbish progeny. A similar suppression is to be found in Burke's Peerage. The Guinness family of brewers now boasts two barons to its credit—Lords Ardilaum and Iveagh. They are described in the famous collection of fairy tales as persons of long and noble lineage whereas the brothers are removed by only a generation from a respectable butler who never made beer and who was perhaps strictly temperate.

Jollying the Rich

Bishop Potter is bound to keep in the good graces of the rich even if he has to distort the Bible to accomplish his purpose. The despatches tell us that at Yale University the other night he argued that "Christ did not denounce wealth any more than He denounced poverty," and that it was the lust of riches, the greed of gain, the vulgar snobbishness which used money for display against which he inveighed. Bishop Potter merely concurs with young Mr. Rockefeller, the heir to billions who recently told us the same thing about what Christ taught. But the Gospels give a somewhat different impression as to Christ's attitude toward the rich. After reading them the conclusion is inevitable that Christ maintained that riches couldn't be acquired or hoarded except by giving rein to evil spirits, or at least by suppressing the better emotions. Christ's ideal was essentially ascetic. When asked by a rich young man how he might inherit eternal life he was told to sell what he had and give to the poor. He never denounced poverty. Abraham tells the rich man that as he received the good things in this life, and Lazarus evil things, the one was comforted and the other tormented in the life beyond the grave. Very few of us live up to the Christian ideal. Even the fat and sleek Bishop who tries to comfort the rich does not follow strictly the teachings of Christ. It was in deference to those teachings that the monastic system grew up among the early Christians.

The Ping Pong Fever

There is no indication of an abatement of the ping-pong fever. Pass any one of our fashionable residences in the evening and you will hear the familiar plunk of the ball. The disease attacks clergymen, politicians and women's club members with especial virulence. Men and women of large and growing girth take to it with great enthusiasm. The boards are quite expensive parts of the equipment, but an ordinary dining-room table with all the leaves in place will suffice. A medical friend informs me that ping-pong will be the salvation of many women. The average woman doesn't get one quarter enough exercise for her own good. Her blood circulates poorly. She lacks healthy glow. Along comes ping-pong. It is just the thing. It is less violent than tennis but it stimulates activity all along the line.

From Constantinople to Yokohama

A New York correspondent writes me that the Waldorf-Astoria has a ping-pong room, and it is a great feature of the hotel. Ping-pong, be it known, is not a new game. It was played in Japan over a century ago. I met a tourist at the Palace hotel the other day who tells me that the game is immensely popular in Turkish homes. The Khedive's mother has a ping-pong table in her new palace, and her maids-of-honor are adepts at the game. They are always attended by a troupe of pickaninnies who pick up the balls for them.

He's from Mississippi

Senator Money who disgraced himself last week by trying to stab an inoffensive car conductor for trying to perform his duty has appeared in an unenviable light before. Hon. Hernando De Soto Money hails from Mississippi. So it was quite natural for him to resort to a knife. About five years ago this impetuous Southerner had an encounter with Uriel Lebree Hall of Missouri in the room of the House Naval Committee, and Mr. Money emerged from it covered with blood and ink and with no more glory than he achieved in the Washington street car. That encounter was known as the ink-stand duel. Mr. Money suffers not only from infirmity of temper but also from an impaired sense of the responsibilities of a position of high honor and dignity. His constituents should keep him in Mississippi.

He Disclaims Relationship

The man that toots the horn on Duplessis Beylard's coach is no relative of his employer. True he dresses like him and looks like him, but I have the horn-tooter's own word for it that there is not the remotest kinship. Indeed he seemed quite indignant when I remarked the resemblance.

Mr. J. J. Gildea has just returned from New York where he laid in a stock of the latest things in gentlemen's modish furnishings. Mr. Gildea has opened a new store at 715 Market street. This is distinctly a gentlemen's furnishing store. The newest models of hats, neckwear and accessories of the modish gentleman's attire are to be seen here.

Re-establishing Burr

Great efforts are being made to re-establish the character of Aaron Burr, and some of his descendants in this city are about to launch a branch of the association which was organized in the East to prove that Burr was an aristocrat and a much-maligned man. It is advisable for them to let poor old Burr rest in peace. He probably was maligned. It has been said that no man is as bad as he seems, and Burr was probably charged with many sins that he never committed, but he was bad enough. Only the other day, by the way, the St. James hotel at Port Richmond, Staten Island, was sold. Burr's death occurred in that house. It was there that he gloated over his collection of faded letters written to him by foolish writers and which were believed to threaten the peace of many a home.

A very enjoyable affair was the euchre party given by Mrs. John P. Young at the Sorosis Club last week. Mrs. Young is an exceptionally charming and brilliant hostess, and invitations to her functions invariably win glad responses. Handsome prizes were won at the euchre party by Mrs. Edwards, Mrs. Linda Bryan and Mrs. H. R. Mann.

Another Infant Prodigy

San Jose is rejoicing in a literary prodigy of twelve years who has published a volume of children's stories. The youngster is certainly precocious and without having seen the product of his pen it is equally unfair to either praise or blame, but on general principles it would be better to suppress the young author and keep him out of print for a while. If there is anything in him it ought to be given time to ripen, for the infant phenomenon, like the forced plant, usually produces abundantly in the first season and is either barren or gives forth but stunted and aborted blossoms thereafter. It is one of the evils of the age that children are forced into prominence so young, and we have a host of infant actors, dancers, pianists and artists claiming public attention when they ought to be in their nurseries. Rarely does it happen that one of them rises above mediocrity in later life unless it has been judiciously suppressed while there was still something left in it.

The New Art Society

Advertisement is a mighty good thing. Not only in commercial affairs, but in matters artistic trumpeting has its uses. In all the years of art in San Francisco there has never been such a genuine interest shown in an art exhibition as in the present one of the new California Society of Artists. The Hopkins people little knew how well they builded when they stirred up that controversy over the hang-or-not-to-hang question at the exhibition. They gave an impetus to art and the results will stretch far into the future. It is absurd to fancy that this clever little club of clever artists is going to smash the big association on Nob Hill into smithereens. It would be impossible, without a millionaire's backing, to do that. But nobody looks for such a happening. The picture show of the insurgent artists has been a success. Few of the many who have thronged the tiny atelier of Painter Neilson during the week have had any but good words for the things shown. The newspapers gave the exhibition scant space but then they were filled with the tales of strike and pedestrianism at the time the show was opened, and the pace of daily journalism is too fast for them to turn back. It is the first hanging of the work of the California Society of Artists, the offshoot from the Hopkins gallery and the result of too much Mathews. Yet is the boss of the paint pots on Nob Hill avenged to an extent, for some of the exhibitors pay him tribute in their methods, and make plain his influence on their style.

Too Much Ego

There are one hundred and thirty oils, water colors, pastels, etchings and modelings beside some pencil drawings. As a whole the exhibition is of a higher tone than those at the Hopkins' barn, and there is a delightful lack of pretense in framing. The masculine note predominates in the ensemble, and as a matter of fact nine women and twenty-one men make up the thirty contributors to the gallery. The insurgents have erred in too much sameness. They refused scores of pictures which might have adorned their walls to better advantage than those they took. There is too much ego and it comes, alas! from the insurgents going back on the very first principle they enunciated when they broke away from the domination of Boss Mathews and his pot-gang. When they flung their banner of revolt to the breeze, they declared they would have an exhibition at which only merit would count. Now I don't want to be captious, but surely the first showing of the California Society of Artists would have been better if it had less than sixteen of Blendon Campbell's canvases and less than fourteen of Maynard Dixon's. Both these men have painted well and both have great talent. Yet they have affixed to the wall some trifles unworthy of association with their own and others' best work. And Campbell has so overvalued his works that he has drawn smiles where serious looks of delight might have been. He is but a student with some achievements to his credit but with no notches deep enough to warrant asking a thousand dollars for pictures worth a tenth. Masters in Paris accept five hundred dollars for things yet far out of Blendon Campbell's reach.

Some of the Pictures

The insurgents refused many excellent paintings offered them for want of wall room but they might have discarded a half-dozen of Dixon's and the same number of Campbell's and a few sent by Martinez and Leslie Hunter. Then space could have been given to some who were not represented at all. These insurgents are impressionists. They say they paint the thing as they see it. Maybe so. If Martinez ever saw oxen yoking along in the fashion he has portrayed them in "La Oracion," it was a unique spectacle. The conception of this prayer is good but the execution is crude. He puts a price of two thousand dollars on this picture. In the words of the injured stage heroine, "This is too much." But you must not think Martinez and all these artists have not much that is worth going far to see. They have lots of really fine pictures, and the public shows too little appreciation of their efforts. Sandona shines in his one number—a pastel of a woman in a garden. Sandona stirred up the row in art circles which ended in the forming of this society, and he has a brilliant future if one may prophesy from his present work. Putnam, the sculptor, gives more of the promise which has distinguished his clever modelings. Miss Whitney has a bust of "Uncle George" Bromley which has good points but which does not quite catch the character of the Nestor of local bohemians. Piazzoni's "Solitude" which was refused at the Hopkins, is hung in great state. One of the best portraits shown is by Gertrude O'Brien. One could stand a long while before this portrait, and constantly find new beauties in it. It shows a woman in black, presumably just returned from a ride as she has her gauntlets on and her hat lies carelessly thrown by her side. The whole pose breathes weariness, not of body so much as soul fatigue. The pale blonde hair harmonizes with the delicate skin and large blue eyes. The skin and hair treatment in this portrait are perfect. Never have I seen anything approaching it except in the portraits by A. Asti that Gump brought from abroad last year. But Mrs. O'Brien studied in Paris. This portrait has the cachet of the Salon.

Studio Notes

Piazzoni's pupils are drawing from the nude. They have the old Frenchman as a model who has posed for so many art students. They are going to have a woman model next. Piazzoni takes his pupils out sketching now on Saturdays. Sandona, too, has a sketching class. It is formed of old men, and is unique in its way, a reversal of the Telemachus-Mentor order of leads.

Profits Not Very Apparent

The Marconi Wireless Telegraph Company is seeking investors all over the world. The company is capitalized for $6,650,000 and is offering for sale $1, 200, 000 of the stock at $65, the par value being $100. A special effort is being made to interest Western capitalists and the public of San Francisco in particular. The company has on its board of directors: Former United States Attorney-General Griggs, Commander Kelley, U. S. N., H. H. McClure of the S. S. McClure Company and Spencer Trask of Spencer Trask & Co., bankers. Its array of names is a very brave one and should invite the greatest confidence in the company's offerings. But whence are the profits of the company to come? What is to pay interest on the immense capital invested? This company has only the rights of the Marconi system in the United States, Cuba, Porto Rico, Hawaii, the Philippines, Alaska, and on all ships under the American flag. Marconi says: "It is no uncommon thing for the messages passing to and from a liner, either outward or homeward bound, to realize from $150 to $200. Upon a recent arrival of one of the American liners in home waters, no less than eight thousand and fifty words were transmitted and received in the space of sixteen hours. I would point out that if in each complete day of twenty-four hours, only that number of words should be transmitted between two of our transatlantic stations, at sixpence a word, it would represent an annual income of over $365,000 from each pair of such stations." The Marconi Wireless Telegraph Company of America says in its appeal to the public to invest, that the chief steamship companies are giving orders for installations on their vessels; that they are employing the Marconi system; that the company has secured a monopoly of mercantile marine signaling, and that the ships of the British and Italian navies are being equipped with the system. I should not advise investment in the stock of the Marconi Wireless Telegraph Company of America. It does not appear that the investor has any fair guarantee against loss, or that the company has any probable source of great profit. Even Marconi's claims to a monopoly on wireless systems is disputed and other inventors are installing systems, seemingly as practicable and successful.

The Sugar Industry

President and Manager H. P. Baldwin, of the Hawaiian Commercial and Sugar Company, in his annual report which recently arrived from the Islands, states: "That in 1901 the total acreage milled was 3,583.48 acres. The sugar output from the Hawaiian Commercial and Sugar company cane was 24,372 tons. Besides this the factory manufactured from the Kihei Plantation cane 1,796 tons. Cultivating contracts for 3,924.66 acres have been given out, and about 500 acres more will be given out this year. Labor is becoming more plentiful and wages are decreasing gradually. The new Puunene sugar factory was started January 29th with a 9-roller mill, having a capacity of 150 tons of sugar a day. A second 9-roller mill is being built. Oil will be used instead of coal for fuel in future at the pumping plants, a 5-year contract has been made with the Union Oil Company, at a rate which it is believed will make a considerable reduction in the cost of operating pumping plants. A 20-year lease has been obtained from the Government of certain streams, which will furnish somewhere in the neighborhood of 10,000,000 gallons of water every 24 hours in the dryest weather."

Stock and Bond Exchange

Sales of San Francisco Gas and Electric shares have been the chief feature on the Stock and Bond Exchange since the beginning of the week and prices have been fairly well sustained with liberal parcels of stock offering. At Tuesday morning's session 695 shares were sold at $45 while at the afternoon call 10 brought $45.37 1-2. Numerous buyers were bidding at $45 but holders demanded $45.50 and were firm in their views. Values for Pacific Gas Improvement Company's securities have shown a gradual hardening and there has been no liberal amount of stock offering. Oakland Gaslight and Heating Company's shares were also held at firmer figures. The increased interest in gas securities manifested during the week and the general strengthening of values is attributed to the option secured by the Oakland Gas and Electric Company which is taken as a possible leader of a plan to combine all the companies in the bay counties. Oceanic Steamship shares were a trifle stronger, buyers' bids coming nearer to the demands of holders; however, no transactions of importance were recorded, there being too liberal offers to sell. Rumors are persistent that the Oceanic Company and the Santa Fe are in some way connected and it is generally believed on the street that the railroad company will secure the steamship concern or the two corporations will be operated in conjunction. There was a slight weakening in Spring Valley Water Company's shares which proved but temporary as there was liberal buying and the stock quickly recovered and ruled steady with $92.50 asked. With the report of the serious illness of William J. Dingee the shares of the Contra Costa Water Company fell rather sharply but rallied some and have ruled steady at about $77, with moderate trading reported. Giant Powder was firm, touching $80, and Alaska Packers Association's issues reached $160 and was strong at the advance. Several parcels of these securities changed hands. Bank stocks held up well, $1,990 being bid for German and $525 for San Francisco Savings Union, with no offers to sell. Trading in bonds has been limited and confined to a small variety. Sacramento Electric, Gas and Railway, 5 per cents were firmer, reaching as high as $105 against $102.50 last week. The 6 per cent bonds of the Sierra Railway Company were also firmer and there were no great quantity offering. Buyers raised their bids to $116 against $115 last week. Oakland Water Company's 5 per cents came in for some attention and quite a few brought $104.

Financial Notes

The market for Oil shares has been very apathetic, investors generally being backward, apparently under the belief that prices would be lower. Reports from the fields, however, have shown some additional favorable features, under the influence of which prices have maintained a good steady tone. Sterling has been one of the stocks most largely dealt in, the fluctuations in the price of this stock being kept within narrow limits. Reed Crude and Sovereign have also developed some attention. The dividends on Oil stocks for April are considerably in excess of $100,000, more than one-half the total being divided among the shareholders of one company. One broker failed during the week but this had no effect upon the market.

Owing to the favorable reports from the leading north end mines on the Comstock and from the Brunswick lode workings, speculation in the market for mining shares has been more active during the past few days and there has been a general hardening in values. Sales have been numerous and the prices realized for many of the stocks were considerably higher than for many months past.

The interest coupons of the Market-street Cable Railway, Park & Ocean Railroad, Omnibus Cable, Powell-street, Market-street Railway, Park & Cliff House Railway, Ferries & Cliff House Railway and Sutter-street Railway will hereafter be payable at the office of the treasurer of the United Railroads of San Francisco, in the Wells, Fargo & Co.'s building.

The directors of the City & County Bank, which was recently incorporated, are A. J. Lowenberg, P. N. Lilienthal, C. A. Malin, Matthew Nunan, A. Ponn, L. V. Merle and L. Auerbach. The capital stock has been placed at $250,000 in 2,500 shares of $100 each. This has been fully subscribed. The bank was started by P. N. Lilienthal, manager of the Anglo-California bank, to provide accommodation for the retail trade south of Market street. It is to be located somewhere between Fifth and Ninth streets.

My Lady's Lace—Strait-Laced?

"My lace has slipped, pray, fix it, sir!"
My Lady said, with winsome pout.
I stooped at once, without demur,
But soon was in a maze of doubt.

With modest air her dainty dress
Was slightly raised to show her shoe:
But as I looked I must confess
I did not know just what to do.

There was her shoe-lace, sure enough,
But, eke, below the dress upraised
Peered out a mass of filmy stuff
Which left my senses sorely dazed.

"Well, sir," said she, "hast gone to sleep?
Why don't you fix the lace at once?"
My greedy eyes took one last peep,
And then, with air of stupid dunce,

Quoth I, "Which lace?" Her bright glance fell,
And, blushing, on my ear she placed
A sounding slap, which told me well
Though lace was loose, she was strait-laced.

THE DEPARTED ONE.

Thy soul above all souls must I adore
And worship its great Presence in thine eyes.
Lights dowered with a ray from Paradise,
Whose light is Love alone as Heaven's core.
So much I hoped not and dare hope no more
Than but to watch thee in those utmost skies,
For me the loveliest of all stars that rise
Joyous into the night, with all their lore.

Did I not know thee once, not long ago,
Ere ever gathered in this life's small shell?
The heart can doubt bedim it,—when the soul
Cries out beyond the world it loves thee well?
Yet the Lethean river parts us—O,
What mists from up its silent waters roll!

THE WICKED FLEA.

It used to be said in San Francisco that if one took up a pail of sand, one-third of it would hop out. That may explain why people here frankly acknowledge the presence of fleas and admit personal contributions to the maintenance of the same. Nevertheless only a small fraction of the feeling on that subject finds vent in words. It is housed with the other pent-up emotions. Our knowledge of fleas, like our acquaintance with relatives and friends, is founded on personal association, not on scientific observation. Not a traveler to our shores fails to make his involuntary contribution to the sustenance of this part of our population. They are unavoidable tax-gatherers, and in darkness and daylight alike, they ramble freely. They make no distinction between the homes of the rich or the poor, the sanctuary or places of amusement. Though they are not on the list of "those present" they never miss a "first night." No one is spared, and yet, these active compatriots of ours have likes and dislikes that they unerringly observe. Here and there is a person that they will not touch, and with some others they will bite only about the neck; usually they are indiscriminate in their attentions, but these exceptions are universally observed. The bite of a flea is in inverse ratio to its size; the little fleas can bite harder and oftener than the large ones. They multiply in a measure exceeding human compliance with the first commandment, and no army supplies the places of the fallen as quickly and competently; their reserves are inexhaustible. Flea remedies and flea preventives without number are advertised, but—the only flea that will not bite is a dead one. Not long after the ceremony of a recent notable marriage, the bride disappeared. Scarcely noticed at first, soon the maid of honor and the bridesmaids felt that they must find the missing bride. Many things possible and impossible tortured their imaginings. One even whispered "Ginevra," the others said "Hush!" but, with paled cheeks, quickened their steps. At last they found the bride in the seclusion of her chamber, bending over a bowl of water. "What is it?" they asked breathlessly, "what is the matter?" She looked up in wonder at their anxious faces. "I've been Drowned within the last two hours," she said and smiled charmingly, "and found the procedure pleasant and impressive; why shouldn't I drown a flea?"

A Victim.

AN AUTHORESS DISAPPOINTS

Scene: Reception hall of the Women Writers' Club, during progress of reception. A babel of voices.

The President: Yes, she's really coming.

The Secretary: Yes, Mrs. Sparhawk North has signified her acceptance of our invitation to be present.

The Treasurer: But it's time for the program to begin and she isn't here.

Mrs. Dilettante: Are you quite sure? I thought I saw her enter just now; that blonde.

The Secretary: Oh, no, that can't be she. Why, she's just from Europe, and would wear a Paris frock of course. That blonde has on a tweed suit.

Mrs. Dilettante: Well, it's she, I know it. I went to school with her, and I ought to know.

The President: Yes, that's certainly Mrs. North. I must now request her to go upon the platform.

A minute later:

The President: We would consider it an honor if you would take your place with the officers of the Women Writers' Club, on the stage.

Mrs. North: Oh, no, indeed. I thank you very much, but I prefer to sit here.

The President: But we expected you to address us, and besides the ladies would like to have a good look at you.

Mrs. North (smiling charmingly but deprecatingly): Thank you so much, but I am not a speaker.

The President: Well, then, won't you kindly stand on the stage just a few minutes, so that all the ladies may see you? This is the first opportunity they have had to see a genuine writer.

Miss Pennyliner (sotto voce): Oh, I don't know; I attend every meeting.

Mrs. North politely but firmly declines to exhibit herself as a freak.

The President: Well, then, won't you tell us why you write novels? Is it because of an imperious, irresistible inspiration?

Mrs. North: Well—sometimes.

The President: Of course you don't do it for a living.

Mrs. North: Oh, certainly not; just for pin-money. And then, there's that occasional rainy day. It's so dull! I long to drive the blues away, so I sit down and write a novel or two.

At the close of the meeting the secretary remarks to a friend: "What a terrible disappointment. I thought that Mrs. North intended to tell us just how a successful novel should be written." —The Reporter.

"I wish we had a law like that in 'The Singing Girl,'" said Tom.

"What's that?" asked Rose Bud with a smile that caused Tom's heart to palpitate wildly.

"All persons caught flirting are compelled to marry."

"In that case," observed the Chaperon, "I fear Rose would have to live in Salt Lake City."

The Story of an Audacious Heiress

When Cecil Deering gave up his minor position in the bank and started out as a gentleman of leisure, the world wondered. When he established himself in an elegant flat, with a negro bell boy, an English valet and a Parisian chef they began to think some unknown relative had died and left him a fortune.

Cecil became a butterfly. He was always at afternoon teas and was daily seen driving or riding in the Park with Eleanor Mills.

Miss Mills had more money than she knew what to do with. She was thirty, and acknowledged to twenty-eight. Her income was apparently inexhaustible, and she had a mind as broad as the ocean and as wide open to receive impressions as her purse was to dispense largesse to the needy.

With all her independence and affectation of masculinity she was as feminine a bit of womanhood as God ever made. If ever a woman existed who seemed built for love and kisses, matrimony and babies, it was Eleanor Mills. Yet she was thirty and still unmarried.

"Men don't seem to care for her in spite of her looks and money," was what her dear dozen bosom friends of her own sex gave of the explanation.

The men knew better, but of course they didn't say; for what man cares to make himself the object of his friends' quips and jibes as a jilted one?

As for Eleanor Mills, she knew very well why she turned down so many eligibles, and closed her eyes on the worshipers that knelt at her shrine. Ted Eckhart knew, too, and he also knew that so far as he was concerned there was little chance of Miss Mills ever gaining her heart's desire. He felt that he loved her and he argued with himself that he would marry her some day, but meanwhile Estelle seemed to exercise some hypnotic power over him. Estelle had been his bon ami for years. Estelle was a vivacious little woman, very beautiful and persuasive. She was of the type dark as night, and her eyes were sensuous and enthralling. But Ted knew that he could never marry Estelle. She was his toy, his plaything, but he could not cast her away. His friends said he lacked the courage. Estelle knew of Miss Mills' infatuation for her lover and she was confident that he would never be lost to her. She hated Miss Mills and when she told Ted of her hatred, her teeth gleamed and her sensuous eyes became somewhat startling.

At such times Ted always reassured her of his undying fidelity.

Miss Mills was concocting a cocktail, a satisfying mixture of angostura, vermouth and scotch. Ted Eckhart looked on and admired the deft white fingers. He counted himself a happy man that he might look on.

"See here, Ted," exclaimed the heiress, "I don't like this one-sided arrangement, and I say it's going to stop. Right here, too!"

"Beg pardon," remarked Eckhart, not being intuitive enough to have followed the unspoken line of reasoning leading up to the outburst.

"Yes, stop," said Miss Mills, dabbing a cherry viciously with a nut-pick, "this is the last time you shall enter my house, unless— "

Eckhart knew the unless. He had heard it before and argued it away.

"One rule for man—pah! Wait till you see me."

It was not until a week later that Eckhart grasped the signification of that emphatic personal pronoun.

Estelle enjoyed the momentary triumph of the archer who has hit the bulls-eye.

"What under the sun are you talking about?" asked Eckhart.

"The heiress," she returned, "your heiress. Oh, Lord! How shocking! so shocking—it takes these heiresses born with diamond necklaces to create new diversions. Talk of Us; well, don't tell me anything else. I'm ready to die now."

"You are wild to dream of such a thing," said Eckhart, "don't defame Miss Mills by coupling her name with such a story."

"Ah, but Deering told me himself. She pays for all."

"Deering told you! Where did you become acquainted with Deering?"

"Oh, I've met him. He's a lovely fellow, too. And he isn't much in love with Miss Mills, either, but he says she's a good thing.'

"The scoundrel," exclaimed Eckhart.

"Oh, he's like all men," said Estelle with a toss of her head. "These men of society haven't much sense of honor. They're either idiots or oracles, and the society in which they move is a lie. It's worse than rank hypocrisy."

"So you don't care whether you are being talked about," said Eckhart.

"Why should I care? Gossip can't injure me. Nobody in society escapes gossip. Besides it's fashionable to be wicked. Some day I'll marry and then I'll quit society."

"But this man Deering is a scoundrel. He talks about you."

"How do you know?'

"I've heard it."

"If you respect me, you shouldn't listen to gossip about me."

"Do you intend to go on this way?" he asked passionately.

"Do you intend to continue on your way?" she smilingly retorted.

"But I'm a man."

"And I am a woman. There's not much difference between us. You have told me you love me, but you bestow your affection on another. Mr. Deering is nothing to me. I have availed myself of him to subserve a purpose. When it is accomplished I'll tell you about it!"

"You give him money."

"Yes, for a purpose."

Three months later club gossip ran high. "Hear about Eckhart's girl Estelle?" one club man asked another.

"Hear what?"

"Estelle skipped out with Deering, the chap that was so chummy with Miss Mills, and Miss Mills was quietly married the other day to Eckhart."

"Yes," said Mrs. Eckhart, the day of her marriage, "Cecil Deering did spend my money. I told you I availed myself of him to subserve a purpose. My purpose has been subserved. He was nothing to me, but he kept his compact. He earned his money."

Maxine and Her Accent

Maxine Elliott, the beautiful ox-eyed Maxine, has come back to us more beautiful than ever because a trifle less buxom and a shade more graceful of contour, and with a fetching English accent. The accent probably goes with the home for the Goodwin menage recently purchased in England. It has the true ring, has the Elliott accent, and it is hard to believe that the owner of it ever lived in Oakland. It faintly suggests the Dublin accent of Ada Rehan acquired in Connecticut, but it is not so mellow. But that is perhaps because the beautiful Maxine is not quite sure of it yet. It is not so easy to shake off Oakland influences. As Phyllis Ericson, Maxine Elliott is as charming as ever. Her pulchritude continues to be more impressive than her art but that is no disparagement of her acting. A theatre-goer should not expect too much for his money, but the fact is that Maxine Elliott is a clever actress even though she does lack magnetism. "When We Were Twenty-One" has been altered since its original production but it has not suffered from the emendation. The scene that rendered it a trifle risque has been cut out and a new one substituted that in no way mars the story. Goodwin's quaint humor is as infectious as ever and his Richard Carewe is all that the playwright intends him to be. Frederick Tiden as the Imp suffers by contrast with Harry Woodruff who made a great success in the part. The company is an adequate one, and crowded houses have been the rule at the Columbia all week. Goodwin will enjoy a most successful season here and with John Drew in prospect with one of the most charming plays he was ever seen in, the patrons of the Powell street theatre are to be felicitated.

The Greatest American Dramatist

Bronson Howard was reported in last Saturday's despatches as being ill unto death, and he may have passed away ere this is printed. Howard may be considered the distinctive American playwright, though his plays are not so absolutely local in tone as those of Augustus Thomas. He is—or was, one may say, as for some time previous to his "coming home to die" he had been unable to work—the slowest worker among American dramatists. But slow or not, he made a pot of money. He received over one hundred thousand dollars royalties from "Shenandoah." It took him three years to write "Aristocracy," which San Francisco saw with its original company—Barrymore, Faversham, Blanche Walsh and the others. "The Henrietta" is one of the cleverest comedies ever written and netted a handsome fortune for both Stuart Robson, the star, and the playwright. Hayman and Frohman were always firm believers in Howard's genius as a playwright, but it took A. M. Palmer a long time to acknowledge it. Mr. Palmer always affected an admiration for everything American but steadily refused to buy anything but English or French plays. When "Shenandoah" was being produced in Boston, Palmer went with T. Henry French to see it. But he shook his head at the final curtain; he considered "Shenandoah" a rank failure. He went to Europe and came back with a lot of foreign dramas and when he found the play he had refused to look at was the reigning success of the season he began to doubt his own judgment. Howard's earlier plays, though they did not make such a fortune for their author as "Shenandoah" did, are not to be despised. "The Banker's Daughter" had a great vogue in its time. "Saratoga" is still occasionally staged. "Young Mrs. Winthrop" was once very popular. He wrote a good many others but only their names linger in the memory. Bronson Howard was born in Detroit, fifty-five years ago, and is therefore not an Englishman as many have fancied. Perhaps this impression was due to the fact of his having married an English woman—Alice Wyndham, a sister of Charles Wyndham, the Picadilly manager.

It's Almost Criminal

Milton Nobles may be a very fair actor but he is not possessed of sufficient genius in the mummer line to entitle him to a pardon for writing such a villainous sketch as that which is entitled "At Bilgeville Junction," and which he is playing this week at the Orpheum. It is hard to believe that such an inane farce could have been written by anybody outside of a Home for Feeble Minded Children. If I could coax myself into the requisite state of mental aberration for the perpetration of such a piece of puerile and fatuous flubdub, I should feel fully qualified for admission to the Order of Paretics. The stage manager blundered in putting "At Bilgeville Junction" ahead of the biograph pictures. There are other features of the Orpheum program that cheer and refresh. Indeed the show this week has many exceptionally strong numbers but they scarcely compensate for fifteen minutes of Milton Nobles. If another such infliction were threatened I should advise that John Morrisey be wired to cut short his vacation.

On Thursday, May eighth, the Actors' Home will be formally dedicated in New York. Next Thursday afternoon at the Columbia theatre the Actors' Fund, without which there would have been no Home, will have a benefit. All the visiting actors and actresses and the stock companies will contribute to the program. The Goodwins, Neills, Harrigan, Nobles and others will take part in what will be a tremendous program. Milton Nobles, one of the directors of the Fund, is helping to arrange the event.

"The Lash of the Whip" has served to fill in the week at the Alcazar acceptably. But there will be a big crush next Monday when Charles Francis Bryant's new play goes on. Mr. Bryant is the Alcazar's stage manager and one of the best actors in the stock. His play, judging from the rehearsals, promises well. Lotta Day Coleman, a Californian writer, collaborated with Mr. Bryant in the play. "When the Heart Was Young" is a rural drama with scenes laid in the Berkshire hills.

In "The Singing Girl" at the Tivoli next week, with Annie Meyers in the title role, Arthur Cunningham will have the fine singing part of Duke Rudolph, sung by Cowles in the former production. Harold Gordon is the Count Otto of the cast, and Frances Graham is cast for Marie, sister of Rudolph. She will have some good numbers.

When the run of "Fiddle-Dee-Dee" ends at Fischer's "Pousse Cafe" will be put on. This had a long run at Weber & Field's in New York. To it will be added two travesties, "A Royal Family" and "Antony and Cleopatra." There are some new people coming here for the next plays from Weber & Field's.

Dave Braham's sparkling melodies—"Denny Grady's Hack," "It Showered Again," "Baxter Avenue" and "The Bridal Veil"—

An Excellent Opportunity is offered a young lady of pleasing personality, culture and with histrionic aspirations to secure a practical introduction to the stage in a reliable company. Must be able to dress parts well and command small capital.

At the Show Next Week

COLUMBIA—The Goodwins in "An American Citizen" and "When We Were Twenty-One." They are as great favorites as ever.

GRAND OPERA HOUSE—"The Leather Patch." This is one of the most delightfully humorous plays in the Harrigan repertory.

ALCAZAR—The first production on any stage of the new American drama, "When the Heart Was Young," by Charles Francis Bryant and Lotta Day Coleman. New scenery and costumes have been prepared for the production, which has been in rehearsal for some weeks.

FISCHER'S—"Perhaps it ain't that kind of a dog," but it's going into its fifth week Monday, "of corset is."

TIVOLI—"The Singing Girl." Another of Alice Neilsen's successes. Annie Meyers will have the Neilsen role.

ORPHEUM—Julia Heinrich, the contralto; Hoste brothers, eccentric acrobats from London; Raymond and Caverly, the German jesters; Hilda Thomas, who has been here before, and Lou Hall in "The Lone Star"; holdovers, Milton and Dollie Nobles in a new sketch, the five Nosses, Florenz troupe, Louise Dresser and Jack Norworth.

The California Conservatory Concert

In a program so well rendered as that given at the California Conservatory on Tuesday evening it is hard to particularize the numbers. But two of the participants should not pass without mention. Miss Lily Blum, aged ten years, is a very talented child from whom great things are expected. She rendered Haydn's Andante and Variations. Miss Amy Petersen rendered two Chopin etudes with much feeling and expression, also giving other numbers. There was a very large audience present. On the evening of May sixteenth members of the California Conservatory will give a chamber music concert in Sherman & Clay hall. A program of classical numbers will be given. On the first of July the Conservatory will move to new quarters, 1329 Sutter street. Among other things the pupils will then have the advantage of the most beautiful and commodious music room in the city.

Villa Lots at Auction

People are turning their eyes in the direction of San Mateo these days. There is where the fashionable suburban homes are springing up. In no other county contiguous to San Francisco is real estate regarded with such favor, because it is generally understood that San Mateo possesses exceptional advantages for choice residence locations. Fortunately for those desiring to secure residence sites there, the Clark tract which is within ten minutes' walk of the depot and adjoining El Cerrito Park, is to be sold at auction in villa lots. The sale will take place on Saturday, May tenth at Library Hall, opposite the San Mateo depot. Baldwin & Howell, who are to conduct the sale, have arranged with the Southern Pacific company for a special excursion rate for that day of sixty cents for a round trip.

Kohler & Chase,

Gentlemen:—Though having already expressed myself as an admirer of the Pianola I am glad to say that after having played and become better acquainted with this wonderful little instrument, I am more than ever impressed with its practical and artistic advantages. I am free to say that I unhesitatingly pronounce it the best of all piano playing devices.

Revival of "Old Lavender"

Edward Harrigan has frequently been styled the Dickens of the American drama. The compliment is not undeserved, for Harrigan has put into the drama many characters that live and breathe and cross our paths in every-day life. Like Dickens, Harrigan is endowed with keen observation and the playwright has peopled his dramas with the same homely characters that figured in the stories of the novelist. Both knew the value of atmosphere, and there is an abundance of it in the Harrigan plays, but a play cannot impress with its atmosphere alone. It is not sufficient that the characters be drawn true to life. They must also be impersonated with fidelity to nature. "Old Lavender" is the same picturesque and interesting tramp that he always was, but when associated with a Dick the Rat of the Dave Braham Jr. order, a Smoke of the Gilbert Gardner variety and a Mother Crawford of the Margaret Terry type he appears to be somewhat out of drawing. The company at the Grand is scarcely equal to the task of emphasizing the strong and diverting attention from the weak points of "Old Lavender," but the old-time melodrama is fairly well handled. Harrigan's character work is as charming as ever, and he sings "Poverty's Tears" and "Get Up, Jack" without any apparent diminution of expression. On Monday night the veteran actor was given an ovation by a most enthusiastic audience. The indications are that he will enjoy a successful season here.

Was Once an Impersonator

Sol Smith Russell was one of the many recruits to comedy from the variety stage. There may still be some who remember him when he did his clever female impersonation with the Swiss Bellringers, as funny a thing in its way as Bishop's Widow Bedott. Russell made up as a school-girl and sang that old song beginning:

"They locked me in
An upper room
And took away the key;
Because I would
Not wed a man
Who never suited me.
And while they thought
I was secure,
I was going—going—gone!"

The last time I saw Russell was in Toronto. He had a new play, with a harassed married man as the motif. I do not think he ever came West with it. It was not long after that that he suffered his sad mental collapse. When Russell was last here he had a San Francisco girl playing leading parts in his plays. Lillian Owen was the daughter of Mrs. Owen, of our San Francisco school department, and a cousin of Mrs. Harry J. Curtaz and Mrs. Edith McNally Rhodes. Her death cut short what promised to be a splendid future.

His First Lines

Nat Goodwin's first appearance on any stage was in 1873 at the Providence opera house. He was cast as a juvenile villain. The villain had designs on the virtuous young heroine and Nat's first line was: "So, I have you again, my sweet beauty. Why do you avoid me?" As he tells the story himself, he had not more than delivered the line when the heroine turned on him and gave such an unearthly scream that shook all the rest of Nat's lines out of his head. However the girl knew the villain's part as well as her own and went on with the play. She first repeated Goodwin's lines, and then her own. But as soon as the play was over the youthful villain eloped from the company and fled to Boston, where he took a position in a store. Not until two years after did his dramatic aspirations revive. Goodwin, by the way, was a variety actor before he took to serious work.

Dollie Nobles, Milton Nobles' clever wife, is twenty years younger than her husband. They have been married nineteen years. —The Playgoer

THE REASON WHY.

"Why I drink Argonaut O. K.," said a prominent club man in answer to a question as to his choice of a brand, "is because I have found no other whisky to equal it."

LETTERS

The Land of Love and Art

"Madame Bohemia," by Francis Neilson, as one would guess from the title, is a novel of life in that pleasant land where things seem just to happen, and the laws which govern are the laws of luck. A most entrancing prima donna has a brutal Baronet by way of a husband, and when she is not earning the means for his pleasures on the stage, or he enjoying himself at the gaming table, he puts in his time beating her. Cyril Gower is an infant prodigy, No. 5 in a family of ten. It is hardly necessary to mention their poverty. Madame, the cantatrice, falls in love with the beautiful child who straightway begs to be adopted and taken away from the hardships which jar on his artistic soul. At the age of seven he cheerfully turns his back on father and mother, home and family, therein showing at a tender age a powerful indication of the abominable selfishness which was his prominent characteristic in later years. The prima donna has a secretary, whose principal task is to divert the blows and missiles of the brutal Baronet from the head of the child wonder. The Baronet dies, but not before he has succeeded in robbing the lady of her voice, and the miraculous child pianist meets the fate of so many other things ripe too soon. The secretary disappears from the scene. Exeunt omnes from musical Bohemia. A foregathering of the clans in an underground Italian restaurant in New York. Gower, fastidious and well dressed, is now a composer, or what is the same thing in his own estimation, trying desperately to write operas. Drake, the ex-secretary, more than half-crazed between drugs and drink, is an intermittent journalist, never long in employment. Add to these Gilbert Lexham, who has rubbed shoulders with them all before, aspiring to be an author, but penniless and without ambition or energy to push on to success. Gower still lives with his adoptive mother, dependent entirely on her for support. She, too, has entered literary Bohemia, and gives dramatic readings at lyceums and literary gatherings. At the time when we are introduced to her as Mrs. Kembleton, her vogue has passed and the style of entertainment which she affects has had its day. Things are looking pretty desperate in the menage when Gower brings Lexham upon the scene, and the latter, himself on the verge of starvation, immdiately proceeds to succumb to an attack of pneumonia and add one more to the complications of the situation. A wealthy Bostonian sends for Mrs. Kembleton to help entertain her guests and the wealthy Bostonian's wealthy niece, at odds with her husband, falls head over ears in love with Gower, who, in turn, loses what heart he has to her money. She does all the silly things that silly women do under the circumstances, and having finally come to the conclusion, after compromising herself so that she dare not take her case into court, that to marry Gower would be to leap from the frying pan into the fire, at the eleventh hour she remembers her maternal duties and bids her once adored one farewell. Meanwhile, Mrs. Kembleton and Lexham have fallen in what they imagine is love. Under her inspiration and encouragement, he turns off plays and novels at a rate that would make a popular "boomer" turn green. They are all accepted offhand and royalties roll in. Lexham makes his the common purse, and there are sounds of revelry by night, albeit the revelry is not high. "Easy come, easy go." By the time his vogue has declined the bottom of the bag is reached, and we see diamonds and dinner parties on one side of the door and hear the butcher and the landlady clamoring on the other. We see the inside of the pawnshop as well as the diamond palace, and we are taken on excursions from a Bohemian garret to a palatial mansion, with stop-overs at respectable mediocrity. Of course there is a mystery, and any amount of misunderstanding and jealousy, but in the end it is all cleared up and Gower, who has come as near to being the villain as any of the living characters, becomes quite angelic in the last chapter, and promises to sprout the wings which appear to have been clipped in his early career. Mrs. Kembleton, "Madame Bohemia," the lady with many aliases, appears to be quite satisfied with his emotional protestations after having had it said to him in so many plain words that he has been a selfish hog all his life and blind to all his obligations. If she is satisfied, no one else need complain, but the world outside of Bohemia would be apt to want some better assurance from one like him. The book probably gives a very good picture of that phase of life. [Lippincott Select Novels series, for sale locally by A. M. Robertson.]

The most delightfully blended whisky known to the human palate is "Jesse Moore"—the standard for over fifty years.

"The End of the Argument," has a most refreshingly original denouement. The other stories, departments and special articles are up to the usual standard. McClure's is especially notable this month because of the paper by Lincoln Steffens, calling attention to "The Overworked President." He shows what an enormous waste of time and energy goes to the mere greeting and hand-shaking of a parcel of nobodies who want to have it to say that they have seen a live president. It recalls that famous story by Edward Everett Hale of "My Double and How He Undid Me," and gives one a serious thought of whether we shall not either have to relieve our presidents of this onerous task or supply them with doubles for the unimportant duties. John La Farge writes of Rembrandt and there is a college story, a horse story, and any number of other good things. Captain W. R Prentice gives something new in the way of war reminiscences in his account of the military prisoners held on the Dry Tortugas. We have a saying that "Once a Californian is always a Californian," so coast readers of Munsey's always look for Juliet Wilbor Tompkins, and find her always delightful. This month it is "The Colonel's Surprise." E. W. Hornung's serial, "The Shadow of the Law," is as interesting as Hornung can be, and it says volumes for a serial in these days, that it holds the interest from month to month. The short stories and departments are as excellent as usual, and the other topics written of, "The Pathos of a Throne" (Spain), "The Legion of Honor," "The Race for Sea Power," "The Craze for Cures," "The Redemption of our Dead Lands," etc., give an idea of the variety of the contents. Those who enjoyed Bret Harte's series of Condensed Novels will not need special inducements to read the new series appearing from time to time in the Cosmopolitan. Other short stories by Israel Zangwill, F. Hopkinson Smith and Maarten Maartens appear in the April number. John Brisben Walker continues his story of President Roosevelt, and also writes of the German Emperor. "Rafford Pyke (Harry Thurston Peck) gives his views of "Husbands and Wives," and the new department of "Men, Women and Events" is bright and interesting. The novel in the April Smart Set, the "Ambition of the Baron," is by Martin Dana. The stories are bright and the jokes up to the century. Such names as Albert Bigelow Paine, Clinton Scollard, Carolyn Wells, Elizabeth McCracken, Edgar Saltus and Madison Cawein, in the table of contributors, added to its well known reputation, are a sufficient guarantee of the brightness of this latest issue.

Since the interest in cards is pervasive and perennial, and a knowledge of the popular games more necessary to the dames and damsels of fashion than a familiarity with the Creed or the Lord's Prayer, the "Simple Rules for Bridge" compiled by K. N. Steele of New York, will be a welcome addition to the lore of pasteboard playthings. In the course of thirty-two pages, embellished with the necessary diagrams, the rules which govern the game are clearly set forth and the terms explained. The directions are so simple that any one who can call the faces of the cards ought to be able to learn all that can be accomplished without practice from this little booklet.

The Burr Cult

Charles Felton Pidgin is thoroughly in earnest in his efforts to obtain a new trial for Aaron Burr. "Blennerhassett" was only the entering wedge. It is to be followed by "Little Aaron: the Napoleon of America"; "The Climax, or What Might Have Been" if Burr's so-called conspiracy had been successful, and by "Theodosia, the First Gentlewoman of Her Time." These are to be followed by a biography of Aaron Burr, but even this is not the end. An association to be called the Aaron Burr Legion is now in process of organization and it is designed to have encampments and posts wherever a sufficient membership can be brought together. Private mailing cards, engraved letter heads and envelopes, and all other methods of attracting attention to the Legion will be used, and every effort put forth to prove Burr a victim of political spite and misrepresentation. As all persons over ten years of age are eligible to membership, and no salaries are to be paid to officers, those who join the association will be in no danger of self-seeking. The natural result of this will be a gathering of the Hamilton clan, and between the two, the truth ought to come out. In any event, it looks like lively times for the printers. —The Bookworm

MUSIC

Julia Heinrich at the Orpheum

Miss Julia Heinrich, the contralto, who has sung only in concert and oratorio in America and Europe hitherto, will appear at the Orpheum for a fortnight beginning this coming week. After this vaudeville engagement Miss Heinrich will depart for Europe, so this will be the last opportunity of hearing her for some time. Her numbers for the first week will include the Irish Folksong of Foote, "Daphne's Love" by Ronald, and two numbers by Nevin, "It Was April" and "Mighty Lak a Rose."

At the Sorosis Club during the reception given for the California Eye and Ear Hospital, a musical program was provided of more than ordinary talent. The numbers rendered by two pupils of Miss Alyce Gates were especially charming. Miss Nina Parker gave "The Birdling" by Massenet in a manner that immediately demanded attention and held it, and replied to an encore with "A Madrigal" (Harris). Her true, light soprano showed forth in all its flexibility and her delicate phrasing demonstrated that painstaking thought had beeen bestowed. In listening to Miss Logan Tooley, one experienced immediately both keen pleasure as her voice fell upon the ear and also surprise at her range, which is not often found in contraltos. The lower notes did not partake of the quality of forced bass ones nor the higher of thin, strained ones, but the listener was impressed with the delightful smoothness of every tone and the ease with which she went from one to another, regardless of interval. Her numbers were "A Song of Thanksgiving" (Allitsen) and the gavotte from "Mignon."

Miss Ella V. McCloskey sang three songs before the Town and Gown Club of Berkeley on Monday. Her rich contralto tones were heard to fine advantage in Brahms' "Saphic Ode," d' Hardelot's "Sans Toi" and Nevin's "Mighty Lake a Rose." This was "club day" at the Town and Gown, and Mrs. Ella M. Sexton's clever play, "The Knickerbocker Dames" was the piece de resistance of the program.

Madame Spitzy sang three numbers at the Woman's Press Association on Monday. Two bright sketches written by Ruth Comfort Mitchell were presented, and there were other pleasing numbers.

Musical matters are wofully dull just now—nothing doing and nothing announced of a visiting star nature. We had the feast and now comes the usual famine. —The Music Critic

THE TECHAU TAVERN.

The recent change in management of the Techau Tavern means no diminution of the popularity of that famous resort. The new management is composed of experts in the line of catering to the public's desire for good things to eat and drink. Tourists say they consider the Techau the most artistic resort of its kind in the United States. One circumstance that conduces to its popularity is its perfect service. There is never any inattention or discourtesy shown, for the management takes personal supervision of everything.

A NOVEL OPTICAL EFFECT.

A peculiar and yet perfect optical illusion can be seen any day in the haberdasher window of the M. J. Keller Co.'s store at 1028-1030 Market street. If you approach the window from the East you will see what appears to be a street corner right in front of you. You will be strongly tempted to go around the corner in order to get a better view of the window, and you will be surprised to find that there is no corner within half a block of you. It's one of the most novel effects shown in any window for a long time.

OTHER PEOPLE'S IDEAS.

From "The Conqueror," by Gertrude Atherton:

Rachael: "The thought that I shall one day be old does not console me as it may console men, for with women the heart never grows old. The body withers, and the heart in its awful eternal youth has the less to separate and protect it from the world that has no use for it."

"Man requires woman to look after her own fuel. If she cannot, she may carry through life the perfume of a sentiment, and a tender regret, but it grows easy and more easy to live without her."

Hugh Knox: "The lack of a priest at the right time may cause a good deal of suffering and trouble, but it can't muddy a pure stream; and many a lawful marriage has done that."

"In times of panic man seems to exchange his soul for a tail."

Hamilton: "Patriotism surely is the master passion. Nothing else can annihilate the ego."

Hamilton: "Passion is the furnace that makes greatness possible. If, when the mental energies are resting, it darts out tongues of flame that strike in the wrong place, I do not believe that the Almighty, who made us, counts them as sins."

Washington: "Women love the lie that saves their pride, but never an unflattering truth."

"The perfect friendship of two men is the deepest and highest sentiment of which the finite mind is capable; women miss the best in life."

Hamilton: "The battle of ideas, the fight for certain stirring and race-making principles—that is the greatest game that mortals can play."

Hamilton: "It is never safe to go beyond a certain point in the management of human affairs. What turn the passions of the people may take can never be foretold, nor that element of the unknown, which is always under the invisible cap and close on one's heels."

From "Madame Bohemia," by Francis Neilson:

Elinor: "The cause of many actions that appear questionable is often beyond our ken, and the reason why we dislike people who have never done us a harm is often equally obscure."

Gertrude: "It is dreadful, isn't it, when someone else knows? It is not so much the offence, if it be one, as the consternation it causes.'

It gives me much pleasure to recommend to the public Mr. George Mayerle of San Francisco. I have been using glasses for the past four years and during that time have consulted several opticians, but not until I consulted Mr George Mayerle and had him fit glasses to my eyes did I get entire satisfaction.

ADDITIONAL HONOR

Conferred by Rev. Father Augustine McClory, San Francisco

It gives me much pleasure to recommend to the public Mr. George Mayerle of 1071 Market street, San Francisco, strictly as a skillful and expert optician. My sight began to fail in 1877, twenty-five years ago, and since that time I have been wearing glasses. I consulted a prominent optician in Chicago, Dr. Holmes. At different times since that I have had lenses fitted on in St. Louis, Cleveland, Ohio, and also tried the Fifth-avenue opticians in Pittsburg, who claim to be among the best in their line in the country. I do not hesitate to say that I have met with better and more satisfactory results with MR. GEORGE MAYERLE than with any of the above named who have much higher pretensions. Respectfully,

FATHER AUGUSTINE McCLORY, O. F. M.,

OUR OPINION

A Gallery Play

At the Union League Club banquet last Saturday Mayor Schmitz indulged in what is known as a gallery play. He informed the colonels and the other distinguished men of title who are members of the Union League Club that it had been his proud boast that he was a Republican, and that he could not have been elected Mayor of San Francisco on the Union Labor ticket if he had not been a Republican. Mayor Schmitz was not exactly playing to the gallery when he made that statement, but he was nevertheless indulging in a gallery play. His purpose was to win the confidence of the Republican machine politicians who may have some influence in the convention which will name the Republican candidate for Governor. And it was an absurd blunder for Mayor Schmitz to make. He knows that partisan politics cut no figure in the late mayoralty contest. He also knows that his vote was derived mainly from the Democratic party. The figures in the Registrar's office prove that. Those figures show that Republicans were more loyal to their party candidate than were the Democrats. If the Union Labor ticket had not been supported by Democrats the Democratic candidate would not have made such a poor showing. So far Mayor Schmitz has not been wanting in loyalty to the element in the community to which he owes his election, but by making foolish speeches such as the one which he delivered at the Union League Club banquet, he may evoke distrust among his friends. He will find it to his advantage to remain faithful to those friends for he can accomplish nothing by making goo-goo eyes at the colonels on the Governor's staff and the other gold-lace politicians and high-class job-chasers of the Union League Club. If it had not been for the prominence and strength given him by the laboring element he would never have been invited to that banquet. He is indebted for his political prestige to no other element in this community, and it would not be surprising if that element compelled the Republican convention to nominate him for Governor. Instead of getting ready to kowtow the Mayor should prepare to dictate to the politicians.

The Stevenson Champions

Miss Eliza D. Keith is being scored for her comments on the short-sightedness of our local patriotic orders in permitting Portsmouth Square to be usurped by a memorial to Robert Louis Stevenson. To judge by the tone of some of the critics they regard Stevenson as greater than the angels and just a little less than God. Now, no one is making the least objection to any monument or memorial to R. L. S., whether it be as a writer or merely as a Scotchman. It would not precipitate a riot if his adoring countrymen were to enshrine every cobble stone his sacred foot had pressed, or cover the whole front of that Merchant street saloon where he "called for his daily mug of ale" with tablets commemorating that remarkable event. If they care to raise funds to preserve the boarding houses where he took up his temporary residence here or to photograph the streets through which he walked, by all means let them do so, and keep still about it. If Scotch people or literary people or both together have any inclination in that direction, let them have a Stevenson statue on every corner of the High street of Edinborough. Let them substitute Stevenson statues for milestones on every road in the United Kingdom, but for Heaven's sake let it penetrate into their skulls that there were men before their idol. Portsmouth Square, the Plaza, is a spot most especially and particularly associated with the Pioneer history of this city and State, and it is a locality which should be reserved for the perpetuation of the memory not of a transient sojourner whose claim is no greater and no better than that of any other idle watcher of the passing throng. Others have sat on the benches or lolled on the grass or dozed in the sunshine there. It is not an astonishing feat, nor one especially calling for commemoration. We had a Stevenson of our own, Jonathan D. Stevenson, who brought his famous regiment from New York and had a part in all the stirring deeds of our early days, and it is to him and not to any foreigner, man of letters or other genius, that a monument on the Plaza should be erected. Miss Keith is not making any protest against honor to the Scotch writer, nor has it anything to do with the question that her own name indicates a Scotch origin or that she does not seem to substitute Stevenson for the Lord in the invocations of the litany. The whole point of her argument and attitude is that we should have sufficient State pride to preserve our landmarks and mark our historical sites in a manner befitting their character. If the friends and admirers of Robert Louis Stevenson could be induced to take the chips from their shoulders and cease dragging their coat tails in the road they might have opportunity to discover that it is their own attitude of aggression which calls for so much opposition. Stevenson has not yet been dead long enough for him to have dropped into his proper place. Another generation or two may see him entirely forgotten. It will not be the first time in history that such a thing has happened, and heaven and earth have not come together in consequence. We have had so much of this business of picking up the cudgels in behalf of Robert Louis Stevenson, and defending him when no attack was made, explaining and condoning and generally sanctifying him and all that he did that we are verging near to the point of the last straw.

Our Crippled School Department

School Director Roncovieri has discovered that many of our school houses are a disgrace to the city. And once more the annual howl has gone up about an inadequate appropriation for School Department purposes. Mr. Roncovieri's discovery is by no means startling. The school houses have been in a disgraceful condition for many years, but their dilapidated condition is no reflection on the taxpayers of the city. San Francisco's taxpayers are not stingy. We could have better school houses if the public funds were not wasted by the school directors. Some of the school houses are relics of pioneer days. They have been in continuous use for forty years, and unless they drop to pieces they will probably continue in use for forty more. Little children are packed away in garrets and basements and in nooks under stairs, and they climb to their eyries on narrow, rickety stairs, or thread their devious paths to class rooms along dark alleys. And at the same time we are supporting many expensive fads for no other purpose than to provide a living for favorite teachers with a pull. We have cooking classes presided over by women who do not get the meals for their household. They have complete culinary departments at their command that they may teach the little daughters of poor mechanics to make terrapin soup and nesselrode puddings. We have athletic gentlemen from the Atlantic coast to find fault with the teachers for not making juvenile Sandows of flat and tenement house children. We have eminent faddists teaching the children of cement laid courts all about our wild flowers and our native songbirds. There are others that dilate prettily upon the artistic and lecture wisely on the ancient Greek method of moulding beautiful forms. But the old dilapidated school houses remain as wretchedly damp and cheerless as ever and all because there is not sufficient money on hand to build new ones. And year after year, whether the appropriation be great or small, there issues from our schools the same procession of ill-mannered, untrained hobbledehoys who are quite unfamiliar with the three R's. We have incompetent teachers as well as dilapidated school houses, and we shall continue to have them until we get school directors who know their business and a competent School Superintendent. We need better school houses and less foolishness in the study course.

The Education of Hoodlums

Some of the Princeton freshmen had a delightful time a short while ago, according to a freshman's idea of what is delightful. Among other of their innocent and youthful pranks they defaced the Trenton monument erected in memory of the Revolutionary soldiers, and plentifully besmirched private residences and door-steps with paint. Six of the little fellows were convicted and a hard-hearted Jersey justice has been bold and brave enough to fine them two hundred and fifty dollars each for their acts of vandalism, and in addition, has assessed them six thousand dollars for damages. This is at the rate of about one thousand three hundred dollars apiece for their evening's sport. Presumably one should commiserate the parents who have been called upon to foot the bills, but the probabilities are that the young men have been needing a lesson ever since they left the kindergarten. The parents have been, in all likelihood, too tender-hearted to call a halt in anything that the boys regarded as "fun," and they have grown up without respect or reverence for anything on the earth or above it. In time it will probably be an exceptional family the children of which make an outward showing of respect for their elders. As for the school discipline of the day, woe betide the teacher who would dare suggest an order that runs counter to a child's whims. The chief occupation of the boards of education appears to be investigation of charges brought against teachers because they have so far forgotten themselves as to expect children to obey orders or behave with some regard to decency. Strikes are getting to be as much a matter of course in the school room as they are in Labor Unions. The vicious or unruly youth may no longer be expelled or suspended, for an education is one of his "rights," and the fact that he is incapable of either learning or appreciating the efforts expended on him counts for nothing. As long as he chooses to occupy a seat in the class room he is the boss of the situation. No investigation into his conduct is to be feared, but let him say the word and the teacher is put on trial at once. Customs once confined to colleges have gradually filtered through till the "rush" and other forms of hoodlumism are now the regular thing in high schools and even grammar schools in some towns. Only a short while ago the second year pupils of a high school across the bay proceeded to tie up and lock into the basement the later recruits, with the result of a considerable amount of damage to windows and door locks, while the same tactics employed in a grammar school in one of the southern counties resulted in the permanent crippling of a lad not yet in his teens. Parents will not discipline their offspring and teachers dare not. The result is that once in a while, when a community is goaded to desperation, the public officials are obliged to administer a costly lesson to old and young. When young men who have been carried to the gates of college at public expense have not a sufficient sense of decency not to mutilate and destroy public monuments, and especially such as commemorate the events in their national history, there is a mighty poor foundation for patriotism. It looks as if some of the thousand teachers and innumerable soldiers whom we are shipping off to the Orient in order to make good Americans of the Filipinos, might be profitably employed at home.

Startling Revelations

A decision rendered by Judge Humphreys of Honolulu, recently, is in the nature of a warning against investing in Hawaiian securities. From the language of the court it appears that Hawaii is a fertile field for stock manipulators and crooked promoters, and that it is extremely hazardous to invest in sugar securities, particularly in those of new and undeveloped sugar properties. The decision was rendered in the case of A. W. Carter who had asked for the approval of his annual account as guardian of the estate of Annie Parker, a minor. Judge Humphreys not only refused to approve the account but removed the guardian for having invested his ward's estate in the bonds of the McBryde Sugar Company, Limited, of the Oahu Railway & Land Co., Limited, of the Waiahua Agricultural Company and of the American Sugar Company of which he was the treasurer. The court found that the investments were improvident and reckless and constituted a breach of trust. In discussing the conduct of Carter Judge Humphreys took occasion to declare that during the three years following the annexation of the islands, the community was sucked into a maelstrom of speculation by land sharks and unscrupulous promoters whose professed knowledge of the secrets which lay hidden in the womb of the future entitled them to be classed as prescientists. Many of the enterprises started by them, and which by the way allured victims in San Francisco, are now, according to Judge Humphreys, "bitter memories, mere speculative tombstones." By way of illustration he cited the case of the American Supar Company, the history of which appears in the testimony in the case. The company was incorporated with a capital of a million and a half dollars. A fine wharf was constructed, a number of costly pumps were erected, railroads were built, eight hundred acres of cane were planted and a corps of laborers employed. Yet the water of the wells from which it was expected to irrigate the cane held such quantities of salt in solution that it was death to animal life, and the property had to be abandoned. Nevertheless in the madness of speculation the stock of the company of the par value of one hundred dollars per share sold for two hundred. Judge Humphreys declared that he could mention other evidences of acute speculative mania, but he referred only to the Maunalei Plantation upon which half a million was spent and which was sold by a receiver of the court. Judge Humphreys' opinion should be read by every person who entertains the notion that investments in Hawaiian sugar stock are good things. He declared that it was little less than a crime to permit the custodians of trust funds to invest the moneys of their wards "in securities that pending events might cause to be swept into waste baskets of finance." The decision is a remarkable one for the case opened up an inquiry into conditions in the sugar market to such an extent that the court found it apropos to predict that the price of sugar will soon take on a lower range of values. Moreover Judge Humphreys found that the companies in which Carter invested his ward's money, and in which many San Francisco people are interested, are far from being substantial corporations. The McBryde Company has a bonded debt of three quarters of a million, and cannot under the most favorable circumstances pay dividends within three years. It was revealed upon the trial that the artesian wells sunk on the plantation yielded salt in excessive quantities, a condition that drove the American Sugar Company from sugar planting to stock raising, but in the last report of the company to its stockholders no reference was made to that impressive fact. Judge Humphreys' decision will undoubtedly have a tendency to affect the sugar market for he has brought to light many facts which should prompt prospective investors to exercise great caution.

Still Another Version

Poor Peter Martin! The gossips won't let him prepare for his wedding in peace. They will persist in speculating as to the cause of the frequent postponement of his marriage. I told them the truth months ago, but they won't accept the story of the hold-up, which I informed them was authentic. Now they are saying, and the story has found its way into print in the East, that there has been friction in the household of his prospective father-in-law. The story is that Papa Oelrichs was a little too gay at a recent clam-bake, and that he encouraged a young widow to do a very naughty dance on a table much to the displeasure of his wife. Even though the story is true I cannot see how such an incident could have had any influence on the wedding arrangements of Peter Martin. Both parents are anxious for the marriage to take place, but having the social interests of their daughter at heart they desire that Peter shall have a substantial bank account before taking the matrimonial plunge. They argue that a bank roll in the hand is better than two bank rolls in mamma's purse, and as they have heard that not so long ago Mrs. Martin was having her trousseau made, they think it unwise not to safeguard themselves against a second engagement which may have a happier ending. Mrs. Martin is still a very vivacious widow.

When Smith Challenged the Baron

One of my correspondents recalls an incident in the life of G. Frank Smith, to whom I referred last week. It was an incident in which the Baron Von Schroeder figured, and the scene was the Santa Margarita rancho famous as the home of General Pat Murphy and the place where that beloved pioneer was accustomed to dispense his lavish hospitality. Some twelve years ago Baron Von Schroeder and the crusty lawyer were guests of Murphy at the latter's rancho. Smith was accompanied by his daughter, Miss Nellie Smith, who is now the wife of Charlemagne Tower, the American Ambassador to Russia. It was on the occasion of one of the house parties which were quite numerous at the Santa Margarita rancho in those days, and it included many prominent residents of this city. At dinner one evening Baron Von Schroeder was seated next to Nellie Smith who was noted for the brilliancy of her wit rather than for her charm of person.

THE WORLD OVER

During the meal she took occasion to indulge in a little quip at the expense of the Baron and it aroused his Teutonic ire. It developed into an unpleasant scene for which the Baron's imperfect understanding of the English language was largely responsible, but at any rate, G. Frank Smith took a hand, said that his daughter had been insulted and demanded satisfaction. Of course he was prepared to fight with anything from a bowie to a howitzer, and he wanted blood. Then there was great excitement. Efforts were made to smooth out the wrinkles in Smith's temper but they were in vain, and the only way to prevent trouble was to induce the Baron to hasten away and that is what he did. I have been told that Smith went so far as to select a second and issue a formal challenge. The Baron however, was a man of peace.

He Backed Mrs. Colton

G. Frank Smith, by the way, was the backer of Mrs. D. D. Colton in her famous suit against the "Big 4" of the Southern Pacific syndicate, the echoes of which may still be heard occasionally. Smith promoted the suit. He agreed to pay all expenses. He kept his word and lost the suit before Judge Temple in Santa Rosa and it broke him. He once owned a railroad extending from Folsom, Sacramento county, to the present village of Roseville which is the junction of the Oregon and Central Pacific lines. It was known as the railroad which ran from nowhere to nowhere. Nothing remains of it except an occasional embankment. The Central Pacific company bought the rails. Smith's daughter was the most intellectual girl in her set, and she combined brilliancy of mind with gentleness and winsomeness of manners. She met Charlemagne Tower on a trip to Alaska. He was the son of a very wealthy Philadelphian, and a handsome fellow. By his own exertions he has added to the wealth which he inherited and he has gained distinction in the public service. Previous to his appointment to the American Embassy in Russia he served as Minister to Austria. The Californian girl who is his wife is known as one of the most brilliant women connected with the diplomatic service. She is always eager to entertain her old friends from California when she meets them abroad. The De Youngs have lately enjoyed her hospitality.

Now for the Daughter

When the widow of Millionaire James Campbell married Sam Parker, the former Prime Minister of Hawaii. Sam's first wife had been dead only a few months. Sam had mourned her extravagantly in the kanaka fashion, and then made desperate love to the buxom widow while his chum Prince David laid siege to the heart of Mrs. Campbell's daughter Abbie. Now they are planning to marry the other daughter to their mutual companion in hulas and sports—"Sonny" Cunha, the son of Saloonkeeper Cunha, of Honolulu, and formerly a famous Yale football player. Miss Alice Campbell is just eighteen, fairly pretty and has over a million in her own right. Cunha is about twenty-five years old, weighs two hundred and fifty pounds, and is constitutionally averse to work. He lounges his days in Honolulu, making a bluff at studying law, and spends most most of his time at Waikiki beach or speeding the merry hours with Sam and David. Both David and his bride—formerly Miss Abbie Campbell—and Sam Parker and his wife are entertaining lavishly since their return from their honeymoon tour three or four months ago. They are making the prized wealth of the old planter, James Campbell, melt like ice in a Honolulu refrigerator, and are making this the gayest season in the Honolulu capital since Liliuokalani set the pace as Queen of the Islands.

For over half a century "Jesse Moore" Whisky has held its supremacy as the best, purest and most palatable.

By Way of Contrast

Some of the former friends of Sam Parker's dead wife do not like his having wedded so soon after her death. Now Hawaiians have queer ways of showing their feelings. They liked the widow Campbell well enough but the late Mrs. Parker was of high lineage while the present one was a maid in the household of the royal family. In this country, there would have been a buzz of gossip and then an open spat between the opposing factions. But in Hawaii they are more dignified. A few weeks ago, the sorrowing friends of the deceased caused to be published in the principal newspaper of the islands the genealogical record of the late Mrs. Sam Parker whose maiden name was Hattie Richardson. They refrained from comment or from suggesting the contrast between the lady of royal blood and the erstwhile domestic, but they showed that the first Mrs. Parker had a family tree fully half a column long and ancestors the spelling of whose names would play havoc with a linotype machine.

What Jones Sent

A guest of the Palace hotel, whose name shall be Jones for this narration, was dining in the Grill a few evenings ago when he opened a telegram from the East, which read, "A boy six pounds both doing well." Jones had thought of drinking claret with his dinner but pocketing the message, he penciled congratulation to his wife and the physician who had so thoughtfully sent the joyful news, and then ordered a quart of champagne. He said nothing to the three friends with him but they assumed that the market had closed in Jones' favor. Another message came a half-hour later. It read: "Kid No. 2. Congratulations. Doc." Jones responded fittingly though nervously, and after the fourth bottle told the news to his friends in a burst of pride. About the eighth bottle a third messenger appeared. Jones' friends began to make bets before Jones could open the envelope. When he read the telegram he flung it into the olives, and groaned. His vis-a-vis read it aloud: "Three to date. Sincere congratulations. Four progressing finely. Doc." There was a moment of silence and then tumultuous laughter and vigorous slapping of

Miss Tobin's Tact

Not long ago I mentioned Miss Agnes Tobin's penchant for tea gowns for all occasions. I have just heard of a little London episode that, as one of her friends puts it, is "deliciously Agnesesque." No San Francisco girl has ever found so firm a footing in the English aristocracy of brains as Agnes Tobin achieved during her prolonged visits there. She became intimate, not only with Mrs. Meynell but with all the big lions of the day. On this last trip Miss Tobin tarried in London only long enough for an over Sunday visit to some distinguished friends at their country home. Fancy their surprise when she appeared at dinner in a tea gown. The hostess was known to be orthodox in her notions as to evening dress and the other guests wondered what form her rebuke would take. But Miss Tobin sidetracked all criticism by openly asking the hostess whether she admired tea gowns.

"I'm afraid I don't," answered the hostess.

"Well, then, don't think up a reprimand for me," advised Miss Tobin, "but just quote Cecil Rhodes," and she told the story of how that gentleman was once entertaining a party of guests at Groote Schuur, his African home, and a lady appeared at dinner in a tea gown. Cecil Rhodes was supposed to be a woman-hater but he was very observant of a woman's appearance. Next morning he sent his secretary to the lady of the tea gown with this message: "I like my guests to dine in evening dress and not in compromises, however charming."

"Fancy how badly she must have felt," added Miss Tobin and it goes without writing that the hostess could not follow Rhodes' example after that.

The "Dance's" Postlude

A correspondent writes me, apropos of "The Dance of Death" that it had another chapter. When the reputed author took his fall off the roof, a photograph or daguerreotype or something of that kind in his pocket identified him as the brother of a New York murderer. The Eastern man was once called Ruloff and though recollection is hazy as to whether he was hanged or imprisoned for life or got off, the law still kept a clutch on him. He was known to have brothers, and they spent money like water to save him. It was a regular saffron-hued newspaper sensation when the relationship was established. One of Dr. Bowers' three wives (Augusta Shirek) put in a claim as the author of the diatribe against the waltz. It was another "Beautiful Snow" affair. But I am told by another correspondent that Ambrose Bierce confessed that he wrote "The Dance of Death" and then roasted it in one of his Prattlings.

He should Prefer the Pulpit

Mayor Schmitz made his pulpit debut last Sunday night in the church of a colored congregation. The Mayor made a good, sensible talk, and I should advise him to confine his oratorical efforts when off the political rostrum to the church pulpit. Post-prandial talking is somewhat hazardous, and the Mayor should attend no more tuxedo functions at the Union League Club. A man is apt to think thickly after a heady feast. The treacherous tongue trips lightly over the frolicsome faux-pas when the wine fumes are ascending. The conviviality of the banquet board foments folly. Witness the Mayor's bad break at the last banquet when he told the laboring men who were not there that their vote would have been wasted if he were not a Republican. Fie! Fie! Mr. Schmitz. Keep away from those befuddling banquets unless your hosts will consent to a fiddle solo in lieu of an oratorical jolly.

She Thinks 'Frisco Jay

News comes from Paris that the Robert Raylor Peck Biens have been annexed to the American smart set there, and in the argot of the elite are "in it." When Arline Peck left San Francisco to make preparations for her wedding in Chicago, she put ditto marks, right out loud, too, under the old assertion that this is a "jay" town. According to Miss Peck San Francisco girls were spiteful old things, and the men, all except one of course, were conceited flirts. Miss Peck really did have rather an uncomfortable time out here with the daughter of a Californian Senator and an unconventional young heiress both enlightening her with the stories of her cavalier's one-time devotion for them. No wonder the lady looks with a jaundiced eye on San Francisco. To a Californian girl whom she met in France she said that after Chicago there was no place like Paris; and after Hades no place like San Francisco. Now that Mr. Bien has added the top stories—Robert Raylor-Peck—to his name, and they have found a niche in the Parisian smart set, Mrs. Robert Raylor Peck-Bien ought to salve her smart against San Francisco.

Bailey's Rancous Ranting

Senator Bailey of Texas is working himself into a conniption fit over the Coronation. Bailey's delight is to twist the lion's tail. He affects great hatred for an hereditary monarchy and declares it to be contrary to the Constitution to appropriate money for the expense of the officials who are going over to participate in the big show. Senator Bailey is in a bad way. He takes himself seriously and there is nothing more tiresome than the politician who does that. Of course we the sovereign people look upon

Two entire floors are devoted to the goods, which are of very handsome materials and the newest cut. On the first floor is the men's department which is complete in every detail. No man can afford to be illy dressed when he can supply his wardrobe at a very moderate outlay from the stock of J. J. Gildea & Co. They have every need of the fashionable man, morning, afternoon and evening attire. On the second floor is the boys' department, and this is as complete as the men's. Ready to wear garments for boys are a saving not only of money but of the materfamilias' time and energy. The Gildea stock contains everything the boy needs in the clothing line. All the goods and prices in both departments are guaranteed. Beside this clothing emporium, Mr. Gildea has just opened a new store at 715 Market street. the preparations for the big show with something akin to a sneer. We know that the fat monarch with a past that reads like a few volumes of the "Thousand and One Nights" is only an ordinary mortal, and that there is nothing edifying in the spectacle of his being deified, but that is not a sufficient reason for overlooking the amenities that exist between friendly nations. We send Ambassadors to represent us at the courts of hereditary monarchs, and it surely will do us no harm to get behind Edward's band wagon and become a feature of the pageant even though it be of the buncombe variety. The harmless theatricals which are to draw big gate money to London town are to the people of England sanctified by traditions of the Anglo-Saxon race. Their spirit of patriotism finds expression in such mummery as that in which they are about to indulge. Why should we scoff and strut when the choice is given us to be polite or play the bounder? Bailey should be suppressed.

Mrs. Jones—Your little boy looks very much like his papa.
Fond Mother—I know, but I'm hoping that he will outgrow it.

Why He Probably Objected

President Roosevelt according to the despatches intimated to the French Government that he did not consider it advisable for that Government to confer the cross of the Legion of Honor upon Admiral Dewey and Lieutenant-General Miles. It was further stated that the President's action had caused a sensation in diplomatic, army and navy circles because it was believed that the President's decision was due to a desire to humiliate Miles and Dewey. I know of nothing in President Roosevelt's record to warrant the supposition that he would seek to humiliate those officers in such a manner. The spirit of our Constitution is opposed to the acceptance by officers of this Government of titles and emblems of distinction from foreign countries. It was more than likely that President Roosevelt's objection was based strictly on constitutional grounds.

Not in the Same Set Now

Factional strife in the New York smart set is becoming so bitter that women who were formerly friends now take occasion to publicly proclaim their unfriendliness. Last week it was reported in the despatches that Mrs. Clarence Mackay rode with Mrs. O. H. P. Belmont, Mrs. Hermann Oelrichs and Mrs. "Joe" Leiter in the Deadwood coach at the Wild West show. Mrs. Mackay denied the report, and it was stated in her behalf that Mrs. Belmont is not in her set. Moreover it was charged that the report was circulated by Mrs. Belmont's press agent. Here's a pretty how-d'ye-do! Has it come to this, that the mother of the Duchess of Marlborough must employ a press agent to keep herself in the swim? Evidently the sub rosa story of Willie K. Vanderbilt's divorce has beeen bruited to some purpose, or else Mrs. Belmont is becoming more reckless since she married Perry than she was as the wife of the elder Willie K. But it's hard to draw the line in the Newport set, and if the imperious wife of young Mackay hopes to hold herself aloof from those whose records reek with scandal she will have to seek seclusion in the donjon tower of her castle, and keep the drawbridge raised.

Lask-Greenlee

Harry J. Lask gave his daughter a house and lot for a wedding present. The house is now in process of building and is expected to be furnished in a few months. During the summer the young couple will occupy their pretty cottage in Belvedere. At present they are on their wedding tour. The marriage of Miss Hermione Lask and Frederic S. Greenlee was celebrated on Tuesday of last week at the home of the bride's parents, Mr. and Mrs. Harry J. Lask, in California street. It was a rose wedding, pink roses being the staple of the decorations and charmingly in keeping with the season. The dining-room was all in yellow, with American flags.

Poor Hobart!

My paragraph of last week about Walter Hobart and his palatial home served as an excellent tip for the dailies. They made a good story out of his financial affairs but sought to prove that he was not broke. Of course he isn't broke. He has not applied for a cot in the Alms House. But he is not regaling himself with truffles and wine quite so frequently as was his wont. But when a young millionaire who has been going the Newport pace finds that he has been compelled to settle down to a cross-country jog, he feels about the same as does a one-hundred-dollar-a-month clerk whose salary has been reduced to seventy-five. It is conceded that Mr. Hobart discovered that his palatial home was an expensive luxury, and that he should content himself with a less costly habitat. A man ceases to be rich when he has to live within his means. In these days of trusts and billionaires the rich man is the chap who is restless because he can't spend his income.

Glad to Get Rid of It

Since the sale of the Hobart residence I have heard it said that Mrs. Hobart never fancied it very much anyway, and that besides it was a disappointment to Walter. It was not built as a harmonious whole, but wings were added piecemeal without the happiest result. "Mamma," as Walter always speaks of his beautiful young wife, was long ago anxious to sell the place. Tripping on the heels of the news that young Clark had bought the Hobart place came the report that the Hobarts were going to separate. All week their friends were kept busy nipping the insistent report in the bud. There was absolutely no foundation for it. The matrimonial harness has ceased to fret and Walter is immensely fond of his "American Beauty" and very fond of his two little girls. The Hobarts are planning for a trip to Europe, and if all goes well with the mining property of the estate another Hobart residence will be erected later on near San Mateo.

A Friend in Adversity

Though Hobart has punctured his father's bank account he has the satisfaction of knowing that he has that rarest of blessings—a true friend. When the news that the Hobart house was to be sold traveled down the byways the logical conclusion of the multitude was that Hobart was "broke." Acting on this supposition, one of the richest of the Blingumites went to Squire Walter and offered him five hundred thousand dollars to tide him over the dry season and save the home. Hobart refused the loan but both Mr. and Mrs. Hobart have told the story of the man's generosity, which evidently surprised them as much as it did the tight-fisted natives in that belt of the woods. There is little doubt that the members of the Hobart clan have lately dipped deep into economics. They have not yet been reduced to boiling the soup bones twice but money has been about as scant as Walter's forelock. Mrs. Lester at a tea the other day declared in a stage whisper that she doubted whether among them all there was a million and a half left. The smallest share of this is undoubtedly Walter Hobart's as he more than the other members of the family has scattered fistfuls of gold. And it was our poor weak-jointed imitation of a Horse Show that brought Walter to his knees financially. He himself is authority for this statement. He was determined to carry off all the blue ribbons in a bunch and those that did not dangle his way at the first show he made a mighty effort to win the next time. This left him with a lot of blooded horses from which he could not separate himself without a big loss, and the weight of this expensive horseflesh has been too much.

Joy in Blingum

Through the sale of the Hobart residence the Burlingame set is augmented by two very charming people. The Charles Clarks are to become full-fledged Blingumites. There is no question as to their eligibility to become members of San Francisco's smart suburban set. Even if they didn't have riches galore they would nevertheless be personae grata, for Mr. Clark is the son of a United States Senator and is a fine fellow, and Mrs. Clark is a cultured, womanly woman and as beautiful as the late mistress of the Hobart home. Mrs. Henry T. Scott will undoubtedly be one of the first to extend the glad hand to the Clarks, for a United States Senator stands next to an English Lord in the estimation of the renowned exponent of McKinley hospitality and the Charles Clarks are of the family of Senator William Clark.

He Was Colonel Mazuma

The acquisition of the Clarks is certainly a big conquest for Blingum. It means that the gold of the United Verde mine, the richest mine in the world, is to circulate freely in San Mateo county. It also means some royal functions in Blingum and the dimming of the star of Mrs. Carolan, for certainly if Mrs. Clark desires to become the Queen hostess she may without a struggle. Senator Clark's wealth is over the one hundred million mark. He is one of the five richest men in the United States. His son Charles is the business man of the family. He is the manager of his father's mining business. He it was that clanked the golden spurs of Colonel Mazuma through Montana during the Senatorial campaign of his father. He was an exceedingly popular fellow in Montana and when it became known that he intended to make California his winter home all the land boomers of Los Angeles started on his trail. He was thinking of settling in the southern country, but when Mrs. Clark took a peep into San Mateo county she resolved that should be her habitat.

He Saw the Same Crowd

Apropos of the sale of the Hobart acres I am reminded that they were formerly owned by Steve Whipple, and incidentally of a little story. Steve Whipple was, in the fifties, the proprietor of famous gambling rooms in Commercial street, which later became the home of the Pacific Club, since merged into the Pacific-Union. One night, shortly after the transition from public to private gambling quarters, a roughly clad miner walked in and prepared to make himself at home. One of the members asked him if he had not made a mistake, and told him he was in a private club. The miner gave a searching look around the room and said: "A private club, eh? Well, I used to come here pretty often when this place was known as Steve Whipple's gambling room, and I see about the same crowd around here now as I used to then."

Adopted Children are "It" Now

Pugs and poodles are no longer in vogue as pets among London's smart set from whom the stork has seen fit to withhold his gifts. The proper thing now is for the childless to adopt a child. The Russian Prince and Princess Dolgorouki were among the first to make the fashion popular. They have adopted a pretty little girl who is seen daily driving in Hyde Park. To be a child by adoption is no longer considered a fact to keep beneath cover. Since adopting little girls has been made popular they are reviving the London stories of such adoptions that belong to the past. Lady Mount Temple had an adopted daughter who married very well. Lady Holland's daughter, Miss Fox, married Prince Lichtenstein; the story of her adoption was a social sensation in Europe two decades ago. California can offer an example of an adopted child who achieved social distinction in the Princess Hatzfeldt, who was the daughter of a Sacramento grocer. Another was Timothy Hopkins, the little Irish boy whom a millionaire adopted and endowed with all the privileges of a born son and heir.

Marguerite Must Wear a Shawl

Judging from private reports from Washington, Hildegarde McKenna is leaving the placid Isabella far behind in the race for popularity. The friends of the family in this city remember Hildegarde as an overgrown girl with none of the Vere de Vere repose of her senior sister. But it was poor Marie, as her intimate friends Gertrude Carroll and Josephine Loughborough can attest, who was the dear, sweet and kind-hearted member of the family, always ready to efface herself that the others might shine. Mrs. McKenna must be sorely disappointed after seven years' residence in Washington to still have her daughters under the family tree, and Washington so full of eligibles, too. My correspondent writes me that Countess Marguerite Cassini, niece, adopted daughter and mistress of the Russian Ambassador's household, continues to hold the centre of the social stage in Washington. Notwithstanding all the gossip there has been about her she managed to make a very respectable showing at a reception at the Russian Embassy a week ago. Her showing was respectable in point of number of guests. But her showing in a decollete way was something to marvel at. Washington had never seen such an excessive display of youthful charms before outside of a boudoir. The Countess wore a gown which for revealing purposes could scarcely have been surpassed except by a Living Picture. Now they say that some conservative matrons assert that they will stay away from the Russian Embassy unless Marguerite dons a shawl.

The McKenna Nursery Days

The gossip from Washington coupling the name of ex-Mayor J. D. Phelan with that of charming Miss Belle McKenna has been widely discussed in clubs and over tea tables. The friendship of the families dates from the time when the Phelans and the grandparents of the young lady resided at the Mission. The fashionable out of town drive in those days was along the Mission turnpike road. Mrs. McKenna's father owned a large flower garden and nursery near the road and one of the most attractive features of the drive was the sight of his rosy cheeked little daughter and her brother as they ran up to the passing vehicles to sell their sweet bouquets. Autres temps autres moeurs.

The Feltons

Ex-Senator Felton was in Washington last week revisiting the scene of his Senatorial triumphs and renewing old friendships. When he returns to California he will be accompanied by his daughter, Mrs. W. L. Elkins nee Kate Felton, who, since her marriage to the late Mr. Elkins of Philadelphia, has resided in the Quaker city. It is said to be the intention of Mrs. Elkins to make her native State, California, her future home. These Feltons are not to be confounded with the other Californians of that name. Miss Kate Felton of today, who is the efficient manager of charitable organizations, and who recently moved to San Francisco from Oakland, comes of a very talented family. Her father, the late John B. Felton, was regarded as one of the leaders of the bar during the sixty and seventy decades. Her grandfather, Judge J. G. Baldwin, and her uncle "Sandy," both occupied seats on the Supreme bench for many years, the younger man filling that position in Nevada before he was twenty-five years of age. The older man was a writer of some note, his "Flush Times in Alabama" being regarded as a classic.

Lord Temple cigars are smoked by all clubmen who will take nothing but the best.

The Stork in Washington

The itinerary of the ciconia alba includes the homes of four of the leaders of Washington's smart set. This is vouched for by my correspondent at the capital. Society, he continues, is rife with gossip over the schedule of the stork, and though the greatest interest is centred in Mrs. Roosevelt who is going to Oyster Bay to await the happy event, the case of the charming wife of Senator Depew has become the most prolific theme of comment. The Senator is so proud of his achievement that he is strutting about the capital like a turkey-cock. He is assuring all his friends that he is as young as he feels. Enforced retirement will also remove from the swim the wife of General Corbin and Baroness Moncheur, the wife of the Belgian Minister.

I see the juvenile Filipinos are not impressed with the story of great George and the hatchet. According to Filipino ideas, George was a booby not smart enough to lie. The story might as well be shelved anyway. At best it does not concern the Filipinos.

Bret Harte's Peculiarities

Though Bret Harte's fame was made through his tales of Californian life in the early days, and though the friendships of his young manhood were made on this coast, he is not kindly remembered here. Some of his best work was done in San Francisco, and here he was touted for many years, but when he went away he cut adrift from all his old associates. He was a great writer and a great egotist. He could inhale incense burning at his shrine forever. He was not of congenial temperament. He was not an active member of the Bohemian Club though all his old associates were. Both he and Mark Twain were made honorary members in 1873 but neither was ever an active member. Harte was the contemporary here of Twain, Lieutenant Derby—"Squibob" and "John Phoenix—Steve Massett ("Pipes"), R. S. Ogden ("Podgers"), Harry Mighels, Prentice Mulford, James Bowman and Judge Rhodes ("Caxton"). Bret Harte never had the genuine jovial bohemian spirit that characterized these men. He was bohemian only in that he did not always pay his bills. Not long ago I told the story of Ina Coolbrith's experience with Bret Harte with regard to taking her book of poems East to be published.

Barrett and Harte's Bills

The poet-author's experience with Lawrence Barrett is worth repeating. When Harte went East he paid a promised visit to the actor in New Jersey. Harte liked the place so well that he expressed a desire to settle down in the neighborhood. So Barrett got a house for him and stood sponsor for the poet with the landlord, the furniture dealer and other tradesmen. Harte lived there for some time and deprived himself of no conceivable luxury. But when he went away to fill his appointment as United States Consul in a German town, he forgot all his New Jersey obligations. He had not paid one cent of rent or of anything else during his sojourn in Barrett's village. As the actor had sponsored him he paid the bills, but he did not fail to express a forcible opinion afterward, and quoted those verses beginning:

"I waited for a single flower to blow, While all about me flowers were running wild."

and ending with—

"And all about thy slender rootlets cast
My life like water, but to find at last
A bitterness and blight?"

He Liked London

However, Harte's financial laxity may have been but one of the eccentricities of genius. His lack of patriotism and State pride may also have been due to this cause. When he was United States Consul in Glasgow, one of the most remunerative offices in the Government's gift, he spent nearly all his time in London. The Americans in Scotland had a saying then that the only man who did not know where the United States Consulate was situated was the United States Consul himself. When Cleveland appointed a successor to Harte, the poet remained in London for he preferred England to America as a place of residence.

As a Poet

Though Harte the man may in some things be condemned, and Harte the novel writer may be said to have done great harm to California by misrepresentation, Harte the poet is universally beloved. Some of his earlier poems, though not great, linger in the memory. One of these is "Her Letter," once popular among dramatic readers. The late Oliver Wendell Holmes was a literary friend of Harte and when the Autocrat celebrated his seventy-fifth birthday, Bret Harte sent him the following graceful lines:

One day, from groves of pine and palm,
The poets of the sky and cover
Had come to greet with song and psalm,
The whip-poor-will—their woodland lover.
All sang their best, but one clear note
That fairly voiced their admiration
Was his—who only sang by rote—
The mock-bird's modest imitation.

So we, who'd praise the bard who most
Is poet of each high occasion,
Who'd laud our laureate, and toast
The blithe Toast-Master of the Nation—
To celebrate his fete today,
In vain each bard his praise rehearses;
The best that we can sing or say
Is but an echo of his verses.

Bret Harte was an adept at literary burlesque. His Condensed Novels are as clever in their line as could be done by any pen. His take-off on "Jane Eyre" is the best known of these. A new series of Condensed Novels was lately started by Harte in the Cosmopolitan and Hall Caine's "Eternal City" and "Christian" were brilliantly satirized.

Stephen W. Leach, the basso and author of that good old drinking song "Let All Obey," was a brother-in-law of Bret Harte. Leach died some years ago. He was a famous Bohemian and a great singer. Judge Harry A. Melvin was one of his vocal pupils in the long ago.

An Interesting Monument

At the congress of the Sons of the American Revolution held in Washington last week, William M. Bunker of this city offered resolutions which were adopted, providing for the care of the "Stars and Stripes" monument which he recently discovered in an old church known as Holy Trinity in East London. The church is on the site of the old Abbey of St. Claire, and it was in the vault below the church, two hundred years after his death on Tower Hill, that there was found the mummified head of the Duke of Suffolk, father of Lady Jane Grey. The monument marks the resting place of Elizabeth Washington, niece of Lawrence Washington who was a direct ancestor of our own immortal George. It bears the Washington arms—the eagle and the stars—five pointed stars—and stripes which are believed to have suggested the design for the American flag. Mr. Bunker delivered a stirring address in support of his resolutions.

Distinguished in Journalism

Though Amos J. Cummings, who died last week, had been a prominent figure in Congress for nearly thirty years he was better known as a journalist than as a statesman or politician. He was known all over the United States as a hustling newspaper man. I met him in the Press Club in this city when he came hither en route to the Orient for his health. It was at the close of the war between China and Japan, and Creelman, the newspaper correspondent who had shortly before attracted attention to himself as a star in the firmament of yellow journalism by his sensational stories about the cruelties practiced by the Japanese, arrived here about the same time. He was returning to New York and both were guests of the Press Club the same evening. Mr. Cummings made a brief speech on that occasion during which he declared that he believed he owed his success in life to the experience which he had in boyhood days at the printer's case. He said that a better education could be absorbed in the composing room than in a university.

He was a Filibuster

Cummings, by the way, was an associate of General William Walker, who is perhaps almost forgotten by the people of this generation. As a filibuster Walker occupies a conspicuous place in history. Cummings had for associates in the Walker expedition in Central America, Englishmen fresh from Sebastopol, Hungarians who had bled under Kossuth, red-skirted Italians who had ridden behind Garibaldi, and Indians of the frontier. It was in those days that Cummings tried his hand at composition and he wrote the following which he used to sing for the pleasure of his friends:

How would you like a soldier's life
On the plains of Nicara-goo?
Marching away and fighting all day,
Nothing to eat and as much to pay,
We do it all for glory they say,
On the plains of Nicara-goo.
Not a bit of breakfast did I see,
And dinner was all the same to me;
Two fried oats and three fried rats,
Was a supper at Nicara-goo.
Marching away and fighting all day,
Nothing to eat and as much to pay,
We do it all for glory, they say,
On the plains of Nicara-goo.

The highest position attained by Cummings in journalism was that of managing editor of the New York Sun. Though he was a Tammany Congressman, he was not subject to Croker's dictation. He voted against the Huntington Union Pacific bill against the express command of Mr. Croker.

Society Studying Languages

The language of diplomacy is rapidly becoming the language of Blingum. Society is becoming Parisian in its tastes. Several of our belles eschew English since they were struck by the latest fad. The fame of the Berlitz system has spread to San Francisco, and now, it is said, there is no longer any reason why you should not be able to talk in any foreign language that strikes your fancy. If you attend the Berlitz school you are not allowed to speak in any tongue except the one which you are learning. The pupil fairly breathes the atmosphere of the nation whose language he is studying. As a consequence Wardie McAllister orders his dinner now with the accent of a Parisian.

Why the Crash Came

Once more has the storm broken in Wall street, and the newspaper correspondents tell us that a veil of mystery covers the transactions which led to the crashing of stocks controlled by Dr. Webb, the son-in-law of the late William H. Vanderbilt. There is nothing very mysterious about Wall street crashes. They are merely the result of the bold manipulations of unscrupulous gamblers. Dr. Webb of the 400 is one of them. By way of illustration of how business is conducted in Wall street, a friend wrote me a week ago of an incident which came to light immediately after a fall in the price of the International Power stock, which by the way affected the Webb-Meyer combination and hastened its crash. "International Power" had been advancing with apparently inexhaustible strength for many days. Suddenly it collapsed and then it was learned that the cause was very simple. It appeared that the gamblers had resorted to a common method of creating confidence in the future of International Power, that of dangling before the public eye the spectacle of enormous purchases at rapidly increasing prices. Two brokers were set up opposite each other, one to sell what the other bought. They traded in the number of shares that in their judgment produced the best effect. But it happened that one day, though the broker engaged to sell got his orders, the orders to the other man to buy miscarried, and so there being no one to buy the crash came. And that is the way hundreds of sensational operations have been effected. Isn't it a rather comic state of affairs?

Markham as a Financier

Edwin Markham, the hoe-poet, has not been in the public eye for some time. It is no easy matter to keep Pegasus in the glare of the calcium. But Mr. Markham is not sitting idly by waiting for another inspiration. He has written to a friend in this city to the effect that he has organized in New York the Brainworkers' Association, and that its purpose is to develop the best that thought can produce in art, letters, the drama, religion and every activity in life. Its activities are to be carried on through a fund which will be available when necessary to supplement genius. As Mr. Markham is president of the association I pre-

She Cut a Swath

A story comes to me from Manila anent one of the school teachers who went from an Eastern city, via San Francisco, to the Philippine Islands, to fill a government position. She has made a great record at her post, I hear. The record is not, however, in the line of teaching the Filipino young idea how to shoot. It is gay-colored and could just as easily have been acquired in an American town. The teacher is a pretty girl and she likes to enhance her pulchritude by the wearing of fine raiment. To this end she ran all sorts of bills in Manila, using the names of some of the Army friends gained during the ocean voyage as references. But when the accounts were presented she said of course she could not pay them out of her petite salary. She also borrowed money right and left, and pleaded poverty when the time came to lessen the obligation. As she is of good family and irreproachable manners and morals, aside from this bohemian tendency, she was admitted into the most exclusive circles upon her arrival at the Islands. The Army people found her acquaintance too expensive, and her name has been dropped from their calling list.

Snyder's Campaign Sack

Some of the leaders of the Democracy who, a few months ago, were scoffing at the suggestion of Mayor Snyder of Los Angeles as a gubernatorial candidate, now regard it with considerable favor. Snyder stood in with the Clark faction in the street railroad war in Los Angeles, and the report is now bruited that the multi-millionaire purposes getting behind the little Mayor. The politicians connected with the Democratic State machine have been on their uppers for a long time, and the prospect of the Clark sack being thrown into the next campaign has started a bad attack of itching palms. Clark's income is estimated to be in the neighborhood of a million a month, and Senator Clark is a money-spender whose like has never been seen in this State. When he was fighting Marcus Daly in Montana he flooded the State with long-green. If Snyder can convince the politicians that Clark stands ready to defray expenses he will not have any difficulty in obtaining the nomination. Such a glorious opportunity for the leg-pullers would not be overlooked.

Short on Lingerie

There was great commotion behind the scenes at the Orpheum last Saturday night. Those dimple-kneed damsels of the pony ballet were the cause of it all. They had sent their lingerie to a laundry and at the eleventh hour they were notified that as the machinery in the laundry had broken down their washing would be delayed for about twelve hours. But they were down on the program for an early stunt. If they went on and danced without their lingerie the police might raid the house. The situation was a desperate one. Nobody could suggest a way out of the difficulty. The management was in distress until somebody came in with the report that there was a small dry goods store south of the slot that never closed until after eight o'clock. One of the ponies threw herself into a hack, visited the store, bought the material necessary for the whole ballet, and returned with it to the theatre. Then every one of the ponies went to work with needle and thread, and stitched herself a garment in time to get under the wire before the close of the performance.

Coronation Gossip

My London correspondent writes me that if there are any people in San Francisco who expect to attend the Coronation festivities and who have not yet arranged for hotel accommodations, they should lose no time in cabling to friends to secure rooms. "But there is little likelihood," she adds, "of rooms being engaged at this time, in any London hotel, for the summer. Those that haven't secured accommodations will be likely to get them in private families, for every hotel in London has been sold out for the Coronation week. There is surely to be a terrible crush here, and no one should envy the Peeresses who are to attend the Coronation ceremony in the Abbey. To accommodate them all it has been decided to allow each only sixteen inches of sitting room. Think of that! In mid-summer, too! Those who are not so slender as they used to be are devoutly hoping that the temperature will be cool on June 26th. For delicate women the lengthy ceremony will be a terrible ordeal. All sorts of ingenious devices are being resorted to to facilitate the personal and surreptitious conveyance of refreshments into the Abbey. I was told the other day of one great lady who is having an imposing book made for the occasion that will contain between its covers more than the Coronation service. A fan will be an essential part of every lady's toilette, and these are being exquisitely painted and ornamented with jewels. I haven't yet heard a suggestion as to the advisability of introducing electric fans. The English are very slow in some things. There is already considerable grumbling in London because the King has given permission to those M. P.'s who have no Court dress to attend in ordinary morning costume, and yet a more serious reduction of the delightful gorgeousness of the big show is threatened by the faint-hearted Barons of the Cinque Ports who say they will not wear their ancient costume of scarlet with trunk hose and Spanish velvet hat and ostrich feathers. If any more of the important performers follow suit they will cast a gloom over what should be a most resplendent historical show."

Her Father Fought a Duel

The Rosenfeld and Smedberg families have been made quite conspicuous of late by the divorce suit which has been so generously exploited by the dailies. The plaintiff in the case is the daughter of James R. Smedberg who was familiarly known years ago as Gashouse Smedberg. The sobriquet was bestowed to distinguish him from his brother William R. Smedberg, the insurance man. He first came into prominence away back in '69 through a duel with F. W. Gardner who was the son of the Governor of Massachusetts. Gardner had at that time resided here only a few months. He was a tall, handsome fellow with a dash of dare-devil in his composition, and he became a prominent figure in society. He was a suitor for the hand of Mamie Reilley, a beauty and a belle, and one day Smedberg repeated a story that he had heard about Gardner which was not of a flattering nature. Miss Reilley told Gardner and the latter demanded the name of the author of the tale. Smedberg refused to give it, whereupon he was challenged to a duel. He refused to accept it.

Lost His Fingers

A few days later Gardner, armed with a cowhide, encountered Smedberg in the bar-room of the Occidental hotel, and cut him across the face with the whip. Another challenge was the result and it was accepted. A meeting took place in Marin county, Howard Crittenden acting as Gardner's second, and Col. Stuart Taylor filling that role for Smedberg. The duel resulted in the loss of a couple of Smedberg's fingers, and as he was a pianist of some ability, the loss was a serious one. As Gardner said in speaking later of the affair, "I didn't wish to kill the fellow, so I just winged him in a way that will prove a puninshment indeed, and cause him to remember me as long as he lives." Mrs. Rosenfeld is also related to "Jo" Duncan, one of San Francisco's pioneer auctioneers, a familiar figure of early days, and who afterward attained notoriety as manager of the Pioneer bank. His disappearance after the failure of the bank, attempted escape by sea, and final arrest after several weeks in hiding, proved one of the sensations of the period.

A Noted Beauty to Return

San Francisco society will soon welcome back to her native heath Mrs. George Kirkpatrick who, as Miss Mollie Torbert, was one of the beauties of our swim and who has been away ever since her marriage. Mrs. Kirkpatrick belongs to a family noted for its pulchritude. Her mother, Mrs. Charles Torbert, and her aunt, Mrs. J. F. Swift, are among the handsomest of the many beautiful women that have lived in this city. Her sister Emily, who married Mr. Fearon of Shanghai, and Sheda, who is now Mrs. Valtine Snyder of New York, were both beauties of different types.

The Daughters of the Grain King

The Misses Friedlander, after their long and serious illness at the Lane Hospital, are reported to be rapidly regaining health and strength at Santa Barbara where they went to recuperate. Much sympathy has been expressed for these young ladies in their sad reverse of fortune and the courage they have since exhibited. While awarding them praise for the unflinching manner in which they braved the waves of adversity I know they have no desire to pose as martyrs. The Friedlanders are particularly fortunate in having the sympathy and encouragement of the entire Tevis family, the late Mrs. Sue Tevis, Mrs. Fred Sharon and Mrs. Will Tevis, as well as of Miss Jennie Flood, all of whom have been warm friends and patrons.

When They were Rich

No old San Franciscan can forget that in spite of his three failures in business old Isaac Friedlander was recognized in the business world as the "Grain King" of the Coast, or that the family held a leading place in its social world for many years. The Friedlanders gave numerous entertainments. One of the most brilliant functions ever attempted here was the wedding of their daughter Lizzie, to A. J. Bowie Jr. It was on that occasion that the expulsion of an uninvited guest was the sensation of the hour and for many a day. There has been a good deal of criticism anent the rupture of the family relations between Mr. Bowie and his daughter Miss Bessie, and her aunts, the Misses Friedlander, but it is always better to feel that perhaps there are two sides to such matters, and that to comment on one without a knowledge of the other is absurd and unjust.

When Lloyd Tevis was Poor

Society—especially that portion of it known as the "old set"—has been indulging in reminiscences this week anent the many old friends who have recently passed away. Apropos of the Tevises, several little stories crop up of their early life, and friends recall how proudly Lloyd Tevis used to tell of one incident of his life in Sacramento. He said he found himself, soon after arrival there, with only fifty cents in his pocket. As he walked along the street ruminating on what his next move would be, he spied in a confectioner's window a most tempting looking pie. He doted on pie and he bought that one for his last fifty-cent piece. In speaking of the incident he declared that the enjoyment and satisfaction he derived from eating that pie nerved him to renewed effort in search of employment. This he found in the office of Dr. Louis A. Birdsall who was then Recorder in Sacramento, and it was while a clerk in that office that he began his lucrative occupation of "shaving" warrants. Dr. Birdsall was the father of Milton S. Latham's first wife, a lady noted for her brilliant intellect. Mr. Tevis's next upward step was the formation of a partnership with his brother-in-law, J. B. Haggin, to lend money at ten per cent a month compound interest, which, as he said, they had little difficulty in obtaining those days.

The Veiled Lady

During the recent Elks' circus in Fresno not a little speculation was aroused as to the identity of a dashing equestrienne whose features were concealed from view behind a heavy veil. She wore a regulation habit and silk hat and her figure was charmingly erect and graceful. She was a fearless rider and won admiration by her feats of daring. From a private letter from Fresno I learn that the "veiled lady" was twins. It was not one woman, but two, who rode alternately in the circus, and hence the use of the veil. Mrs. John Japp of Fresno was one of the riders and Miss Ferguson of Clovis was the other.

Publishing House Quackery

According to Professor Brander Matthews the function of the literary critic is merely to expound, not to judge. With few exceptions the literary critics of the day are merely press agents for the publishers. So well is this understood to be the case by publishers that they have their own criticisms printed and stereotyped, and they send the "boiler-plate" to so-called critics all over the country. The Macmillan Company fell into the error, the other day, of confounding Town Talk with the publications that deal in that sort of criticism, and I received from that firm a piece of "boiler-plate" containing a half-column boom for "Dorothy Vernon of Haddon Hall" by Charles Major. According to Macmillan & Co. "Charles Major is perhaps the most popular teller of love stories among living novelists." It was no doubt modesty that forbade the omission of "perhaps." But the writer of "boiler-plate" matter declares however, that Mr. Major "has the rare and happy faculty which brings home to the heart the spirit of gallant times and the imperious call for youth's springtime." I hope the book has less flapdoodle and more sense than are contained in that sentence. However the writer assures me, or rather he wishes me to assure my readers, that "the book is well written from first page to last" and that it "is worthy to rank as one of the best pieces of American fiction, and as literature"; that Mr. Major "has discovered what potent implements are language and style in the creation of romance." Surely, a happy discovery; "all praise to him for this," writes the boiler-plater of Macmillan & Co., "it cannot fail, moreover, to add to his popplarity, thus earning for his willingness to labor and improve two rewards, one material, the other artistic."

Why "moreover,"instead of "moreunder" or some other equally euphonious word? It would express as much. Poor boiler-plater! No doubt grinding out that kind of polite and puerile twaddle superinduces brain-fag. It is evident that the methods of the theatrical manager are being worked in the book business. But isn't it brazen effrontery for the publisher to break into the profession of the reviewer and seek to delude the public by interjecting his own opinions about his own books? Isn't it a form of quackery which should be regarded as a disgrace to literature?

Connoisseurs of perfect goods appreciate "Jesse Moore" Whiskey for its purity and delightful flavor. It is without a peer.

In Light Marching Order

Mrs. Clemens Hohwiesner of San Rafael was the not unprotesting victim of a most unpleasant contretemps in New York the other day. For months she has been preparing to pay a long-promised visit to her parents, the Charles Meineckes, who have been wintering in Northern Italy. Early last week she started, tearfully, but with a full complement of trunks and dress-suit cases, consigned to mine host of the Buckingham, who had been instructed by her fond husband in countless telegrams to see that the little woman was placed safely on board the Italian liner with all her impedimenta. But somebody blundered. When the proprietor of the Buckingham released Mrs. Hohwiesner's arm after escorting her up the gangplank and was about to make his adieux, it was suddenly discovered that all her luggage was missing—nothing in sight, not even a hand bag! Tears, expostulations, lamentations, explanations and frantic telegraphing ensued. Her belongings were finally located at the Hamburg line pier, but, alas! too late! The Italian boat swung clear into the stream and poor, little Mrs. Hohwiesner was precipitated into a nine days' ocean voyage without even a toothbrush!

To Gain Exclusiveness

It is reported that the management of the new Crocker hotel intends to make a rule that in the room in which meals are served a la carte, men not in evening dress shall not be served. A similar rule was once laid down by a famous Fifth avenue restaurateur and he was compelled to abandon it. I predict that the Crocker hotel management will also find the rule impracticable if it be adopted. San Franciscans, like New Yorkers, are patient and tolerant but they will demur to a rule the purpose of which is to give a restaurant the hallmark of exclusiveness. It is more likely to prove unsuccessful here than in New York, for we have not been educated up to the evening dress habit. A man not in evening dress or at least tuxedo is a rara avis in Sherry's, Delmonico's, Martin's or in any of the smart New York hotels at the dinner hour. And yet a rule making it obligatory on people to wear evening dress would not be tolerated there.

Many will go down to San Mateo today to remain over until Monday. There will be a promenade concert at the hotel tonight and the grounds will be illuminated with vari-colored incandescent lights. J. A. Marsh took an automobile party down to the hotel last Saturday.

The Old Sutro Place

A kettledrum will be given at the old Sutro mansion, corner Hayes and Fillmore strets, next Wednesday evening. It will be a charity affair for the benefit of Sacred Heart church, and the ladies of that parish have the function in charge. It is long since any function has disturbed the calm of the old Sutro mansion. Its halls have not been filled with fashion and beauty for many a long year. Its last occupant was the wife of Adolph Sutro. Sutro himself resided in his home on the heights overlooking the Cliff House but his wife, from whom he had been separated for years, lived in the old family home in Fillmore street. The memoirs of the Sutro family, by the way, would be interesting reading. A romancist could find material for a three-volume novel in the life of the aged capitalist. The house where the Sacred Heart ladies will hold their kettledrum was in its time a handsome edifice. The grounds are extensive and were beautiful, but they have been permitted to lapse into overgrowth and decay.

Feminine Wits and Orators

When all the returns are in from the Federation of Women's Clubs in Los Angeles, I expect to have some good stories about what the ladies did and did not do in the convention. Mrs. Lowe of Georgia, who is one of the opposition on the color line question, is very affable, I am told, in other matters. She is a bit of a wit, too, as was proved in the little speech she made on Tuesday that resulted in the ladies removing their hats. Mrs. Lowe said:

"If the ladies of the convention will remove their hats it will save wear and many dollars to kind and deserving husbands."

Mrs. Pennybacker of Texas was the idol of the reporters from the first day of the convention. She does not believe in superfluous speech and she it was who squelched what promised to be a lengthy debate at Tuesday's session between Dr. Dickinson of Chicago and Mrs. Dunaway of Oregon by calling out:

"Madame chairman, I move the previous question!"

One of the most brilliant papers read at the convention was the work of Mabel Clare Craft of the Chronicle.

Traveling Californians

Mrs. Edward Painter joined the Californian colony in Washington, D. C. recently, going thence to New York. She was entertained by several of her old San Francisco friends now resident in the East. Mrs. Painter was Jean Russell before her marriage. Her father, John A. Russell, for years clerk of the Board of Supervisors in this city, died not long ago.

An Heir Wanted

A gentleman familiar with Holland politics informs me that the death of Queen Wilhelmina would fill Dutch and German diplomats with anxieties. It appears that her heir presumptive is the Grand Duke of Saxe-Weimar whose grandmother was Princess Wilhelmina Sophie of Holland, and he is a bachelor and without a near heir. His only brother, who shared with him a chance for the Dutch throne, died a little while ago. The Grand Duke will soon be twenty-six years of age, and in view of important possibilities it was hoped that a marriage would be arranged for him with pretty Princess Alice of Albany who bears a strong resemblance to her cousin, Queen Wilhelmina. But this charming Princess has other admirers of very high rank and the Grand Duke has shown no inclination to give Saxe-Weimar a Grand Duchess.

A Senator's Confession

That was an interesting but somewhat damaging affidavit made by State Senator Selvage of Humboldt county concerning the proposition to bribe the city council which, he alleges, was submitted to him. The affidavit is as damaging to Mr. Selvage as to the other people involved. The State Senator virtually confesses that as the attorney for the telephone company, he entertained the proposition and submitted it to the officers of the corporation by whom it was rejected. Their rejection of the proposition does not absolve Mr. Selvage of culpability. The fact remains, so far as the affidavit shows, that affiant stood ready to act as middleman in a bribery transaction. Being a State Senator as well as an attorney he perhaps feels that that sort of business falls within the line of his professional duties.

Brady's Philosophy

All of which reminds me of the philosophy of Statesman Brady who was in the last legislature. Mr. Brady represented the tenderloin district, and it was generally understood that he was not in Sacramento for his health. But it was a very dull session, and by the time it was over Brady was filled with disgust. When he returned home at the close of his labors he declared that he would never become a legislator again unless he could first become an attorney at law.

"Why do you wish to become an attorney?" asked a friend.

"Because," he replied, "I can then take stuff without incurring the liability of arrest and prosecution for accepting a bribe. When I was in Sacramento my legal confreres in the legislature were taking stuff right and left but they called it 'fees' and represented themselves as counsel for the parties interested in the measures they were pushing. If I did what some of those lawyers did I would have landed in San Quentin."

The Summer Itinerary

Society this summer will be about evenly divided between San Rafael and San Mateo, for it is in those localities that the greater number of smart country places is situated. So many families are in mourning that it will be out of the question for them to take part in even hotel gayeties, and these naturally prefer the quiet of a suburban residence. The Morgans will be missed from San Rafael as they expect to go abroad very soon now. But Katherine Dillon will be back from Japan and in a measure her presence will make up for Therese Morgan's absence. Pearl Landers will not enter largely into any summer sports that will be on the rug, for too much winter gayety sent this popular bud into nervous prostration. The Will Tevis' will vibrate between Bakersfield and Tahoe, their usual summer stunt. The Hopkins-Taylors-McNears, who have been so quiet this last month or so, will follow their usual program of San Mateo country home and mountain eyrie, with brief trips to the hotels.

Bettie Ashe Coming Home

Miss Elizabeth Ashe will be here this summer to spend her vacation and her friends are prepared to lionize her—if she will let them. "Bettie" Ashe is the youngest of the girls in the family, and some think her the most attractive. She tired of the round of social duties and pleasures and went in for more serious occupation. Like Laura McKinstry and May Hoffman she took up nursing. Unlike her friends, however, she kept to her profession when Miss McKinstry was recalled home by illness in her family and Miss Hoffman eloped with Rev. Le Baron Johnson. Bettie's letters home told of hard duties, but enjoyable ones to her because she liked the life. She has the Ashe grit that all the boys—Porter, Gaston and Sidney—possess and would never give up any allotted task, no matter how disagreeable. The same blood that flowed in the veins of Admiral Farragut flows in that of this bright society girl who elected to become a hospital nurse. Linie, the eldest of the sisters, married Norman McLaren. She is a great church worker and was also one of the founders of the ladies' Town and Country Club. Millie, the second sister, married Harold Sewall, son of the great ship-builder.

The Famous Little Church

The other day Mrs. Katherine Holland the widow of George Holland, the elder, was buried from "The Little Church Around the Corner." When her son Joseph Holland was last out here he told me the true story of how the Church of the Transfiguration in Twenty-ninth street came by its more "comfy" sobriquet of "The Little Church Around the Corner." At the time of his father's death in 1870, the Holland family frequently attended the Church of the Atonement. Believing that church to be the most appropriate at which to hold the funeral services of his father, young Holland went with Joseph Jefferson to see the rector, the Rev. Dr. Sabine, and requested him to perform the burial service. Mr. Jefferson, in order to have everything perfectly straightforward, told the Rev. Mr. Sabine that Mr. Holland was an actor and asked him whether he had any objection on that ground. Mr. Sabine at once replied that he had but added that there was a little church around the corner where they did such queer things. "Then God bless the little church around the corner," replied Joseph Jefferson, and from that day it has been known as "The Little Church Around the Corner" and held in affectionate esteem by the theatrical fraternity. Almost all the stage folk in New York gathered at Mrs. Holland's funeral and the rector commented on the fact that her husband was the first actor who was buried from "The Little Church Around the Corner."

May Wed Sandow

The story has filtered through to this city from the Californian colony in New York that Sandow, the strong man, is expected there again, and that when he returns it may be to claim a San Francisco girl for his bride. The girl has made her home in New York for some time past. She has a fencing and physical culture class and, as the story comes to me, she went to Sandow for a few finishing lessons in her art. The strong man, whom beauty alone does not move, could not resist the splendid muscles of the Californian. He gave her the instructions she asked and then he proceeded to fall in love with her. The two were often seen, prior to Sandow's departure for London, walking or driving together. It is more than likely muscular topics alone furnished the subject of their conversation, but my correspondent will have it that the theme was "l'amour" instead.

When Sandow was in San Francisco

It is many a year since Sandow visited us. He came, if I remember rightly, about the time of the midwinter fair. Scheel was the idol of the musical enthusiasts and Sandow of the women who worship muscle. He appeared in vaudeville and also gave private exhibitions of his strength. One of these exhibitions was a matinee before a select audience of art students and society women. I have preserved the verses that Dick Tarleton, the young hotel clerk poet and protege of Anna Morrison Reed, dashed off apropos of the function:

Since the days of fair Eve—"when the trouble began,"
Each woman has sighed for a real, perfect man;
But, alas! nowadays they are so hard to find,
That it seems that they only exist "in your mind."
No, no, I'm mistaken, we've got one right here,
It's Sandow, "the perfect"—Adonis' peer;
Though unlike Adonis the wretch will wear clothes
And "only to ladies" his figure expose.
Oh, dear, how the ladies did hustle to see
The perfect man pose at his great matinee;
They crowded the boxes, the parquet and all,
And stood up by scores with their backs to the wall.
The ladies from most of our Art Schools were there,
The "old" and the "homely," the young and the fair.
There were "dreamy-eyed blondes" with their cheeks in a glow,
And "red-headed belles" sitting twelve in a row.
"Old maids" sitting there as if glued to the seat,
And damsels who giggled, "Oh, my, ain't he sweet."
There were "strong-minded women" and "giddy old girls,"
Young ladies in wigs and old ladies in curls,
And women of—well—say of "uncertain age"
Were crowding each other to stand near the stage.
Whilst all the front seats—called the "Baldheads' annex,"
Were filled up completely by ladies in specs.
The curtain went up, all was silent as death,
For a moment they seemed to be gasping for breath.
Then all kind of glasses appeared with a rush,
All pointed at Sandow, dressed?—yes—in a blush.
At least that is all of the "clothes" I could see,
Though the lady who sat in the seat next to me
(With a pair of field glasses) declares I am wrong,
Some ribbon was where it would seem to belong.
Maybe there was, for to tell you the truth,
My eyes have been weak from the days of my youth.
For nearly one hour they sat and they gazed
At Sandow's nude figure and gushingly praised
His form and his muscles, his curls and his face,
His curves and his outlines, his ease and his grace,
And vowed it was, oh! such an artistic sight,
They could linger with pleasure there night after night.
And so when the "horrid old curtain" came down
Each lady declared with a very deep frown,
She thought the performance was really too short,
They did not see half the "art pictures" they ought.

From San Francisco Sandow returned to Europe and in Germany married. His wife was a stunning beauty and she later seconded him in his strength stunts.

Matrons of Perennial Charm

What is the proper age at which a mother should be shelved? is a question that is beginning to agitate the modish world. Too many of our matrons are retaining their verdancy long after the budding period of their offspring, and as a consequence many of our fair debutantes are being overshadowed by mammas. However, the knack of growing old gracefully is one that no woman cares to lose, and in solving the problem as to the shelving of the perennially attractive mothers the matrons themselves must be consulted. There is perhaps no girl in society who has a more attractive mother than has Elena Robinson, but there are two prospective buds who have not only a charming mamma to divide interest but also a grandmother to be reckoned with. One of the best examples of the mother who is no less interesting than her offspring is Mrs. Louis Parrott. And by the way, we have only one Mrs. Parrott in California, and Mrs. Louis Parrott is that one—a woman of great executive ability, and admired for her gentleness, her kindness and her generosity.

There is a new department in the Critic this month. It is headed "Salt and Sincerity" and is edited by Frank Norris. It will probably be a permanent feature. "Sense and Smells" would seem to me, however, a more Norris-like heading. The nasal element always predominates in Frank Norris' novels. He does not see beauty and fields; he smells them.

With the Money Makers

Balliet's Latest

Letson Balliet is again to the fore with one of his characteristic schemes. He has sworn to a warrant for the arrest of Mrs. Alice Young, his former chief clerk. He charges her with stealing $65 while she was in his employ. Many people believe Balliet's desire is to discredit the young woman's testimony which she is to give against him in the Federal court of Des Moines where he will be tried on May nineteenth for a fraudulent use of the mails. For several years Balliet has been a wonderfully successful financier. He has gotten several hundred thousand dollars mostly from people of small means who seek to make fortunes from trifling investments. He has spent at least a hundred thousand dollars in advertising himself as a Napoleon of finance, etc. Journals which prosper by cloaking the rottenness of advertisers when such a course is profitable, have found Balliet a ready course of revenue. His three principal sinks for other people's money are the White Swan Mining Company, the Niagara Mining Company and a "Security" company. In none of these has an investor a chance to ever get his money back except he can scare Balliet into returning it with threats of exposure. Balliet claims to have bought a handful of Congressmen with a few thousand dollars to get him out of trouble with the United States authorities. In fact, he told me this himself, and boasted that he had always enough ready cash to provide the same slippery lubricant in a slide for safety. Just now he is advertising extensively his Niagara mine scheme. His statements are plausible though extravagant and he will catch many fish as heretofore.

The Alaska Central Railway proposes to build a railroad from Resurrection Bay to Rampart, and has been capitalized for $30,000,000. The shares are of the value of $50 for 550,000 non-assessable and the same price for 50,000 five per cent. preferred. The preferred shares are offered for sale here by the American Guarantee and Trust Company, which has offices in the Hayward building. The Company is generous enough not to ask $50 for the stock now but only $5 cash, which will allow even the small investor to get in on the ground floor. The Alaska Central publishes a prospectus headed: "Can ye not discern the signs of the times?" Matthew xvi: 3. The prospectus also says: "When construction has progressed to the completion of the first five or ten miles, every cent necessary for the completion of the remaining distance will then be available on long-term bonds at a low rate of interest. It is the honest conviction of the officers and directors that dividends on the preferred stock will be earned from the time the first twenty miles are built. The preferred stock should, therefore, quickly go to par and above. There is no valid reason why the Alaska Central should not be a better dividend-earner when it enters the Mount McKinley district, 125 miles inland, than the White Pass and Yukon is today, with its stock $400 above par. The permanent resources tributary to the Alaska Central are so far superior to the resources tributary to the White Pass and Yukon that comparison is out of the question." Doubtless the shrewd Northerners who are fathering this scheme will get some California money. I would advise no investment as the prospective dividends are too uncertain and too distant.

On Change

Business on the Stock and Bond Exchange for the week has been rather limited and has been confined to a few of the securities of favored corporations. The flurry in light stocks noted last week and attributed to a possible combination of all the corporations in the bay counties, subsided some with the liberal offers to sell and prices have been see-sawing as there have been quite a few buyers at times. San Francisco Gas and Electric shares have been fluctuating between $43.50 and $45, although the bulk of transactions were recorded at $44. Quite a few small blocks changed hands. Pacific Gas Improvement shares were offering freely and there was an easing off in values. Transactions in other gas shares were rather limited. Alaska Packers' Association's stocks sold well, touching $162 and ruling firm at this figure. Both California Fruit Canners' and California Wine Association's shares held up well at steady prices and came in for some little attention. Spring Valley Water shares were rather neglected and prices were easier. Oceanic stocks ruled steady at $32 with the demand moderate. Aside from Hutchison Plantation Sugar shares have been featureless, even the paying of the dividend by the Onomea Company having no attractive influence for the securities of that company. Hutchison has come in for some little attention and prices have shown a gradual hardening. Sales were made as high as $13 with a bid for more at this price but with no stock obtainable. Bids for the shares of the American Bank and Trust Company have been raised to $110 but holders are not inclined to accept this figure. In bonds Los Angeles Railway 5 per cents have come into favor and several thousand dollars' worth have changed hands as high as $119. Sacramento Electric Gas and Railway bonds held up well at $116 bid and $116.50 asked although no large sales were consummated.

Oil Notes

The sixteen wells of the Sterling Oil Company now in operation are capable of delivering 3,000 barrels of oil a day, including the royalty from Vest and Sovereign. All the capital stock of the company has been issued, and the dividend is $5,000 for May. A similar amount is to be payable in June. The product of the company has been well contracted for and as high as 15 carloads in a day have been shipped from the fields.

On Tuesday the Imperial Oil Company paid a dividend of 20 cents a share amounting to $20,000, and on the same day Thirty-three Oil Company paid one of 10 cents a share, amounting to $10,000.

The stockholders of the Associated Oil Company will hold a meeting on July 7th to vote on a proposition to create a bonded indebtedness of $5,000,000, to be secured by mortgage upon or deed of trust of all the property of the corporation owned or to be acquired by it.

The inquiry on the part of Oil investors shows a constant improvement, and bidding on the Exchange during the past week has been quite active. Sales have been more extensive and prices have ruled firm with somewhat of an upward tendency. Sterling shares have led in point of demand, selling from $1.70 to $1.80 according to terms. Sovereign held attention and quite a few lots changed hands at steady rates. Kern shares commanded $5 while San Joaquin Development Company's stock brought $7.50. Reports from the fields continue to show favorable features and with the increased demand for fuel purposes, values for all stocks listed are well sustained.

The directors of the newly incorporated City and County Bank of this city have organized and elected A. J. Lowenberg, president; L. V. Merle, vice-president, and A. J. Tonne, secretary and cashier. The bank has secured its charter and will soon be licensed. Business operations are expected to be begun by July 1st.

The stockholders of the Mercantile Trust Company of San Francisco at their annual meeting re-elected the board of directors as follows: Wakefield Baker, William Babcock, Warren D. Clark, George Crocker, W. F. Detert, F. G. Drum, M. H. Hecht, E. W. Hopkins, W. G. Irwin, D. O. Mills, James D. Phelan, N. D. Rideout, Claus Spreckels, H. T.Scott and Frederick W. Zeile. The officers also re-elected were as follows: President, Frederick W. Zeile; vice-president, N. D. Rideout; cashier and secretary, John D. McKee. The report of the year's business was very satisfactory. The capital of the corporation is $1,000,000 full paid, and undivided profits $270,000. —The Financier

Houghton's Dinner

To wed or not to wed again—that is the problem with which I am confronted day after day. Shall I, or shall I not? My aunt says I am a fool if I do not. She has had three husbands and at sixty survives the last. Each died and left her a moderate fortune. The moderate fortune multiplied by three gives her a comfortable income. She toils not, neither does she spin. She is in Paris now and writes me to come and visit her. With a husband, if I will; if not, she will find me one. But I like my liberty and don't see why I should resign it. It is odd the interest one's friends take in one's concerns. Odd, and uncalled for. Now, there is Margaret. She said to me today: "Why don't you marry, Pauline? You're absurd to live alone when you might have a husband by just the lifting of an eyebrow."

"Who is he?" I asked, "show me the man and—perhaps."

"You know well enough," said Margaret.

"Well, my dear," I returned, "if I do, it may not be the one you mean."

"Rory Gwinn," said Margaret.

"Oh, that!" I exclaimed, "nonsense! Fancy me surrendering my liberty to that great, selfish creature. My dear, I've been the slave of one man. You don't catch me becoming the slave of another."

"Well, then, Pauline," said Margaret, "I think you might be more generous."

"Explain, my dear."

"You let him hang about you and give you flowers and—and—well, don't you see, there might be some girl who would like a chance at him if you don't want him."

A light flashed upon my darkened understanding.

"Oh, if that is the case," I said, "Margaret, why don't you encourage Rory a little bit?"

But Margaret flounced out of the room, the first time I have ever seen her calm exterior ruffled. It can't be that Margaret is interested in Rory Gwinn. If she is, Heaven pity her.

* * * * * * * * * *

As Hardy says, it was a mistake to have been born at all, and life is different from all other shows, in that elsewhere one may go out if the play is too dull or too long, but in this we must stay until lights are out. I suppose good breeding demands that, since we cannot make our exits without disturbing the people around us. But they won't let us go quietly under any circumstances, so they ought to be glad to let us out early and settle down to more pleasure for themselves without having to watch us. I feel blue today, I don't know why. I wonder why I live. What good do I do in this world? I asked the Professor that, when he was here to lunch, and he answered: "Why, you look pretty, of course. You set before me a good lunch like this." That's like the Professor. He loves to eat, and he likes my housekeeping. He thinks he loves me, but he doesn't. He would not care for me if I did not set a good lunch before him. I feel suicidal this afternoon.

* * * * * * * * * *

Rory dined with me. It was just the two of us, for Margaret and Tiny, whom I half expected would drop in, did not come. Rory lost his head a little bit—we had champagne. He said my beauty dazzled him, but I know it was the wine. Though I did look rather well in my white frock, demi-decollete and demi-sleeves. Rory is a handsome fellow. I wish I could lose my heart to him. I followed his lead and lost my head a little, too. When we had liqueurs in the library, I'm afraid our flirtation approached the serious. Poor Margaret!

* * * * * * * * * *

The disenchantment is complete this morning. I took a ride in the Park, and came home to jump into my tub. The ride and the bath cleared my head of the cobwebs. But I'm afraid I'll have to go away. Poor Rory! Last night may have given him hopes that I can never fulfill. If I go away Margaret can catch his heart—possibly—in the rebound.

* * * * * * * * * *

That cat, Margaret's grandmamma, called on me today. She said all manner of nasty things to me, disguised in sugar and honey as is the way with these society tabbies. Insinuated that I was going too far, that I had leapt the wall of convention and was galloping through the field of impropriety that might land me—anywhere.

"I knew your dear mother," she purred, "so you won't take it unkindly, Pauline, that I give you this advice."

I understand madame la grandmere. She is keeping an eye out for her granddaughter's interests. Ah, but I'll settle her bill for her!

* * * * * * * * * *

The Professor and I were standing on the veranda of the clubhouse this morning, when we heard voices within. It was impossible not to listen.

"How's your affair going on with the little widow?" asked one.

"Yes, we saw you emerging from her domicile the other night," said another.

There was no audible answer from the person addressed. The banter continued. I was idly wondering who "the little widow" was, when a voice I could not mistake exclaimed:

"Oh, shut up! You know very well it's only a flirtation."

"Ah, but suppose she is taking it au serieux?"

"She isn't. You don't understand."

"I'll bet you marry her inside of six months."

"You'd lose."

I did not wait for any more. That was enough. How disgusting men are, to bandy words about women among themselves. But I wonder why Rory said, "You'd lose"? He seemed rather sure of success the other night. Perhaps he saw me with the Professor. After all, I think I'll let the flirtation go on.

* * * * * * * * * *

I felt in a diable of a mood this morning. I cried an hour after breakfast. Oh, it's horrible to be lonely—to think there is not a soul in the world who really cares whether one lives or dies. There's the Professor; he might miss my luncheons. Margaret might drop a tear or two on my coffin. She hasn't been to see me since that day I angered her, but she would come to my funeral. I know I'd make a striking corpse. I always look my best in white. They'd bury me beside my late beloved. Poor Ned, I suppose he loved me after his fashion, but it wasn't the way I long to be loved. 'Tis a sad thing we never had any children. It might have changed him. As it was he nearly beggared us both by bestowing his affection on blooded horses. If Death hadn't pulled him up in time, his extravagances would have taken our last hundred thousand to clear the atmosphere of debts. Then there's Rory—would he miss me? I believe the poor boy would kill himself on my grave. 'Tis almost frightful to be loved as Rory loves me. I have to keep even the paper knives out of his reach sometimes, he gets so wild.

* * * * * * * * * *

Heigho! In the midst of my megrims the telephone bell rang. It was that nice creature Houghton, Ned's chum for years.

"Will you dine with me today, Pauline?" was his message; "I'm in town for two days, and want to blow in a couple of hundred on some nice little woman."

"A deux?" I answered.

"Of course. Don't you know me well enough for that?"

"Where?"

"Pierre's."

"Time?"

"Seven and—you know the kind of dinner that I mean," he added.

I thought I had heard that before, but I answered:

"Very well. Call for me."

Houghton is one of those men who have been everywhere, know everything and who save one the trouble of thinking what next. I knew he would regale me with delicious stories. One of the nice things about being a widow is that one can listen—and laugh at stories that have a point to them. Even a wife does not dare to betray too much knowledge. I knew the kind of dinner Houghton meant would be a delightful dissipation, and that I

I loved my liberty so well that when Rory called I gave him a sharp lecture on his misdoings. I told him he wasted too much time dawdling about me, and the best thing he could do was to stop flirting and go and ask some sweet young girl to marry him.

"But suppose she won't have me?" he asked.

"Ask her, anyway—and leave the rest to the gods."

"By Jove! I will," he exclaimed, and I expected to see him fall on his knees at once. But he didn't. Just as well. I was in no melting mood.

Shortly after Rory's departure, the Professor called. He seemed to have something on his mind. I rallied him on his abstraction and then he confessed.

"I've followed your advice, Madame Charming," he said.

"Going to invest in real estate?"

"That's half of it."

"Europe? That's good."

"One-fourth. Oh, I might as well tell you. We're going to be married next month. You always said she was the nicest girl you knew."

You might have knocked me down with a quill.

Just as I was dressing for the kind of a delightful dinner that a dinner with Houghton meant, Rory burst into my boudoir and gave me a rousing kiss on the lips.

"You are the dearest woman in the world," he cried, "if it hadn't been for you I'd never have thought of it."

"What is it?" I asked.

"I'm going to be married. She loves me."

Oh, so Margaret caught the heart in the rebound, I thought, and I said:

"Why, Rory, that's good. I'm so glad you and Margaret have made it up."

"Margaret? Oh, no, Pauline, it's Tiny. I always liked Tiny—and you know she looks something like you—"

That little, thin blonde resembling me! It took my breath away for the minute.

So I threw my lovers into the arms of my girl friends, and never knew. They say widows are sharper than adze-edges, but sometimes we're duller than a Barlow knife. I cabled to Auntie that I'd meet her in London next month. Thought perhaps a trip abroad would brighten my wits.

* * * * * * * * * * *

Well, I've changed my mind. That dinner with Houghton was so refreshing. I like Houghton. I won't go to Europe. Houghton has some capital ideas about domestic life. He says there is nothing better than the Frenchman's idea of how a wife's interest in domesticity should be kept up. I asked him what the Frenchman's idea was. He told me that the Frenchman believes that a husband should be a lover to his wife, and that to keep up the illusion he should give her an occasional dinner just like the one we had.

STAGE

Cashman's Unpremeditated Hit

The brightest line in "The Singing Girl" was not in the original book of the opera written by Harry B. Smith. It was improvised and interpolated last Monday night at the Tivoli revival by that spontaneous comedian, Mr. Harry Cashman. The hit of the first-night production was made by Mr. Cashman in the second act. He riveted the attention of the audience on his person for more consecutive minutes than any comedian ever succeeded in doing before. Hartman was in the scene, too, but Cashman took all the "fat" away from the leading comedian and held the centre undisputed. And yet he didn't half try. Indeed he suddenly became of a retiring nature, and his face was suffused with blushes so unremitting were the attentions of the audience. It was probably the first time on any stage that a comedian blushed, but the situation was embarrassing. It all happened in this way. Cashman saw a pin on the stage, and being superstitious he was impelled to stoop and pick it up. Now that is a risky thing to do in the presence of a large audience when a man has on tight-fitting silk trousers. In this instance it was also risque, but fortunately the threatened denouement came not. The weakest seam in the red silk trousers asserted itself. It made itself visible to the naked eye, and at the same time revealed the fleshy part of Mr. Cashman's leg. And it was his left leg and the seam was the inside one. The ripping sound could be distinctly heard as far back as the box-office. Mr. Cashman gasped, and the whole audience with one accord rubbered. The seat of the disturbance became the "cynosure of all eyes." The audience roared. When Mr. Cashman recovered from the shock he interpolated his line. He said, "If I stoop again it will be all off." The audience roared again. Fully ten minutes elapsed before Mr. Cashman could get behind the scenes and pull on a pair of white trousers. After Cashman came Annie Meyers. This popular soubrette never appeared to greater advantage than she does as the singing girl in the Smith and Herbert opera. And the Tivoli production does not suffer by comparison with that of the Neilsen company. On the contrary the performance at the Tivoli is even more refreshing than was the old one at the Columbia, for it is not handicapped by a star. It is a well balanced performance, and the choruses are particularly effective. The fine German hand of Mr. Steindorff, who knows the opera so well that he leads without a score, is in evidence throughout. Arthur Cunningham is a fine figure as the Duke but his rich baritone would be heard with greater satisfaction if the basso songs were transposed. Frances Graham hasn't much to do as Marie, but her one song is given with the artistic finish which makes her well-rounded contralto so charming. And as for Harold Gordon he far surpasses Mr. Ling of the Nielsen company as Count Otto. The Tivoli has rare talent in Mr. Gordon. With Hartman, Webb and Cashman to work on the risibles of an audience there is nothing lacking in the comic element.

The Newest American Play

"When the Heart Was Young" reminds me of a trunk packed in a hurry. You get everything in and then when you fancy it's about time to slam down the lid and click the lock you discover the main necessities of your wardrobe have been left out. Bits of all kinds of plots, familiar characters of all shapes and sizes, are packed within the four acts, but the necessary linking of plots and characters has been crowded out. What strikes one in this herding of twenty-one characters and a dozen plots under one roof is that, like the dancing bear, the wonder was not in his manner of dancing but that he did it at all. It was a courageous deed for a playwright to try and please everybody by introducing all the favorite roles of "The Old Homestead," "Hazel Kirke," "Way Down East" and Shore Acres," with a glimpse of "The Girl I Left Behind Me." I should like to know for how much of "When the Heart Was Young" Charles Francis Bryant was responsible. When the play was first announced Mrs. Lotta Day Coleman was mentioned as the author. Later, Mr. Bryant was billed as her collaborator. But on the program and on the posters Mr. Bryant's name precedes Mrs. Coleman's. Perhaps he wishes he had not shouldered so much of the responsibility, or that he were able to pass the buck on to some lesser light. If Clay Greene had written "When the Heart Was Young" he would have eliminated the superfluous matter—the soldiers, for instance. They are nice enough soldiers, but they don't belong in a by gosh play. Indeed, what might have been a nice, homely pleasant rural heart drama has been inflated by verbiage and counterplot into an impossible thing. There are some rare moments of real charm, some sparse bits of genuine life, the scenery is beautiful—and that is all one can say for "the new American play." It will, however, please a good many who like this kind of drama and don't care whether the plot hangs well or not. Frank Bacon has a character part, old Silas, that suits him to a T, and Juliet Crosby as Rebecca Spicer is very clever. Aside from George Osbourne as the head of the family there is not any character calling for special mention. But this is the authors' fault; not that of the actors. The authors are like the old woman in the shoe. They created so many children they didn't know what to do with them, and so they just say a few words and then stand around.

When Nat Prompted John

John Drew, who comes to the Columbia next week close on the heels of Nat Goodwin, recalls an occasion when the latter helped him out of what might have been a predicament. It was in New York at the loving cup festival in honor of Joe Jefferson at the Garden theatre. A. M. Palmer, who was to have delivered an address with the cup to Jefferson, was unable to return to town in time and deputed John Drew to take his place. Drew wrote his speech but he did not have it at his tongue's end when the time came for its delivery. He confided his trepidation to Nat Goodwin, and the latter agreed to help him out. "I'll prompt you, John," said Nat, "and it won't be the first time I've acted as prompter, either." So Goodwin moved up close to Drew when the latter began his speech and prompted him to a happy finish.

Jefferson and Mrs. Drew

It was at this festival that Joe Jefferson introduced the mother of John Drew as his contemporary. He said: "It is just sixty-three years ago that I made my stage debut. I was only four at the time. But there was a child in the same company who is also here today." Then he turned and held out his hand to Mrs. Drew, who rose and stood by his side, while Mr. Jefferson added: "Here you see two children who have withstood the alleged destructive influence of the stage."

At the Show Next Week

COLUMBIA—John Drew in "The Second in Command," by Captain Marshall. This pretty Boer-British love story captivated Eastern audiences and will presumably do the same here.

GRAND OPERA HOUSE—Edward Harrigan's third week. "Reilly and the 400," the play to be presented, had a run of two years at Harrigan's (now the Garrick) theatre in New York. In this play appeared the original "tough girl."

ALCAZAR—"Lost—Twenty-four Hours," the play in which Robert Hilliard made one of his greatest successes. A finished prevaricator is the central figure; his glib tongue makes the plot.

TIVOLI—Second week of "The Singing Girl," which has scored a hit.

FISCHER'S—Sixth week of "Fiddle Dee Dee." Nobody can predict the end of its run as the house is packed every night.

ORPHEUM—Lew Sully, the laughing monologuist; Mr. and Mrs. Alfred Kelcy, in a new travesty "A Trial Performance"; Mlle. Chester's statue setter, the ten thousand dollar canine beauty, just from London and Paris; James F. Kelly and Dorothy Kent in a new skit, "Ginger Snaps"; Julia Heinrich, Raymond and Caverly, Thomas and Hall, and the biograph.

When Charles Millward, the Alcazar's new leading man who measures six feet one and is said to be an Adonis, reaches here, the Belasco-Thall forces will have two of the handsomest leading men in the country. Earl Browne has already won his way and is provoking invidious comparisons with M. L. Alsop who is too sedate to please the matinee girl. The Alcazar will produce "The Brixton Burglary" week after next. This piece made a hit in London.

James Horne would rather fulfill his duties as assistant treasurer than to act, but he was pressed into service on the stage this week. His part of Ike Partington is similar to that of Peck's bad boy that he had a few weeks ago, and he makes a good deal out of it, both dramatically and vocally.

Julia Heinrich's songs at the Orpheum next week will include "A Summer Night," "Send Me a Lover, St. Valentine" and "Oh, that we Two were Maying."

Florence Roberts with White Whittlesey, Charles Wyngate, some stunning new gowns and "Zaza" will open at the Alcazar in June.

"Maggie Murphy's Home" is one of Dave Braham's charming songs that is sung in "Reilly and the 400." —The Playgoer.

The Elks, than whom no better beneficiary organization in a fraternal way exists in San Francisco, will hold a great big jubilee at the Grand Opera House on the night of Tuesday, May twentieth. The program will be a good one, consisting of Mr. Harrigan and his company, the best bits from the Orpheum and the Tivoli aggregation. Such a show has seldom been gathered together in this city.

"VACATION, 1902."

A charming little brochure has been issued by the California Northwestern Railway, giving interesting information about our State's vacation places. The little book is profusely illustrated. San Rafael, Belvedere, Petaluma, Santa Rosa, the Russian river resorts, and many beautiful camping spots are pictured. These all lie along the route of what is well termed "the picturesque route of California." Should you desire one of these little booklets or any other information regarding the place to spend your summer's vacation, address R. X. Ryan, General Passenger and Freight Agent, Mutual Life Building, California and Sansome streets, who will give your communication prompt and careful attention.

A Sea Mystery

Andrew Lang pokes fun at the kind of ghosts that Bram Stoker writes about and finds all kind of fault with their working parts, but to the rest of the world who are not on the same hail-fellow terms with the inhabitants of spookland, Stoker's creations, if they are not exactly what one can call realistic, are quite convincing enough to call up cold chills and goose-flesh at unexpected sights and sounds in the small hours. Except the collections of short stories written by Ambrose Bierce, or some of Poe's weird conceptions, I know of nothing to compare with "Dracula," which, if anything, would answer Thomas Hardy's demand for "a nice, ghastly, hair-on-end story." "The Mystery of the Sea" is less gruesome than "Dracula," but it abounds in the unexpected and the supernatural. It is a story of modern times in a Scotch fishing village, but the beginnings lie back nearly four centuries and the centre of interest is in the discovery of an enormous amount of treasure secreted by one of the officers of the Spanish Armada in the times of the Good Queen Bess. The fortune was a trust for a specific purpose and when the great fleet was destroyed and the object abandoned the treasure was hidden by the Spanish grandee until circumstances should favor its restoration to the owner. He made it an hereditary trust for his descendants, descending to the eldest male heir in each generation unless it were assumed by some other of the family, and the history, descriptions and directions necessary for fulfilling the obligation were passed down from father to son through the means of the Baconian bi-literal cypher, applied to certain chapters of an old English book of laws. At the time of the opening of the story the chapter containing the important information had been missing from the book for more than a century and no trace of it could be found; the Spanish family had dwindled till there was left but a single representative. The missing documents had accidentally come into the possession of a young Englishman who had deciphered them, and the castle owned by the last representative of Don Bernardino de Escoban was leased to an American heiress, a lineal descendant of the brother of Sir Francis Drake, who, in addition to her hereditary hatred of the Spanish, was an intensely patriotic American. As the time is 1898, the beginning of the Spanish-American war, and Marjory Drake has just presented a cruiser fully armed and manned to the government, her attitude toward the Spaniard and his trust are obvious. This is merely a point to which the rest of the story clings. It would be impossible for any amount of disclosure of a plot to tell a Bram Stoker story, for none but the author is capable of doing that. There are plots within plots, hair-breadth adventures and escapes, secret passages and strange sights; second sight and spae wives come in frequently, and whole processions of ghosts. There are pirates and secret police, and man o' warsmen engaged at one time or another, but what they are doing or what is the end and upshot of all the complications the reader must find out for himself. It is questionable whether many will take the trouble to study out the rules for the bi-literal cypher or take more than a passing interest in the various uses to which it was put. They will accept the results without troubling themselves to understand the means. There are times when one could wish the author had given more attention to his style, particularly in the matter of dropping modifiers in between the parts of his verbs, but in a tale so absorbing one scarcely takes time to note blemishes of mere diction or arrangement. It would add to the interest in following out the action if the book were furnished with a map such as the one accompanying Frank Norris's "Octopus" or Thomas Hardy's "Return of the Native." "The Mystery of the Sea" begins on the front cover. The apparently arbitrary marks which form the decorative margin have a sequence and meaning and those who find the Baconian cypher beyond them may count on better success here. It is just easy enough to lead one and just hard enough not to be "plain as print." [Doubleday, Page & Co., New York.]

A Montauk Maiden

"The Maid of Montauk" does not belong to the category of "interminable Colonial romances," for though it treats of the times of the early settlement of America, the author, Forest Monroe, has chosen an unhackneyed period and told a good tale without waste of words in unending descriptions of mere turnip patches. The Maid of Montauk is the sole survivor of the wreck of a small vessel in which she has crossed the Atlantic with her father, only to be wrecked on the shore of America, and cut from the spar to which she had been lashed by a Montauk Indian who takes her home to his tribe. Partly on account of their friendship with the English, but also influenced by a charm in the form of an arrow-head which the girl wears and to which she as well as they attribute supernatural qualities, she is kindly treated, and remains amongst them a willing captive. The event occurs during the rivalry between the Dutch and English colonists for the possession of Long Island, and at the time of one of the inter-tribal wars, supposed to have been brought about through the agency of the Dutch who, having failed to attach all the Indians to their cause, next attempt to annihilate those who are friendly with the English. The raid of the Narragansetts and the carrying off of the women and children on the marriage night of the chief's daughter, and the arrangement for their ransom are substantially true to history. Lyon, or as he himself preferred to write it,

Lion Gardiner, was one of the remarkable men of the early history of the colonies and it is surprising that during the vogue of the historical romance he has not been seized on before and made not an incidental character but the hero of some of the more pretentious tales of the early times. He came to America under contract with Lord Say and Seal, in 1635, to build a fort at Saybrook, but remained over at Boston to erect military works there, from whence he proceeded to his place in Connecticut. He was the father of the first English child born in the Connecticut colony, and the first English settler and father of the first English child born in New York. Time and again he succeeded in keeping the peace between whites and Indians, and had his advice been followed, some of the bloodiest chapters of New England history would never have been written. Gardiner's Island, purchased from the Indians and afterward confirmed by grant from the English, was made a Lordship, and the proprietors of it were the only real American lords. Gardiner's Island has been in the possession of the family for close upon three hundred years and during all that time not a foot of the ground has been owned by any one not a member of the family nor has any one other than servants or tenants resided there. Under the title "An American Lordship." George Parsons Lathrop contributed a most interesting paper to the Century Magazine for December, 1885, which is well worth reading in connection with "The Maid of Montauk." I do not know of any other account which gives so much that is pertinent in the same compact form. Besides the descriptions of Indian life and customs, and the narration of some pretty legends and folk-lore tales, there is in the first chapter an account of a New Year's reception at the house of Governor Stuyvesant. Where there is so much to commend it is a pity to find any fault, and yet one cannot but wonder whether the earth itself will endure so long as the error of speaking of "running the gauntlet." Casting down the mailed glove or gauntlet was a challenge to defend a dispute or difference of opinion by engagement in mortal combat and a very different matter from running the gauntlet as a punishment for an offense. [William R. Jenkins, New York.]

In the French Tongue

Number twenty-two of Contes Choisis, a library of choice French fiction, has just been issued. The present volume, entitled "Le Morceau de Pain" consists of three short stories by Francois Coppee, with explanatory English notes by G.Castegnier. It is needless to state that these little stories are in the best style of contemporary French fiction. They are tales of sacrifice. "Le Morceau de Pain" is a sketch of the Franco-Prussian war, "Le Remplacant" tells of a reformed convict who might be termed a Jean Valjean in miniature, and "Les Vices du Capitane" relates in lighter vein the self-denial of a retired officer in order to maintain a crippled child who excites his pity. The stories have not only a literary value but they are lofty and pure in moral tone. The little book is well printed and of a convenient size, and is suitable either for the class-room or for the general reader. The English notes are deserving of all praise, since they really explain, are short and easy to find. [William R. Jenkins, New York.]

MUSIC

Music in Oakland

At the annual pupil recital of D. P. Hughes the program, though a little too long, was choice and its rendition delighted the ear and satisfied the judgment. A group of two quartets was given by a ladies' quartet—Miss Johnson, Mrs. McMurray, Mrs. Wasley and Mrs. Juillerat—their singing evidencing careful practice. Horatio Cogswell, who has appeared at many of Oakland's concerts, gave Rubinstein's "Since First I Met Thee," and "Gypsy John" which he sang with much spirit. Mr. Cogswell has a naturally fine voice which has attained a delightful smoothness and breadth. Mr. Charles Poulter, also a favorite singer, gave an artistic rendition of the difficult Liszt "Lorelei." The fourth number, a trio "The Mariners" by Randegger, was delightfully sung by Miss Virginia Pierce, W. A. Hunter tenor and W. H. Baldwin basso. Miss Pierce, who is the daughter of Mrs. J. M. Pierce the soprano, has a pure, limpid soprano voice of not great volume yet as she is still in her teens, but of sweet musical flexibility which will later develop into brilliancy. As this was Miss Pierce's debut in public she was much complimented on her successful part. Miss Margaret Davis, who had already attracted much attention by her accompaniments, rendered the "Tannhauser" march. She is a pianiste of temperament, imagination and enthusiasm, adding a rich color and feeling to a resplendent technique. As an encore she played a Chopin prelude with an interesting sense of gradation, evidenced in the long crescendos and diminuendos, and solid, well-applied strength for the heavy parts. "Star vicino al bel Idol" (Rosa) and Grieg's "Sunshine Song" were sung by Mrs. Wasley who has a contralto voice of very extended range. Robert Hughes possesses a musical baritone which he used with artistic effect in two Lassen songs, "Fairest Vision of My Soul" and "I Think of Thee." But Mr. Hughes must be a little more animated ere he startles his audiences with his musical abilities. Bizet received a fine interpretation by Mrs. Orrin Kip McMurray, in her song, "Je dis qu rien ne m'eponvante." Mrs. McMurray, who made her debut as Amy Hickox, has a large, full-toned soprano voice, of which study and experience have given her complete control. Miss Juillerat sang a "Religious Scene" (Goring Thomas) which displayed a marvelous memory, and also a luscious contralto voice. Miss Lawson sang Denza's "May Morning" with such fine tone and enunciation that she was recalled three times. W.H. Baldwin gave the ever popular song of "Hybrias the Cretan" (Elliott) in good style. Miss Julia Johnson, who has sung her way into Oakland's musical heart with her clear and sweet soprano voice, sang the difficult Polonaise from "Mignon" as it has rarely been done in Oakland or San Francisco. One other Oakland singer would be her only rival in this brilliant performance, Mrs Beatrice Priest Fine, who so often made this her piece de resistance on her concert programs. The wonderful variations of Proch showed the fine voice of Mrs. J. Llewellyn Williams and as she sang so surely, with such ease and limpidity, Mrs. Carrie Brown Dexter's vocalism was brought to mind. Mrs. Williams received the heartiest applause of the evening. The quartet from "Rigoletto" gave Mr. Hunter his one opportunity to show his sweet pure tenor, of exceptional range. The opening solo was accurately given without any Russo eccentricities and the quartet went with a superb dash, Mrs. McMurray, Miss Juillerat and Robert Hughes taking the other parts. Perhaps for tenderness and pathos the gem of the evening was the ladies' quartet "Margarita" (Hawley).

The recital given recently by the students of the California Conservatory of Music, and briefly referred to last week, was a decidedly interesting affair. The work of Miss Amy Peterson in the Chopin etudes and the Scharwenka staccato study was wonderful for a miss in her teens. Miss Peterson also played the violin part in a violin concerto. Miss Lydia Reinstein gave a sympathetic rendering of her Rubinstein and Chopin numbers, namely the "Kammenoi Ostroi" and a Polonaise. Miss Josie Coonan played a McDowell study and "La Jongleuse" of Mozkowski. Miss Lily Hansen gave the Romanza from Chopin's Concerto in E minor in a finished and artistic manner. Two little pupils, Miss Cecil Cowles, aged eight and Miss Lily Blum, aged ten, contributed respectively Handel's "Harmonious Blacksmith" and a Haydn theme with variations. Mr. Harry Factor gave an acceptable rendering of the allegro in the Mendelssohn concerto on the violin accompanied by Mrs. Nathan Landsberger on the piano. The recital deserves especial mention not only for the unusually high character of the selections but also for the surprising maturity of comprehension shown by the young performers.

Miss Cornelia Mae Little, who left San Francisco five years ago to study with Miss Anna Miller Wood in Boston, returned to this city a few days ago and will reside here permanently. Miss Litle was the contralto soloist of the Unitarian church in Milton, Mass., in which city, as in Boston, she is favorably known as a concert soloist.

The San Francisco Conservatory of Music, of which E. S. Bonelli is director, will give a concert in Metropolitan hall on May twenty-first on which occasion a very interesting program will be rendered. The affair will be invitational, and cards of admission may be obtained at the conservatory, 301 Jones street.

The cantata "Esther" was presented in New York on the seventeenth and eighteenth of April under the auspices of the Young Women's Guild of the Harlem Presbyterian church. The part of Zerish was sung by Miss Josephine Beatty, who is very well known in musical circles of Los Angeles and Santa Monica.

Vincent de Arrillaga, son of the organist of the Spanish church in this city, who has been studying the piano in Chicago during the past three years, is now in London. Mark Hambourg, the renowned pianist, states that the young man possesses much talent. —The Music Critic

OTHER PEOPLE'S IDEAS.

From "Beatrice Cenci"—Guerazzi:

Count Cenci: "To love is human; to allow ourselves to be conquered by blind passion belongs to brutes."

"Desire always travels with her pockets filled with cotton, in order to stuff the ears of conscience so as not to feel her sting."

"Youth, desire and hope form a chain, within which an honest and passionate soul often debates, but seldom breaks; if excitement is then added, no human power can resist it."

"In parents there exists, I will not say without their knowing it, but without confessing it even to themselves, a certain emulation in the love of their children, which is usually manifest thus. Mothers make themselves to be loved by their daughters in preference to the father, and even the boys, too, when they are weak and ill; but when health is vigorous within them, fond of open fields or the noise of cities, they detach themselves by degrees from the mother, and draw nearer to their father."

"Bread! a magnetic needle which leads more beastily than beasts themselves, the flock of Adam's children. Bread! a daily food, which men either more unhappy or lower than brutes, too often know not how to procure without crime or without shame. Bread! a stone that necessity ties to the neck of every noble sentiment, to sink it in an abyss of evil. It surely was great wisdom to insert in the Lord's Prayer a request to God to give us our daily bread; but as we sometimes find it is not always heard, it might be of great use to add these other words: And if thou canst not, or dost not wish to give us bread, give us at least the fortitude to starve without shame. Nevertheless man does not wish to starve and spreads shame upon his bread like butter; nor does it seem to disturb his appetite, or spoil his digestion."

Count Cenci: "Remember that God is not scrutinized but worshiped; and every man should be as a God to his servants and subjects."

Farinaccio: "The strongest tie which can keep men bound together is the one of debt, for three ropes keep the knot fast, the benevolence of the creditor for the debtor, the hope of deriving a larger profit from him, and the fear of losing both interest and principal."

Lady Lucrezia: "Why do we feel within us so strongly the instinct of life?"

Beatrice: "This in my opinion, was a providence of nature; otherwise human creatures would feel the desire of destroying themselves so much, that the aim of creation would fail."

"Neither the purple robe of a Cardinal, nor respect for a friend, can prevent love from entering the breasts of men, but they can and sometimes do prevent its breaking the bounds of honesty."

From "The Tempting of Father Anthony" by George Horton:

"In general, the man who offers to pray for another is assuming too much as to his own standing with the Throne of Grace. Two-thirds of the people who pray for others are interceding for better men than themselves."

From "The Conqueror," by Gertrude Atherton:

Hamilton: "It is a harsh doctrine that men grow wicked as they improve and enlighten their minds. Experience has by no means justified us in the supposition that there is more virtue in one class of men than in another. Look through the rich and poor of this community, the learned and the ignorant—where does virtue predominate? The difference indeed consists not in the quantity, but kind of vices which are incident to various classes; and here the advantage of character belongs to the wealthy. Their vices are probably more favorable to the prosperity of the State than those of the indigent; and partake less of moral depravity."

OUR OPINION

The Catastrophe in the Antilles

Mount Pelee has established a fearful record as a destroyer of human life. In all history there is no record of such a terrible catastrophe as that which visited the Lesser Antilles on Thursday of last week, completely annihilating a whole city, and with unparalleled suddenness plunging thirty thousand terror-stricken people into eternity. It is a harrowing story, that of the torrent of burning lava rushing and roaring down the mountain side with lightning speed, shriveling humanity with its fiery breath and completely obliterating everything in its path. Even the descriptive powers of Lytton, given wide scope in his tale of Pompeii's destruction, failed to picture, with all the brilliancy of his imagination, such an awe-inspiring and thrilling spectacle as that in which the victims of Mount Pelee figured when its long silent crater began giving vent to the pent-up energy beneath. The simple accounts of the survivors surpass the most thrilling and shocking chapters in the whole realm of fiction. It was hard at first to realize the extent of the catastrophe, or to conjure an adequate idea of the appalling disaster, but the daily press was quick to arouse in behalf of the survivors the sympathy of the world, and from all quarters relief was soon being sent out. It became evident that those that had escaped from the wrath of Pelee would soon be threatened with starvation and disease, and for them relief expeditions must continue for some time. It was quite natural that such an unprecedented occurrence should have evoked the wise speculation of the scientists of the world. It is interesting to note that they know all about the causes of it. At first they explained that the terrible activity of Pelee was due to the earthquake shocks that preceded the eruption during several days. These temblors opened up crevices in the ocean bed, the waters rushed in, were converted into steam and then awakened the latent energy of the mountain. This was plausible enough until the wise men of London put on their thinking caps. These erudite gentlemen declared that the sun and the moon were responsible for the trouble. They discovered that at precisely the hour at which the mountain began its direful operations the relative position of the sun and the moon was at forty-five degrees. The immense force of the tangetical position acted directly on Mount Pelee. Hence the disturbance.

The Pension Evil

The city of Rochester, New York, inaugurated a civil pension system some years ago, for the benefit of the police and fire departments. The beneficiaries were called upon to contribute fifty cents a month each, while the general public, through taxation, added ten thousand dollars a year. At first all went swimmingly but at the present time the Rochesterians are face to face with the usual pension problem. Pensioners have been added to the list until the report of the last quarter, ending March third, shows more than twice as many beneficiaries as in the corresponding quarter of last year, and the questions before the community are whether the city shall add materially to the tax rates in order to help things along, or whether the members of the police and fire departments shall be called upon to increase their contributions, or whether the whole scheme shall be revised and pensions granted only to those who have been disabled in the discharge of their duties. The spectacle of pensions accumulating in the War Department ought to have given pause to any misguided municipality. There are now over a million pensioners on the national treasury with more to hear from, and a Revolutionary widow is now moving heaven and earth to have her allowance and that of others who are relicts of Revolutionary soldiers doubled. She was a blushing damsel of sixteen when she married an old man of over seventy years. Washington Gladden says his experience as a charity worker has taught him that pensions of all kinds are demoralizing. They tend to stamp out the sturdy manhood which should stand on its own feet and ask no aid from any quarter. The spectacle of one member of a community apparently getting something for nothing is sure to inspire others with a greed for gain without pain and the efforts which should be put forth towards earning a living by work are much more apt to be diverted into getting the best of the open-handed. From time to time we are treated to indications of a movement towards providing pensions for civil service appointees. There is not much danger that anything of the kind will ever be incorporated into our laws, but it is just as well to be on guard. People who have enjoyed a long tenure of public office under protection, at salaries better than the service would yield in private employment, should not be encouraged to feel themselves exempt from making some provision for old age out of their regular incomes. A government clerk does not render any extraordinary service and he is not any more useful in a community than a hod carrier or a stone mason. His duties do not endanger life or limb and he is not called upon to serve an arduous apprenticeship to fit him for his position. If there is any choice to be made in the matter, it is rather the mechanic who has paid his taxes, and taken his independent chance of dull times, defaulting employers, bad weather, and the hundred other drawbacks, who is deserving of assistance in his old age. In Europe, where salaries are barely more than enough for support, there may be some reason in pensioning state servants who have outlived their usefulness, but it is not in accord with American institutions to establish a bureau of charity in connection with the government. A pension based on an age of retirement is inevitably bound to become an incubus. Many men are better able at sixty to perform their duties than are others at forty. In order that the treasury should not be over taxed, it would become necessary to place the age of admission to civil employment very low, and that of retirement very high, for it is not especially edifying to see able-bodied men who have procured a competence for themselves by investment or speculation while enjoying a fat salary drawing down every month enough to keep a moderate sized family in comfort, and at the same time, probably keeping their names on the pay-roll of some private corporation. Pensions are supposed to be for the purpose of saving deserving but unfortunate employes from the humiliation of public or private charity in their old age. It is not calculated that those with plenty will still ask more, but though the Teachers' Retirement Fund of this city, like the pension funds of Rochester, is inadequate for the purpose for which it was established, and the needy pensioners must take less than they ought to receive, there are several wealthy ex-teachers who do not disdain the pittance. We were once treated to the comic spectacle of a Chief of Police retiring from his position, but finding that he had made a miscalculation and was not yet entitled to live in the lap of luxury, recalling his resignation until such time as he could become a tax-eater without rendering public service, and afterward becoming a bank director.

Our Coming Great Navy

President Roosevelt's hobby is the navy. Colonel Watterson calls him a bronco-buster and the Man in the Saddle, and he is frequently referred to as the Rough Rider, but if the President were to begin all over again he would seek to fit himself for the strenuous life on the sea rather than on the land. Like Lord Beresford he believes that the navy must be relied upon to safeguard his country's prestige and welfare in the future, and therefore he is more concerned about the affairs of our navy than with those of the army. He believes that the prime factor in securing victory over any foreign foe must be the navy, and that if that fails us we are doomed to defeat no matter what may be our material wealth or the high average of our citizenship. He is therefore preaching, at every opportunity, the prime importance for every patriotic American to see that the navy is built up and kept in the highest state of efficiency. Such is his enthusiasm in the matter that we may expect to see our navy make great strides in the next few years. There is no doubt that the President will receive the earnest co-operation of Congress and that there will be liberal appropriations for the building of ships of war, for our Captains of Industry are devoting a deal of attention to the subject of the merchant marine, and what they want they usually get. The war for commercial supremacy is now on, and there is no more important factor in that strenuous struggle than the merchant marine. It is growing rapidly, for our men of capital are reaching after bottoms to carry American goods and products into foreign ports, and they are not going to retard transportation or enrich others by resorting to the vessels of foreign companies Our merchant marine is destined to cover in a short time the waters of the Seven Seas, and we must have a navy strong enough to protect the ships carrying our goods to market.

The Military Pawn in Politics

The Republicans in Congress are doing a lot of protesting these days. Though they are in the majority, they are nevertheless on the defensive and they are making a sorry showing. And it is all due to the circumstance that they were eager for an inquiry into the conduct of the war in the Philippines. They started the investigation for political purposes, and now that the tables have been turned by the Democratic minority they are squealing with porcine persistency. They declare that the American army is being made the football of politics, and that it is shameful to asperse the men who are fighting for their country. They declare that we should not condemn Waller for shooting treacherous guides, but that we should think of the provocation suffered by the little band that struggled through the wilderness of Samar where no Spaniard had ever gone. "Let us remember the circumstances," they ask. And for the alleged tortures to which the Filipinos were subjected they demur to the indictment on the ground that the American soldier did the same things during the Civil War. But the Republicans started the investigation and it will do no harm. The Democrats in the Senate have outwitted the Republicans, and though the whole business has been forced into the posture of a political game, it may prove beneficial. The autocrats of the army must be reminded once in a while that they are subject to legislative control, and they should not object to criticism. If they were permitted to make war hell without a protest they would become a trifle too gay, and they might lose sight of the fact that the people were paying their salaries. It is dangerous to give the army too much latitude or to fail to remind it of its obligations.

Glad News for Grass Widows

A noteworthy decision was rendered by Mr. Justice Spencer of the Supreme Court of New York, last week, on the application of the son of a wealthy Amsterdam coal merchant to reduce the alimony he was paying to his divorced wife and to deprive her of the custody of her six year old boy, on the ground that she had been guilty of improper conduct. The alleged improper conduct consisted in posing for a certain picture not dressed in a high-necked gown, attending the French and Arion balls, becoming an actress and receiving attentions from young men. Judge Spencer denied the application. His decision is noteworthy because it asserts the principle that there is no presumption of wrong doing from facts which, although possibly open to criticism, are nevertheless consistent with absolute innocence. "The fact," said the court, "that Mrs. Van Buren is receiving attentions from various young gentlemen should occasion no surprise in view of the attractive personality depicted by the photographs presented. Properly viewed they presage nothing worse than an early marriage." Incidentally the court discussed the charge that the young woman had become an actress and joined the "Wild Rose" company, and he said: "That the plaintiff has chosen a profession difficult for a virtuous woman, especially one unprotected, as the plaintiff seems to be, weighs for something, but it cannot be denied that many good and noble women have been members of that profession, and it is hardly just to foreclose the plaintiff from such possibility." And as to the objectionable photograph he said that although it was "outre," it may have been taken because of the necessity which sometimes impels women in the profession chosen to have pictures taken which under other circumstances would be regarded as improper "No doubt," he added, "the motive in this instance was nothing worse than that which induces many college boat crews to exhibit photographs of themselves in scant attire." Private detectives hired to shadow the lady testified that she had visited a house of doubtful reputation. She denied having visited the house and the court declared that the "naivete and composure of her denial commanded his respect." Mr. Justice Spencer's reasoning is unusual, but what he wrote was pretty sound law. If evidence similar to that presented against the woman were introduced against a man it would not have any weight. Mr. Justice Spencer is a liberal-minded man, and an unconventional jurist. The lady in the case obtained an absolute divorce because of the wrongdoing of her husband, and the court virtually holds that in such cases the ex-wife becomes the mistress of her own time and actions, and has the privilege of receiving the attentions of new suitors. The defeated husband has no longer any legal right to complain. Courts usually favor the ex-husband in such cases, and it is manifestly unjust to do so.

The Saunterer

Mrs. Crocker's Neighbors

Burlingame is becoming too thickly settled for lovers of exclusiveness. Mrs. Will Crocker is going to move. Her present residence is in the heart of the Blingum settlement. It is almost within a stone's throw of the home of the Henry T. Scotts and it is not much farther from the Joe Grants. Mrs. Crocker declares that she has too many neighbors, and that she is going to move. I do not know whether she has any particular objection to Mrs. Scott, but I do know she is of the opinion that the swells of Blingum are becoming too gregarious; almost as much so as the less exclusive elite of Ross Valley whose homes face one another along a narrow highway. Mrs. Crocker's idea of a country home is a picturesque villa in the midst of broad acres, as remote from one's own set as from the polloi or the madding crowd. Her new home is to be erected on the south side of the Burlingame clubhouse and she will then be nearer to the Parrotts, who are perhaps the most exclusive people in all San Mateo county.

The Carolans, Too

The Carolans are also threatening to desert the knobby part of Burlingame, but I have not heard anything from them concerning their neighbors. They have merely shown a preference of late for the Corbitt place which they bought a short time ago. And notwithstanding the magnificent stable erected on the hill the Carolans may desert that location. The race course that William Corbitt owned belongs now to the Burlingame Club and the site of the old track has been utilized for the new polo grounds. The old Corbitt home could be made the scene for an up-to-date ghost story, for it was there the famous turfman committed suicide after he had been reduced almost to beggary. The Corbitt stock farm was one of the best appointed on the coast, but it was after building his private racecourse that the turfman's fortune began to fade.

When you ask for Jesse Moore Whiskey be sure you get it. Don't let anyone tell you they have something just as good.

Burlingame's Doom

And by the way, Burlingame is destined to lose its air of exclusiveness in the very near future. Its reputation for exclusiveness has begun to attract the attention of people not in the swim who can afford the luxury of a suburban home, and there are indications of a building boom being started in that locality in a very short time. The real estate boom is now on and lots are being sold at a brisk rate almost within the shadow of the clubhouse where the Crockers, the Newhalls, the Carolans, the Scotts, the Grants and the Tobins disport themselves. The polloi are preparing to shift their lares and penates to the erstwhile cowpaths of San Mateo county where for several years the swells have held sway. In the course of time, I suppose, when they find that they are being crowded too closely, the smart folks will move their golf-links farther back into the hills where they may felicitate themselves upon their exclusiveness.

The tendency of the times is indicated in a measure by the growing popularity of San Mateo as a summer resort. Such has been the demand for cottages down there that it is almost impossible at this late day to engage one for the summer. Moreover the Hotel Mateo is looming up as a possible rival of the Baron's hostelry in San Rafael.

Clark's First Experience

Walter Hobart is said to have obtained more than the purchase price of his San Mateo property. According to the story that is being circulated among the residents of the suburban village, he held out ten acres of land. In other words, the deed to the property didn't convey to young Clark the whole tract. Ten acres were omitted. Hobart is therefore in possession of a pretty good sized site for another home. The Montana millionaire should profit by the lesson which he received in his first business deal with a Blingum aristocrat. He will probably be more cautious in acquiring a stable of polo ponies. If he should fail to scrutinize each pony closely, the horse-traders of Blingum might work off an Arizona burro or two. So unremitting are some of the Blingumites in their attentions to young Clark these days that I suspect them of a desire to hand him a gold brick or sell him some oil stock.

Mrs. Parrott Ill

Mrs. Abby Parrott is very ill. Three physicians were in attendance at her bedside on Saturday night, when she was close to death's door. The passing of Mrs. Parrott would mean as sad a loss to many Californians as the recent death of Mrs. Tevis. San Mateo would especially miss her, for she has been the good angel there ever since the Parrott colony established itself in the county. She has been a bountiful giver, and her benefactions have brought cheer to many homes. She gave the land for the Catholic church in San Mateo, and contributed generously toward the cost of the edifice. Mrs. Parrott is the widow of the late John Parrott and one of the richest widows in the United States. Of her many children six are living. John, the only son, is well known as an amateur musician, horse owner and dilettante art patron. One of the daughters is Mrs. Robert Y. Hayne, wife of the well known attorney. One is the wife of A. F. Payson, of the Santa Fe railroad directory. Another is the wife of Joseph A. Donahoe, the banker. Mrs. A. Douglas Dick, a resident of Scotland, and Madame Auguste La Lande, who resides in France, are also daughters of Mrs. Parrott. One daughter, Mary, wife of Christian de Guigne, died not long ago and left three children.

A Wealthy Family

When the Parrott estate was incorporated the children received shares aggregating over two millions of dollars each, so they have never been dependent on their mother's bounty. Mrs. de Guigne was the only one of the daughters who ever cared for San Francisco society. When the De Guignes were in town, they usually opened the Parrott home in Sutter street and gave a ball or some sort of elaborate function. John Parrott spends most of his energy on musical composition. The husband of Mrs. Louis Parrott —who is the Mrs. Parrott of society—is only an offshoot of the parent stem.

When Louis Married

Twenty years ago, Louis Parrott was a coffee planter in Central America. During a trip East he met the charming woman who is now his wife. She was the belle of a Pennsylvania village, and her social experience had been confined to church functions and sleighing parties. But when she came a bride to California, she entered the Parrott holy of holies and was soon invested with that Vere de Vere repose which is characteristic of the Parrott clan. She is one of the most gracious women in society.

The Last of the Donohues

From London came the news in the despatches, a few days ago, of the serious illness of Peter Donahue. The name of Peter Donohue was once almost a household word in this city, but there are not many of the old-timers left who knew of the existence of the man who is said to be dying in London. With him will go the name of the famous Californian iron workers—Peter and James Donahue—the founders of the establishment now managed by the Scotts, and the men who made the building of the Oregon possible. James Donahue christened his son "Peter," and Peter, the father of the Baroness Von Schroeder, christened his son "James Mervyn." The Peter Donahue at present of London, England, is the surviving Donahue. Mervyn died without male issue and Peter is a bachelor and is now about fifty years of age. Years ago he was angled for by the match-making mammas of the swim, but he never took the bait. However, at one time it was thought that Ada Sullivan would become his bride.

He's a Papal Knight

Peter Donahue, whose serious illness has been reported, was born in Patterson, New Jersey, where his father had iron interests. He is known to his acquaintances here as the absentee Irish landlord, and the title probably pleases him for he affects the high Irish push of London. Indeed of late years he has been somewhat of an Anglomaniac, a species not uncommon among the so-called high Irish of San Francisco. He spends a lot of his time with the British Catholic aristocracy, and finds time occasionally to run across to Rome and take in St. Peter's and the Vatican, for, be it known, he is a Papal Knight and ranks himself with the nobility of Europe. But he is not a rollicking blade by any means, and has never threatened to squander his patrimony, though he is charitable and generous to the church. His nearest relatives are the Baroness Von Schroeder, the Burkes of Limerick, who are rich, and James O'Kane, an uncle of this city. Peter and the Burkes and the Donahoes of this city are owners of the Occidental hotel.

The stork is expected at the home of Mr. and Mrs. E. Valentine Schmidt, and his advent is awaited with happy anticipation.

A Cupid-Hymen Rumor

Blingum gossips are coupling the names of Olive Holbrook and Harry Stetson. It is not the first time the latter's name has been gossip-mated with that of an heiress. Before Ella Hobart became engaged to Charlie Baldwin, everybody would have it that she was going to marry Harry Stetson. Their mutual love of tennis and the proximity of their homes were the only grounds for what proved a bottomless rumor. This later report may have nothing more tangible to hold to, but it would be a most suitable match. Miss Holbrook is young, happy-tempered and fond of outdoor sports. So is Harry Stetson. Moreover they belong to the same firm, commercially speaking.

The Cheney Divorce

The news that Mrs. John Vance Cheney had sued for a divorce from her husband surprised no one more than her former pupils here. When the Cheneys lived here they were a very harmonious family. Mr. Cheney was librarian at the Free Public Library and spent his leisure hours writing poetry. Mrs. Cheney gave piano lessons, as she had heretofore done in Sacramento. She had invented a method combining Delsarte with ordinary piano technique and had quite a vogue among a select class of musical enthusiasts. Her pupils here banded themselves into a club which they called the Abby Cheney Amateurs, after their beloved teacher. "Harmony" was Mrs. Cheney's keynote in her teachings—harmony in body, soul and execution. Her system developed grace rather than strength, but was very successful from both the artistic and financial points of view. When Edmund Russell, the aesthetic demonstrator of Moscheles, came out here, Mrs. Cheney was the one who introduced him and gave him social backing.

An Indefatigable Worker

After she went from here to join her husband, who had been appointed librarian of the Newberry Library in Chicago, the glamour that had surrounded her seemed to vanish. Many who had believed in her began to think they had been hypnotized. They said her piano system was absurd and all sorts of things like that, which though they had whispered them before they now dared say aloud. In Chicago, Mrs. Cheney made a great impression at first. Her beauty, her gracious manner, her oracular utterances, all carried weight. But in time Chicago tired of the new prophet. Delsartean pianistics wearied them and the former disciples expressed their disapprobation by withdrawing their support. Then, while Mr. Cheney stayed in Chicago, his wife journeyed westward. The last I heard of her, before this divorce suit brought her into prominence, was when she was giving lectures on musical and art topics in Los Angeles. One of her two daughters died after the family left San Francisco. Both possessed unusual musical talent and the elder was very popular among the Amateurs. Among the latter, by the way, was Helen Curtis, now Mrs. Thomas Magee Sr., who is at present in London with her husband.

An Artist on the Stage

I hear that Mabel Williamson, one of the Sketch Club's artist members, has forsaken painting for the stage. Where she formerly dabbled with palette and tubes of oils she now manipulates grease paints. Miss Williamson exhibited some rather good works when she first returned here after pursuing her studies in one of the world's great art centres. But later, instead of striking out a new line of work for herself, she took a fancy to paint moonlights. The critics looked kindly at the pictures, but they could not help but see in them rather slavish imitation of Charley Peters' blues and greens. Miss Williamson's talent was there, but she gave it no chance to come out. Her friends say that she has really remarkable dramatic ability, and can act far better than she can paint. She will not be the only girl who has tried her artistic talents in two lines of work. Kuhne Beveridge did it. She went from clay modeling to the stage. However, Kuhne is modeling again now; her first love wooed her back again.

our society girls dress properly for the street. I have seen the Hopkins sisters shopping early in the morning attired as if going to a matinee, with foulard silk frocks, elaborate boas, gay hats and jewels. Before Mrs. Gus Taylor's marriage she was the most correctly tailored girl in her set but since then she has abjured quiet attire and rarely wears plain clothes.

Miss Violet Gratz-Brown writes from New York to her friends here that she expects to pay a visit to San Francisco in June. She has not been here since the death of her fiance, Fred Somers. His death was a sad blow to the beautiful young girl who had expected so soon to become his bride. Mr. Somers was many years older than his fiancee, but they were very congenial.

Stewart Coming Back

H. J. Stewart is soon to return to the fleshpots of Bohemia. Cultured Boston was all right for a change but the great organist longs for the society of his old friends and he has found that the pleasant associations of many years cannot be replaced. The news of his intention to return came in a letter to a friend a few days ago. He states that his contract with Trinity church, Boston, does not expire until September first, and that he has already notified the authorities that he does not wish to renew it, thereby giving them ample opportunity to find another organist. But they will find it hard to secure another Stewart, for he is one of the best organists in the country, and he met with great professional success in Boston. To his friend he wrote: "I suppose I lived too long in California ever to become reconciled to life elsewhere." He expects to be back by July first, believing that a successor may be engaged before that day.

It seems curious that an Englishman should grow tired of Boston, which is the most English city in the United States. But Dr Stewart is not the only one who has preferred San Francisco to either Boston or London. Bohemia will gladly welcome him for his mots and his music were much missed at the club jinks. Dr. Stewart possesses the knack of setting any kind of verses to music and his services were always in demand for everything in the line of melody from chants to ragtime. His fame as a composer is not, by the way, confined to the Bohemian Club or San Francisco. His church compositions are in the repertory of choirs in other cities, and his oratorio "The Nativity" was recently sung in Honolulu. I look to see his operas some day in the regular repertory of stock operatic companies. Their production was in every instance successful, but their popularity proved evanescent and not by any means commensurate with the merit of the works.

Where Social Prestige is Bought

"The sordid side of smart society in London," writes an occasional correspondent, "is becoming more conspicuous every day. But there is a growing sentiment against bartering in social advantages, and I hear that there has been talk of snubbing a certain distinguished woman who recently gave a social boost to a Californian family. 'The line has to be drawn somewhere,' is the remark that was made apropos of the introduction of the Californian family. But it has been a matter of every day occurrence to hear that Lady So-and-So is going to float Mrs. Dollars or uphold Mrs. Black Sheep. It is a well known fact that large sums have been received for presentations in desirable houses and for securing distinguished guests for dinner parties. But in a country where snobbery is so common I do not think there will be any great effort made to wipe out a practice which is so remunerative. Snobbishness, flunkeyism and toadyism are rampant in London, and it is all incomprehensible to a foreigner, and somewhat disgusting. A fair sample of the temperament responsible for this sort of thing is to be found in a book entitled "Hymns for the Coronation," dedicated by special permission to Their Majesties. The author who, I suspect, is Alfred Austin, adds another verse to the National Anthem:

With England's crown today,
We hail our King and pray:
God save the King.
Guide him in happiness,
Guard him in storm and stress,
Then in Thy Kingdom bless,
And crown our King.

Protest Against an American Invasion

All the hymns pray that King Edward may live as long as possible and may afterward enjoy a crown and throne in the Kingdom of Heaven. In one the hope is expressed that he shall have an Emerald seat in the next world, and a "rainbow at his feet." Then, there is another book, just out, written by the Reverend Baring-Gould. He assures the British that "we all have individually our part in the King." This is too cryptic for interpretation. He states that the Coronation confers grace and gives Divine help. I suspect Baring-Gould of a desire to become a Bishop. But the spirit of snobbery and flunkeyism isn't confined to the British. Once more there is talk of organizing a millionaires' club to be called the Anglo-American Club, and to limit its membership to millionaires. And yet a protest is being raised here against the provision in Cecil Rhodes' will from American scholarship at Oxford. One protestant calls it "Rhodes' scheme for the Americanizing of England." He declares that it is a grotesque project to pour into Oxford an annual horde of two hundred Yankees. He urges the Oxford colleges to close their gates against "so mischievous and undesirable an invasion."

How Norris Lost His Land

A correspondent takes me to task for having given the Tevis family a leading place in the social history of California. He declares that Lloyd Tevis was a Shylock, and that the fortune which enabled his family to shine was made in the money-lending business. That is true but the Tevises became social leaders despite the financial record of the head of the family. Money talks in society as it does everywhere else, and it doesn't matter how you made it so long as you have it. One of the first big pieces of property secured by Haggin and Tevis came to them through a loan. It was the forty-five thousand acre tract known as the Rancho del Paso near Sacramento. It was owned by a man named Norris who borrowed money from Haggin and Tevis at the usual ten per cent rate. The astute financiers soon owned the ranch. Their claim to the property was contested for a quarter of a century, but Lloyd Tevis was skilled in the art of hypnotizing the judiciary and in time he won the case. I have heard that Norris still lives and that he has accumulated a fortune in the Hawaiian Islands.

In this connection I am constrained to repeat the story of an episode in the life of General Thomas H. Williams, father of the popular turfman. Twenty-five years ago General Williams was worth eight million dollars, and if he had possessed the instincts of Lloyd Tevis he probably would have left twenty millions to his heirs. But Williams abhorred a money lender. However, being a Kentuckian, he condescended to associate occasionally with Tevis who was also from the Blue Grass state. One day Tevis entered Williams' office and submitted a proposition by which he could make a large sum of money on a loan. He explained that a certain operator in the money market was in need of three hundred thousand dollars, and had excellent security. "I haven't the full amount," he said, "but if you will put up half I'll go in with you."

"Tevis," said Williams, "you can't make a money-lender out of me. If your old Kentucky father knew of the proposition you have made to me, he would turn in his grave and curse you."

Williams invested his money in swamp lands and it shrunk four hundred per cent.

Mrs. Hearst's Building Fad

Ever since Mrs. Hearst put her finger in the Berkeley building pie she has had the architectural fever. Discussing the plans for the new college buildings with famous architects the world over has evidently inoculated her with the virus. Just at present Mrs. Hearst is only building three new homes but there are hints of others soon to be under hammer and saw. A mansion in Washington, a place on the McCloud and a home in Berkeley are now occupying Mrs. Hearst's attention. She has at different times owned two large houses in Washington both of which have been sold to foreign diplomatists. In this third attempt Mrs. Hearst hopes to realize her dream of architectural fitness. She will probably not occupy it for more than two months of the year but it must nevertheless dovetail with her ideals. The home on the McCloud river was originally planned for a rustic little lodge to run to for a breath of mountain air when Hacienda del Posa at Pleasanton becomes monotonous. But the plans have taken wings and so has the lodge, for instead there is to be a veritable chateau, commodious and commanding a magnificent view of Shasta. It is built on part of Charles Stetson Wheeler's place and will in twenty years revert to him. Mr. Wheeler was loath to sell any of his land and Mrs. Hearst favored that particular spot, not only on account of its natural beauty but because she is very fond of the Wheelers and wanted to be near them. So it was arranged that Mrs. Hearst should build a lodge which, in a score of years should become the property of the attorney. But instead of a bungalow Mr. Wheeler will have a fine house. Mrs. Hearst's Berkeley home will be on the north side of the university. She has taken a revolutionary step, for the south side has always had the seal of aristocratic approval. Her example will no doubt be followed, however, for Mrs. Hearst is a leader.

Provincialism Banished from Berkeley

Since Mrs. Hearst essayed the role of fairy godmother to the university and Benjamin Ide Wheeler accepted the presidency, large quantities of Berkeley provincialism have evaporated. Mrs. Hearst has entertained the students so frequently that they no longer show raw edges in society. President and Mrs. Wheeler have not concerned themselves so much with the student body but they have given the faculty a shaking up that will last for many semesters. Benjamin Ide Wheeler is very punctilious and knows how to do the society act with tact and finesse. Rusty old pedagogues are trying to emulate their chief, and just now manners, not mathematics, make the man. Mrs. Wheeler is very orthodox in the matter of dress and always appears in full evening costume. Before her advent the ladies of the faculty wore anything, from a shirtwaist to a tea gown. Mrs. Wheeler's decollete gowns gave them their cue and conventional evening dress is now quite common. One of the last screws was driven in the coffin of provincialism at the president's reception last week. At the first whiff of punch, good strong punch, brewed by a generous mixerologist, some of the conservatives acclimated to ex-President Kellogg's tea and biscuit regime were a bit shocked. However with Professor Bacon to lead the way the pedagogues finally gave a cordial howdy-do to the punch bowl. Another departure of President Wheeler was the inviting of representative people outside of acad-

Disgruntled Pedagogues

Now that President Wheeler has had time to show his fibre the enthusiasts and grumblers are balancing their scores. There is no doubt of his strength with the student body but the faculty—publish it not in Gath—are a bit disgruntled over his policy. It is easy enough to diagnose their trouble. President Wheeler, following the tip of the trusts, has brought out a few big men at good salaries and then puttied up the financial holes by getting men with LL.D.'s and other top notch degrees, who are willing to teach for nine hundred dollars a year. These importations of distinguished but cheap Eastern pedagogues have sidetracked the hopes of a "raise" for the old guard. College professors are not overpaid anywhere but California has been rather more generous than other States. Under the present policy, however, there does not seem to be a pot of gold at the end of the rainbow.

Acquiring Wealth by Marriage

Marrying rich girls is not always a safe investment, as in some cases our Californian heiresses have been known to hold an exceedingly tight hand upon the strings of the purse given by Papa. Therefore is it to be specially noted the good luck that befell E. Duplessis Beylard the coach driver, in marrying the charming daughter of the late Geo. Howard, as she evidently places no marital curb upon the fads and fancies of her husband. Rumor assigns a different fate to handsome Frank Carolan, the dark-browed wife with her Pullman dot being of a jealous temperament. Frank Newlands, whose first wife was Senator Sharon's daughter, came in for a child's portion of that large estate owing to the kind offices of the friendly lawyer who drew up the Senator's will, in exerting an influence in Newlands' behalf. Herman Oelrichs was lucky in having ducats of his own when he wedded "our Tessie" and looking after his wife's interests in her father's estate keeps him a happy exile on our golden shores. Jack Casserly—if report be true—has done very well for himself in his selection of the Chicago meat packer's daughter. Possibly the men who have secured unquestionably enviable partis are the several sons-in-law of that most estimable lady, Mrs. A. M. Parrott.

Eligible Heiresses

There are still more than a few rich girls left for our men on marriage thoughts intent to try for. First of all there is Miss Flood, who is accused of halting between—not two opinions, but two aspirants for her hand and millions. Then there is Miss Flora Low with enough money to render her attractive to the fortune hunter. Miss Jenny Blair adds comeliness to her dot. Turning to the young girls we find the charming daughters of J. D. Spreckels; the sisters Alice and Ethyl Hager, each with a healthy bank account as well as physique; the Misses Therese and Ella Morgan whose father left them a tidy sum, and the pretty daughters of the houses of Huntington and Mills.

The Sloss Decision

Judge Sloss stirred up a hornet's nest by deciding that Mayor Schmitz had no right to appoint a clerk of the Justices' Court. He is accused of having knocked a pin from under the Charter. The fact is that he merely refrained from reversing the Supreme Court and ignoring the Constitution of the State. It is true that the Charter attempts to give the Mayor power to appoint a clerk of the Justices Court, but the circumstance of the Freeholders having exceeded their authority in that matter does not affect the Charter as a whole, and the decision of Judge Sloss is not so far-reaching as some people imagine. It may affect the Board of Health case, but there are some of us who are still of the opinion that the doctors of the so-called Bubonic Board were not such contemptible villains as their enemies have asserted. I hope to see them hold their jobs.

The Willie Babcocks have gone abroad intending to take in the Coronation. It was while touring Europe in the sixties that Mr. Babcock met in Paris the adopted daughter of General and Mrs. Alfred Redington of Sacramento, and she became his first wife.

Horace Was Discreet

Horace Platt ran a great risk of incurring displeasure at the Harriman dinner the other night when he responded to the toast, "What I know About Married Women." I have no doubt that Mr. Platt knows a lot about all kinds of women but he shouldn't care to exploit the knowledge at a banquet. However, he is a discreet chap and he refrained from becoming too communicative.

the murderer of Nora Fuller, it is the astonishing number of girls of fifteen or thereabouts who can be found unprotected at any given time in places which, if not questionable in themselves, certainly become so as resorts for mere children. Every barkeeper, restaurant waiter, lodging-house, hall-porter and wandering actor who has projected himself into the case has the same story to tell of some half-grown child hanging about hallways or street corners or side doors in the company of a doubtful looking man. When the body of the girl was discovered in the deserted house it was the signal for relatives and acquaintances to come forward and make inquiries about half a dozen others who had been lost sight of anywhere from a week to a month without appearing to have caused any anxiety or speculation as to their whereabouts until it was borne in upon those supposed to be concerned that there might be other murders. Other occurrences since then seem to point to a curious development of family life which permits girls, as a matter of course to attend theatres alone and find their way behind the footlights or wander wherever their fancy directs.

The terrible catastrophe which played such havoc with human life in the Island of Martinique is the third which has visited that little stretch of land. In 1767 there was an earthquake which cost the lives of more than sixteen hundred people. In 1839 an earthquake occurred which destroyed nearly half of Port Royal, the present capital of he island, and killed seven hundred people. The list of great disasters from such causes is very long. The most familiar are the eruptions of Vesuvius in 79 which buried Pompeii and Hereculaneum, and the great Lisbon earthquake of November 1st, 1755. On that day, in about eight minutes most of the houses of the Portuguese capital were wrecked, and many of the inhabitants were buried in the ruins. A great tidal wave followed overwhelming many thousands. It was estimated that seventy thousand lives were lost. The islands of Japan have suffered much from seismc disturbances. One great earthquake cost the lives of nearly two hundred thousand in and around Tokio. A severe shock occurred in the Malay archipelago in 1883. It accompanied the explosive eruptions of the volcano Krakatoa on the island of that name in the Strait of Sunda. The disturbance lasted three months and nearly the entire island was destroyed. The worst earthquake the records of this country show occurred in Charleston, South Carolina, in 1886, when forty-one lives were lost and five million dollars worth of property was destroyed.

What Should Be Remembered

The New York Sun declares that Rear Admiral Sampson was the most conspicuous figure to die in the military service of the United States since General Philip Sheridan, and that "he will ever be an inspiration to the American youth." The American youth, it is to be hoped, will always be reminded that Admiral Sampson objected to the promotion of a brave and worthy gunner on the ground that he was unskilled in the arts of the drawing room dandy, and that the American people regarded Admiral Sampson with contempt ever after. Those circumstances should serve to inspire the American youth but not with admiration or with desire to emulate the absentee hero.

A Crack Ping-Pongist

Mrs. J. K. Armsby, Jr., of Chicago, is establishing a record for herself in this neck-of-the-woods as a Ping-Pong player. There is not a more graceful player in California, and her control of the ball is marvelous. The junior J. K. Armsby's are perhaps the most enthusiastic boomers of California that ever came hither from the East. They spend several months in Northern California every year. Mrs. Armsby has one of the Hotel Mateo cottages, and she expects to be joined there by her husband in a short time.

"She looks like a prosperous typewriter. I suppose she manipulates the keys with great skill."

No, she's a bad typewriter, but then the bad one's are usually prosperous.

Of the Pixley Family

Miss Edith Nelson who was married the other day to Mr. John Kimball, was once, with her sister, Amelia, one of the family of the late Frank Pixley. Another girl in that home circle to which interest has attached by reason of the will of Mrs. Pixley providing for the destruction of the old family residence, was Pixley's adopted daughter, Fanny Morrison, a young lady whose eccentricities were many. After running away from home several times she married her riding teacher, who, she believed, was a Prince in disguise. She died a few years later from an overdose of morphine. The two children born of the union were legally adopted by Mrs. Pixley and to them she left the bulk of her estate. Mrs. Louis Auzerais was another adopted daughter of the Pixleys. She too was an eccentric woman. Her love of the stage led to her divorce from Auzerais and marriage to Hereward Hoyte, the actor.

Why She Won't Lead

Mrs. Will Crocker has officially announced that she will not lead society. In the presence of a number of friends she declared that she has not the slightest desire to do the feminine of the late Ward McAllister. Time was when Mrs. Will was supposed to have a bad attack of leadership mania, but that is now mediaeval history and Mrs. Henry Scott or Mrs. What-you May-call'em may have the honor for all Mrs. Crocker cares. "We are too large a family to entertain with any degree of certainty," naively complained Mrs. Will when the recent death of Mr. Sperry sent two large functions she had planned a-glimmering. "Every time I send out invitations for a big affair," continued Mrs. Crocker, "some one in the family dies and they have to be recalled."

"If I were you, Mrs. Crocker," replied a sprightly dame, "I'd send out cards for a party once a week until all your relatives were killed off and then begin entertaining in earnest!"

About the Bishops

"Jim" Bishop has at last been "shooed!" from the city by the warning doctors and with his pretty young wife has gone down to the Bishops' ranch near Santa Barbara, to try to regain his health. Physicians and his family urged him to go last year and he seemed on the point of yielding when he decided to get married instead. His younger brother, Tom Bishop, was preparing for his marriage with Anna Voorhies, and Jim, not to be outdone, suddenly married Miss Belle Van Vlack to whom he had been engaged for a long time. There are two other Bishop boys of cotillion age and as pa's rich and ma's amiable they will probably be rushed next season by the matchmakers. The Bishop fancy evidently runs to the tag end of the alphabet for both the older boys married hyphenated V's—Van Vlack and Van Voorhies, for although the Voorhies have amputated the Van from their name it is theirs by right of inheritance.

Some Political Chat

Mayor Schmitz has disregarded my advice. He has again mingled with the Republican leaders at the banquet board, and just to prove their friendship they put him between Mr. William F. Herrin and Internal Revenue Collector Lynch. Of course it may have been a mere accident that he was so placed, but I cannot help suspecting somebody of resorting to a little fine work. Mr. Herrin and Mr. Lynch are charming conversationalists and no doubt they availed themselves of the opportunity to discuss State politics with Mr. Schmitz. The latest rumor in political circles, by the way, is that Governor Gage is going to be withdrawn from the gubernatorial race and started out for the toga, and that George A. Knight is to head the Republican ticket. The distinguished attorney having fattened his bank account with the Fair case fee is now well equipped for a campaign. It is believed that he is the one man capable of uniting the discordant elements in the Republican party. His candidacy would be satisfactory to both the Chronicle and the Call, and he has the reputaion of being an independent swashbuckler in politics. His candidacy would undoubtedly have an effect on the fight between Justices Beatty and Garoutte for the Chief Justiceship of the Supreme Court, which has caused great interest all over the State. Knight is a Garoutte man, and the circumstance of his being considered an available candidate may be taken as an indication that the "powers that be" are preparing to desert Chief Justice Beatty. They have been saying for some weeks that it was "a case of hands off" because the contest threatened to intensify the complications of the gubernatorial fight.

The Bowers' Case

Dr. J. Milton Bowers is authority for the statement that he did not murder his wife, and as the statement is believed to have been made in the shadow of the grave it is perhaps entitled to credence. But Dr. Bowers made the same statement when he was in the shadow of the gallows some years ago, and very few people believed him. Guilty or innocent of the crime, nobody believed Bowers entitled to sympathy. All his life he was engaged in questionable practices of a character that should render a conscience immune to qualms even though uxoricide were among his exploits. He may assert his innocence of the crime of murder but he cannot deny that he talked shamelessly about his dead wife after her death, though his eyes were dimmed with tears at the time. Bowers had a very bad record which gave color to the presumptions of his guilt. His first wife, Augusta Shirek, died under circumstances somewhat similar to those surrounding the death of the second. And among other incidents of his life revealed at the time of his trial was that of his arrest some years before for the theft of a book from a store in Market street. Books had been stolen with such regularity that a watch was kept and Bowers was caught in the act of slipping a medical work under his coat.

Benhayon's Diary

The Bowers case will always rank as one of the most remarkable in criminal jurisprudence. He was convicted and sentenced to be hanged, the motive attributed to him being that he wished to recover the money for which his wife's life had been insured. He would not have been granted a new trial had not the brother of his wife been found dead with what purported to be a confession at his side, according to the statement found in the room. Benhayon the brother, committed suicide because he feared that he was about to be arrested for the murder. It was explained that he had kept a diary in which he had recited all the facts relating to the poisoning of his sister, and that he had lost the memorandum book containing the diary one day, while walking in the City Hall. That was over ten years ago and nobody has ever heard of the finding of the diary. It is almost incredible that a man engaged in killing a woman by the poisoning process would keep a record of his crime. The authorities believed that Benhayon was murdered at the instigation of Bowers, and that the alleged confession was a forgery. Failure to prove that such was the case resulted in the liberation of Bowers.

There is an Italian saying which some of our society folks should have inscribed somewhere within easy, visual range. Roughly translated it runs thus: "Kind to everyone, familiar with no one; courteous to those who honor me and receiving in my house only those whom I honor."

Omar the Younger

Wallace Irwin is out with another conceit in book form which is almost as unique, and a great deal more refreshing, than the Hoodlum sonnets. There is a boldness and originality in Irwin's conceptions which stamp him as a genius. He is a skilled versesmith, but does not take his muse seriously. He prefers to contribute to the gaiety of nations rather than to stir their souls, and it is pleasing to note that he does not deem it necessary to go to New York or London to achieve a reputation. He stays right here and lets Elder and Shepard do his publishing. His latest effort is bound to attract attention. It is entitled "The Rubaiyat of Omar Khayyam Jr." From the preface it appears that Irwin was lately impressed with the notion that the burning need of the literary hour was not for more translators of the Rubaiyat but for more Omars to translate. So he went into the wilds of Borneo and disinterred the songs of Omar Khayyam Jr., which, he contends, have points of superiority over the quatrains of the astronomer of Naishapur. From these songs it appears that Omar the younger was a tobacco fiend. He believed that the alcoholic pleasures of his father were false joys. So he substituted nicotine for wine to dissipate on. In this stanza which is the key to his philosophy he answers his gay and festive parent:

"O foozled Poetastess, fogged with wine,
Who to your orgies bid the Muses nine,
Go bid them, then, but leave to me the tenth,
Whose name is Nicotine for she is mine!"

A Tobacchanalian Toper

Irwin informs us in his preface that "Where the philosophy of the elder Omar was bacchanalian and epicurean, that of the son was tobacchanalian and eclectic. He also tells us that Omar Sr. left the discovery of Woman to his son. The latter's verses abound in kisses. But it is in verses like these that the poet reveals his true passion:

Another Time, all dalliant and slow,
To those delicious Lips I bended low,
And at the Second Kiss she only said,
"Do you do This to every girl you know?"

But One there is more sage in that Caress,
Raising no mawkish Pennant of Distress,
But when I tip the Osculative Brim,
Accepts the kiss in silent Thankfulness,

Her lips no Questions ask—Content is hers.
If her Artistic Spirit wakes and stirs,
Nor recks of those Romances Heretofore—
Engagements where I won my Brazen Spurs.

The Other Kind of Past

There are other verses that bespeak a past which does not in the future wait. These, for instance:

"Murkly I muse on that transcendent State
Where all my Pasts within the Future wait—
If I for heavenly marriages am marked,
Oh, what a Turk I'll be beyond the Gate!

Minnie and Maud across my Flight will wing,
Birdie and Bess and Gwendolyn will bring
A score of Other Pasts and make a scene,
To say the Least a bit embarrassing.

The Drew Brothers

John Drew's return to San Francisco and Blingum has revived gossip anent the alleged estrangement of smart society's favorite thespian and his brother, Sidney Drew. It is said that they have not been on friendly terms for years and that John Drew never refers to Sidney as his brother. Sidney was the favorite son of his mother, Mrs. John Drew. There are many that think him as talented as his more prosperous brother. He is surely more versatile but he is a prodigal chap, more democratic than the somewhat haughty John, and with the rollicking spirits that made his sister, Georgie Drew Barrymore, such a great favorite off as well as on the stage.

The Comedian's Daughter

John Drew's young daughter, Louise, is one of the few children of actors born with a social position, especially in America, where it is only lately that actors have been accepted. Louise Drew is now but a little more than twenty and it was two years ago that she made her social debut in New York. Her parents were able to invite all of the smart set that they cared to have. She was entertained a great deal, and off the stage she is quite like the young ladies of the smart set. She greatly resembles her cousin, Ethel Barrymore. She is as simple and girlish as Ethel Barrymore was when she first visited San Francisco. I believe Ethel was seventeen at that time but she used to play with dolls. The Tobins are very fond of the Drews, and are to entertain them while here. Dick Tobin gave Louise Drew a very pretty pony when she was quite a child.

His Gifted Niece

Miss Louise Drew appears to be quite unfitted by nature for the profession that should seem to belong to a Drew by right of inheritance. At present one only tolerates her because she is a Drew. However she may improve, for she certainly has an excellent tutor. I recall Ethel Barrymore's first appearance with her uncle. She too seemed almost impossible as an actress but now she is a distinguished leading lady. She is a handsome, high-bred looking girl, and as natural and unaffected on and off the stage as was her charming mother. As Madame Trentoni in "Captain Jinks" she made a sensation, but through all her success she remains unspoiled. I have been told that when congratulated on her success some time ago, she said, "Oh, my name was made for me; that was half the battle. But I never knew how nice that name looked till I saw it in electric lights in front of a theatre. Heaps of girls are as clever if they only had my opportunities." The members of Miss Barrymore's company dote on her, she is so unassuming to the most insignificant of them. When "on tour" she dines with them en famille. She bravely assumes the entire responsibility of supporting her afflicted father, Maurice Barrymore, though for years before he was stricken she was estranged from him. Her brother, Lionel of the Drew company, is a manly looking chap but the divine spark has not yet set him on fire.

Threatening to Sue

The Baron Von Schroeder threatens to create a few sensations in society by bringing suits against club men who have enjoyed the hospitality of the Hotel Rafael and who now owe him bills. He says he does not object to their owing him money, but that he objects to people knocking him while they have I. O. U's. in their pocket. Fortune, by the way, promises to smile once more on the Baron. The Government is negotiating for the purchase of part of his big ranch. The land is wanted for a training station of some sort.

She Showed Her Lingerie

The Associated Press has announced the engagement of the widow of United States Senator Cushman K. Davis and Senor Abazuza formerly Colonial Secretary to the Cabinet of Spain. When Mrs. Davis first appeared in Washington with her husband, she created a deal of discussion. She had been heralded as a woman of great beauty, and she got herself talked about by giving interviews to the newspapers in which she described the methods of dressing by which she showed her figure to the greatest advantage. Among other things she stated that she wore at all times black silk underclothing made in one piece and that she used only black silk bedclothing in her house. She took great pleasure in exhibiting her lingerie to the reporters.

Mrs. Frederick A. Jacobs' reception last week at her home in Pacific avenue, complimentary to her sister, Miss Mary Lee Henry, was a very delightful function. Miss Henry lives in the East and is spending the winter in California. Just now she is visiting the William T. Jeters of Santa Cruz. She received much attention during her stay in San Francisco, whither she will return later on. Miss Henry is a beautiful girl with the rich coloring peculiar to the Southern type of beauty, and she possesses a rare charm of manner.

A New Fad

The fashionables are waiting to see whether Helen Hopkins Taylor will pioneer the fad of carrying a cane. A short cane is the mode of the hour in Paris and the Countess Marguerite Cassini startled Washington several months ago by carrying one. It needed a conservative pat of approval to force it into favor for the Countess Marguerite is too unconventional to ever have a large following. But at the last two garden parties at the White House Alice Roosevelt created a sensation by appearing with a short silver topped bamboo cane which she carried jauntily in her left hand. A great many of the younger set at once bought canes and the absurd fad was last heard of in New York, where it had not taken such a strong hold as in the capital. The San Francisco smart set looks to Mrs. Gus Taylor to break the ice for such novelties and it is not unlikely that she will soon introduce the cane in Burlingame. It is doubtful whether the fad will ever reach the shopping district but it may reign at the summer resorts.

Frank Unger's Daughter a Genius

I hear that Frank Unger is delighted to think the mantle of his genius has fallen upon the shoulders of his daughter. From New York comes the news that Gladys Unger has written a curtain-raiser which has won the approval of Seymour Hicks. Miss Unger's taste would naturally run to writing and the stage. Her father would have been a successful comedian had his desire for a career run that way. He is counted one of the best actors in Bohemia and among the Lambs but he never put his dramatic gifts to professional use. His former wife, Minnie Buchanan, who was Mrs. Arthur Jules Goodman of London, is a brilliant writer. She, also, had a brief season behind the footlights, having been one of the famous company of amateurs that, with Emilie Melville the only professional, produced "Pinafore" in this city some twenty odd years ago. Gladys Unger has had a more thorough education than falls to many girls of her age. She lived in Paris for years and speaks French like a Parisian born. Mrs. Charles T. Yerkes, the second wife of the Chicago millionaire, has made Gladys her especial pet of late years.

Another Bohemian's Daughter

About a year ago the daughter of Joe Tippett, an erstwhile Bohemian Club member, wrote an operetta that made a hit in Boston, where is the Tippetts' present home. The young girl's mother was well known in musical circles here. She was Clara Beutler before her marriage.

They are Writing Plays

A fad for play writing, by the bye, now has the right of way with the younger blue stockings of society. The success of the Girls' High School play and the last annual Berkeley farce has stimulated to brisker efforts the budding playwrights who nurse their muse in private. Frances Rosamund Glass does not like the publicity her muse has received since an unthinking friend spread the story of her latest work. But there is no doubt that she is writing a play. While her father talks telephone and grows olives that are to make his daughter an heiress some day, the young girl is dreaming dreams of carving out her own fortune with her pen. She is not the only genius in the family. Her aunt, Leila France, wife of Dr. W. P. McDermott, has written many charming songs and composed music that orchestras all over the United States have played.

Across the bay another girl who might win honors in the social race prefers to scribble. She hasn't reached the play stage yet, but is still in the throes of the short story. This is Maud Edith Pope, one of the best gowned girls in the Oakland swim. Miss Pope is not a typical bas bleu, for her stockings are always whole and her shoes never down at the heel.

She's a Millionaire's Wife

The news of Freda Gallick's return to San Francisco and the stage does not appear to have occasioned any surprise. Yet it was not so long ago that I read of the marriage of Miss Gallick to a millionaire. She is now Mrs. Colgate Baker, Jr., but matrimony seems not to have affected her love for the footlights. Upon inquiry I learned that she was preparing to go East for an engagement when she learned of the serious illness of her mother in this city. She came hither at once, and about the time of her arrival, the management of Fischers' Theatre discovered that a successor to Lillian Coleman was needed. The contract of Miss Coleman, who too is a Californian has expired, and she has to be in New York in a few weeks. So Miss Gallick was engaged to take her place. Miss Coleman is one of the most charming women ever seen here in musical comedy and she will be missed. Miss Gallick has never been seen here in musical comedy. Indeed, it was not generally known that she was a vocalist. She played small parts with Frawley and Nance O'Neill, and she left here as a member of the Dowling company.

The dog show having lapsed into the past, now comes the flower show. The eighteenth exhibition and rose show of the California State Flower Society will open next Thursday in the nave of the Ferry building. Mrs. J. Ross Martin, Mrs. W. S. Chandler and Mrs. O. D. Baldwin are among the committee arranging the exhibition.

They are to have a Horse Show at Blingum at the end of this month. It is to be an unpretentious affair, and the prizes will not be valuable. The main purpose of the show is to give society an opportunity to get together.

Connoisseurs of perfect goods appreciate "Jesse Moore" Whiskey for its purity and delightful flavor. It is without a peer.

Max Hirschfeld, the ex-Tivoli leader who preceded Mr. Steindorff in the chair, has been heard from. He is the musical director of "The Wild Rose" company at the fashionable Knickerbocker Theatre in Broadway New York. Mr. Hirschfeld has seldom been out of a job since he left the Tivoli, and he has had some very fine engagements. When he first went East, he joined the Edna May company and he was musical director for that popular prima donna on her London trip. He was later on with "The Chaperones," and he left that company to go to the Knickerbocker.

The Webster-Jones Marriage

The news of the marriage of Webster Jones and Miss Yost, daughter of Daniel Yost was a great surprise to people who imagined that the ex-husband of the Countess Artsimovitch was grieving sorely over the loss of that lady. Shortly after the first Mrs. Webster Jones obtained her divorce, her ex-husband started on a trip to Europe on a sailing vessel. Before the ship reached the horn Mrs. Jones became the wife of the Russian Consul and started for Berlin. Jones did not learn of the marriage until he reached London, and by that time the Count and his bride were promenading Unter der Linden. I have seen Mr. Jones since his marriage and he appears to have thoroughly recovered from the shock caused by the news of his first wife's second matrimonial venture. His bride is a charming young woman, and they appear to be a devoted couple.

Harriman's Glad Hand

The Harriman party has gone and left the most pleasant memories behind. Everybody that met the President of the Southern Pacific Company during his sojourn here is loud and vociferous and enthusiastic in praising the genial, amiable and banquet-loving New Yorker. Mr. Harriman is a born diplomatist. As a glad-hand artist he is without a peer in all the realm of gladhanding save, perhaps, that superb exponent of the "ecstatic right," Mr. E. O. McCormick. That there is no more effective way of winning a man than through his stomach, Mr. Harriman is quite certain, and "Feed the Beast" was his motto after he crossed the State line. Of course it appeared that Mr. Harriman was the guest on the most of the gastronomical occasions, but that was because he could not very well assume the role of perpetual host for he was a visitor. But he was the instigator of the feasts, and they enabled him to captivate by his superb suavity. I am of the opinion that Mr. Harriman is the most accomplished railroad president that ever visited this city. He is thoroughly imbued with the theory that popularity wins in the long run, and he made many friends for the railroad while here. He knows that the prosperity of the State means prosperity for the railroad, and his policy is to combine the interests of both.

The Harriman Party

There were several interesting people in the Harriman party. The ladies were most charming, and they were delightfully entertained at Blingum where they spent a deal of time. The chief entertainer down there was Prince Poniatowski who is "close up" with Harriman, and who expects to promote one of his enterprises with the corporation of the wealthy New Yorker. All the ladies in the Harriman party are skilled horsewomen, and they romped all over San Mateo county. The most conspicuous member of the party was Miss Sears of Boston who attracted much attention by her eccentric costumes. She affects the mannish mode, and looked on most occasions as though she would like to eschew even the skirt.

Are you sufficiently jeune siecle to write your notes first page, third and then double back? A will written in that manner was cast out of court recently. And a decision here of one dated March 10, with a diagonal line and 99 beneath was declared to be undated and therefore invalid. It is safe to remember these things, in case one wishes to make a will that will stand.

The Plaint of Society Girls

At the close of the opera season some of our society girls took a vow that they would snub all dinners given by bachelors to celebrities. "The men should be rebuked," said one of them. "We invite them to our homes and dine them and tea them; we let them share our boxes at the opera, and most of them never reciprocate. But when some opera singer or distinguished actress comes along they give her an elaborate dinner and invite us simply to do her honor, not out of compliment to us. They never think of giving us a dinner or a dance but use us as social decorations at their feasts to professionals. We don't object to the celebrities, but we should like to be the motif of their hospitality once in a while." This is not the first time that society girls have sat up and taken notice that the bachelors are selfish; that it's all take and no "give" in the little game of entertaining. Some years ago they rubbed it in sufficiently to make the men give two bachelor cotillions, since which noble efforts they have rested on their oars. The bachelor cotillions have become fixtures in New York and if the girls out here pout long enough they may bring the men to terms.

The Dinner

But the Atherton dinner was not regarded as one of the usual compliments to a visiting celebrity. Mrs. Atherton is a Californian, and she has the cachet entitling her to mingle with our elite. She was one of them. True she was not appreciated until London discovered her, but now that she is a foremost figure in the literary world, San Francisco's smart set is anxious to claim her as its own. Indeed, there was great anxiety in many homes when it was learned that the dinner was to be given. Society was on the tip-toe of expectancy and the dinner has caused much heartburning. It was a very pleasant affair, and at Mrs. Atherton's request there were no post-prandial talks. She knows most of our after-dinner speakers. Mr. Frank P. Deering, the President of the club, was the master of the feast. Those present were: Irving M. Scott, Peter Robertson, George Hall, Ed. M. Greenway, Thomas Barbour, Emil Bruguiere, Major Rathbone, Fremont Older, W. H. Crocker, Frank Goad, George Bromley, Thomas McCaleb, Mrs. Irving M. Scott, Mrs. Sterling Postley, Mrs. Gertrude Atherton, Mrs. Ashton Stevens, Mrs. Emma Shafter Howard, Mrs. Eleanor Martin, Mrs. Monroe Salisbury, Miss Josie Loughborough, Miss Fannie Loughborough, Miss Elsie Sperry, Miss Edith Henrici, Mrs. Fremont Older and Miss Marie Voorhies.

She Was Not a Farragut

Inadvertently I stated last week that the blood of the Farraguts flowed in the veins of Miss Betty Ashe. It was probably owing to the fact that the mother of Miss Ashe and the wife of Admiral Farragut were sisters that I was led into the inadvertence. However, Miss Betty comes from brave stock though she is not a Farragut. Her mother was a Miss Loyal of Virginia and her father, Dr. R. R. Ashe, was a Mexican war veteran. He came prominently to the front in this city during the Vigilance Committee troubles that followed the death of James King of William in 1856. He was a devoted friend of Judge Terry.

The Retort Courteous

One of the feminine guests at the Bowie fete was complaining the other day to a member of the "old set" about the frigidity of the Blingumites toward people with whom they happen to come into contact for the first time. "Why," said she, "if any one outside of that particular set goes down to Blingum up go the lorgnettes and out pops the query, 'Who are they?'" Well," said the representative of the old set, "you could easily retort by asking, 'Who were they?'"

It is said that if army rank were hereditary, the academy at West Point could close up in another twenty years as there would be enough half-breed Colonels and Lieutenants, not to mention those of lower rank, to fit out all the positions there are apt to be in existence. As Deromda remarked, the whites have only themselves to blame.

The Court of Appeals Attacked

As amicus curiae Mr. E. S. Pillsbury was certainly a success in the cases growing out of the bitter Nome litigation which resulted so disastrously to Judge Noyes, but I am of the opinion that he was more devoted to the interests of certain rich clients than to those of the gentlemen constituting the Court of Appeals. Those judges have no reason to be proud of their conduct in those cases in which the astute Mr. Pillsbury was so active. They convicted, at his instigation, two men of contempt who have been pardoned —one by President McKinley, and the other, a few days ago by President Roosevelt. They managed to get rid of poor Judge Noyes, who was removed under fire, but that was because of his unfortunate weakness—a passion for liquor—and not because the Department of Justice believed him to be corrupt. I doubt whether Judge Morrow and his associates are grateful to the amicus curiae for the part he persuaded them to play in those now celebrated cases. C. S. Frost was the man pardoned by President Roosevelt the other day. The pardon was granted notwithstanding the refusal of the circuit judges to approve the application made by the prisoner. I have before me the brief presented to the Attorney-General in Washington in support of Frost's application. Having read it I am now impelled to ask whether the Judges of our Circuit Court of Appeals do not feel that they are in a position almost as embarrassing as that which Judge Noyes found himself in when before them some months ago. The brief was written by Francis Heney, a fearless member in good standing of the local bar, and it is one of the most sensational pamphlets I ever read.

Union Transfer Co. will call for your baggage promptly and check it through, saving you any annoyance. Phone Private 83.

Some Torrid Language

In this brief Mr. Heney declares that he would consider himself wanting in moral courage and unfit to retain his license to practice law did he not point out in unequivocal language the fact that the methods pursued by the amicus curiae were worse than lawless; that the judgment of the court was indefensible and that the sentence was cruel from every standpoint. This is pretty severe language but the brief fairly reeks with it. The attorney asserts that the record shows that the judges were prejudiced and that their bias resulted in injustice and wrongdoing. He charges them with having rejected every particle of testimony in favor of Frost, and with having accepted rank hearsay evidence as conclusive proof against him. He contended that the action of Frost which resulted in his conviction for contempt was in the line of his duty as an agent of the Department of Justice. And he added that Frost did not seem to have been wrong in his conclusion that Attorney Metson and others were trying to corrupt a jury panel. He took several smashes at both Metson and Pillsbury, and declared in conclusion that to hold Frost guilty of contempt was preposterous and an arbitrary and oppressive abuse of power on the part of the Circuit Court of Appeals.

The Ford Tragedy

Many people have remarked the likeness between Paul Leicester Ford and Carroll Carrington, the California writer. Both were deformed and both met violent deaths. Carrington received fatal injuries by falling down stairs. Those that profess to see a correspondence between physical characteristics and mental endowments and activities may find some confirmation of their theory in the two hunchbacks and their literary work. Carrington's tales were literary twisters. It was reserved for Ford to expose the contemptible character of many of the continentals and the turn-coat propensities of the men of the Revolution. With irreverent hands he stirred the ashes of the dead.

The Dedication to Vanderbilt

One of the most characteristic passages ever written by Paul Ford is to be found in his dedication of "Janice Meredith" to George W. Vanderbilt at whose home he wrote most of that popular novel. It is in his characteristic phraseology and in it are more of his direct thoughts than can be found in any other extract of like length:

To George W. Vanderbilt—My Dear George: Into the warp and woof of every book an author weaves much that even the subtlest readers cannot suspect, far less discern. To them it is but a cross and pile of threads interlaced to form a pattern, which may please or displease their taste. But to the writer every filament has its own association: How each bit of silk or wool, flax or tow, was laboriously gathered, or was blown to him; when each was spun by the wheel of his fancy into yarns; the color and tint his imagination gave to each skein; and where each was finally woven into the fabric by the shuttle of his pen. No thread ever quite detaches itself from its growth and spinning, dyeing and weaving, and each draws him back to hours and places seemingly unrelated. And so, as I have read the proofs of this book I have found, more than once, that the pages have faded out of sight and in their stead I have seen Mount Pisgah and the French Broad River, or the ramp and terrace of Biltmore House, just as I saw them when writing the words which served to recall them to me. With the visions, too, has come a recurrence to our long talks, our work among the books, our games of chess, our cups of tea, our walks, our rides, and our drives. It is therefore a pleasure to me that the book so naturally gravitates to you, and that I may make it a remembrance of those past weeks of companionship, and an earnest of the present affection of Paul Leicester Ford.

A Father's Fatal Folly

The Ford tragedy contains many elements that a parent should ponder. It was in consequence of the discrimination of a father against one of his sons. The father insisted on choosing a career for his son totally at variance with the natural inclinations of the young man. The wise father is proud of the manifestation of the spirit of independence in his offspring, even though it may seem to be misdirected. Malcolm Ford's inclinations were far from disreputable, and should not have aroused the paternal resentment which was responsible for the awful tragedy. There came to Malcolm Ford a legacy, not of money but of hatred, and though there is no shadow of justification for his terrible crime, one cannot withhold sympathy from him or fail to condemn the father for having arrogated to himself the right to visit post-mortem punishment on a disobedient son.

Didn't Like the Caricature

Governor Odell of New York is one of those rare politicians who do not like to see their pictures in the newspapers. He actually declined to furnish the Call with one of his photographs. Artist Cahill persuaded him to change his mind by exhibiting to the Governor a splendid caricature. Odell concluded that it was better to have his photograph than the caricature in the Call.

Bret Harte's Sister

A correspondent reminds me that Bret Harte had a sister, a Mrs. Wyman, who was a writer of considerable ability, and whose writings appeared in the columns of the old Alta California. She had two brilliant daughters, both of whom were married years ago.

The Autocrat of the School

Several prominent school teachers have written to me to commend my statement that the child in his seat in the school-room is boss of the situation. "Since politics and demagogy have held sway in educational circles," one of them writes, "the teachers have been in a state of terror. Discipline in the school-room is almost at an end. Since the Blanchard case came to the fore, principals are afraid to punish children for fear of arousing the ire of parents, and as a consequence the youngsters are becoming defiant of all authority."

Jim Phelan's Wealth

According to newspaper reports, the Phelan estate was appraised at seven millions and the ex-mayor received a third as his share. The fact is he received nearly all of it. Mr. Phelan's father had the old world idea that a son needs more than a daughter, and he bequeathed the greater portion of the estate to James D. The Phelan building alone brings him in nearly a quarter of a million a year, and he is the owner of two other valuable buildings in Market street. His income is nearly a thousand dollars a day, and though he gives generously his wealth is increasing at a tremendous rate. The late Mrs. Phelan had an income of about thirty thousand a year which is now enjoyed by her two daughters, Mrs. Frank Sullivan and Miss Mollie Phelan.

The cornation of Edward VII is not the only big show to be pulled off in Europe next month. King Alfonso of Spain, attains his majority in June and there will be Court ceremonies and fetes in his honor. It will be a gala affair but not so brilliant as that of the show in honor of England's monarch. Edward has been in the public eye ever since his mother's death, and how to keep there after the Coronation will be a problem hard to solve

SHE SAVED HIS LIFE

A pretty wedding took place at the Little Church Round the Corner in New York the other day. It was the result of a last summer romance. He fell off the pier at Newport, struck a boat in falling and was stunned. She was a good swimmer and saved his life. All of which shows the importance of knowing how to swim. Young people who go to Hotel Vendome during the coming summer can learn to swim so easily they will never know they tried, for the Hotel management has just provided two of the best swimming pools in the state. One is forty feet wide and sixty feet long and holds 90,000 gallons. These pools are going to be the chief attractions at this popular hotel. Besides them a new bowling alley has just been finished. Golf enthusiasts will enjoy the Linda Vista links not far away, and those for whom ping-pong is a joy forever will find tables enough to keep them busy all the time. These are only a few of the attractions offered. The best way to find out about the rest is to take a run down and see for yourself. You will be sure to find friends there.

The Alaska Packers' Association

The reports that officials of the Alaska Packers' Association have been in Vancouver, B. C., for the past week, conferring with Aemilus Jarvis, who came from Toronto to amalgamate the British Columbian canneries, has caused some little comment on the Exchange and the stock of the corporation has ruled steady at $160 bid, with but few transactions recorded. The officers here are very reticent and absolutely refuse to say what the northern conference is about. Along the street there is some faith put in the rumor that the local association is making overtures to absorb the newly amalgamated concern and little credence is given to statements that the latter organization has made inducements to gain control of the local corporation, for, judging from the unsuccessful outcome of the overtures of the Onnfroy-McGovern syndicate, which formed the Pacific Navigation and Packing Company, and the company in which J. Pierpont Morgan and Charles R. Flint were believed to be interested, it is not likely that the shareholders of the Alaska Packers' Association would entertain any such proposition with the affairs of the concern in so highly satisfactory state. The Alaska Packers' Association was capitalized in 1893 for $5,000,000, divided into 50,000 shares, 2,000 of which have never been issued. The original value of the stock was $65 and the present selling price is somewhat in the neighborhood of $160, showing an advance of $95 a share, besides dividends of $76.75 paid on each share. The original buyer of shares has thus received $11.75 over what he paid for each share, and his shares today are worth on the market about two and one-half times as much as he paid for them. The year the association was formed it packed 462,650 cases of salmon. Last year the output was 1,273,566. Up to the end of January of this year the association paid ninety-seven consecutive dividends without interruption, all at the rate of 75 cents a share and for the last four months $1 a share, making in all 101 consecutive payments. The association will pay out in dividends this year $576,000, and has set aside $90,000 for insurance, $87,000 to the contingent reserve fund, and has written off $230,000 for depreciation. This makes a total of $983,000 which, with $9,600,000, the par value of the stock, makes the interest on shares over ten per cent. Most of the stock of the Alaska Packers' Association is owned in San Francisco and is owned largely by investors. The association has no bonds or mortgage indebtedness, no debentures, no preferred stock and consequently no fixed interest charges. All the stock is of equal rank, value and standing, and all profits go to the owners.

Evidences of Prosperity

As far as can be judged from a financial standpoint San Francisco's business interests are making such forward strides that the present year will be a banner twelvemonth in the commercial annals of the city. For two years past bank clearings have been steadily gaining at the average rate of over $12,000,000 per month and this year the increase is making steady progress. The month of March showed the greatest volume of bank clearings in the history of the city, the total being $120,797,935. The total clearings for the first four months aggregates $426,919,716, making a monthly average of $106,729,926. If this average continues, and there is every prospect that it will, the total for the year will exceed $1,280,000,000. While the bank clearings of this city constitute a fair index of commercial prosperity they do not by any means show the gross volume of trade. Statisticians have estimated that the bank clearings represent about 60 per cent of the aggregate business volume and even on this calculation the business of San Francisco would represent about $185,000,000 per month. This city, however, conducts its business in a different way from nearly all the large Eastern cities for the reason that here the old custom of making payments twice a month on what is called collection day is still maintained. By reason of this system payments are largely made in coin which do not in any way figure in or affect bank clearings. For this reason the estimate of 60 per cent, which probably does represent a fair average for the Eastern cities, where payments are almost entirely made by checks, does not apply to San Francisco. Furthermore, many of the large business houses of this city make it a practice not to draw checks for any sum below specified amounts, such as $250, $500 or $1,000, depending upon the size of the establishment and the volume of business transacted. For these reasons it can be readily seen that San Francisco's gross trade movement is largely in excess of a total ascertained by the usual statistical method based on the assumption that the bank clearings represent 60 per cent of the business.

San Francisco has nine saving banks and all are in a prosperous condition. In the last statement filed with the Board of Bank Commissioners representing the condition of affairs of these institutions at the close of business on the 30th of April, there are a number of interesting facts worthy of attention. The total resources of these nine banks on that date was $146,400,566. Of this total $1,822,419 constitutes the value of the several bank premises. Other real estate held by the banks is valued at $5,357,960. The total value of United States and other interest bearing bonds held by these banks is $65,322,883. The loans on real estate mostly in San Francisco and based on a 75 per cent ratio of assessed valuation are $63,550,607. The total loans on stocks, bonds and warrants is $5,268,294. guarded is shown that loans on personal securities for all the nine banks is only $2,100. On the date named the banks had money on hand to the amount of $2,226,270 and money due from other banks and bankers which for the purposes of business can be considered as cash, aggregated $2,250,826. The total amount due depositors was $134,476,550. The gain in deposits since December 31st, 1901, when the last previous reports were made, a period of four months, has been $1,046,060. The gain from December 31st, 1900 to December 31st, 1901 was $8,849,564. This is certainly an enormous increase and speaks well for nine savings banks in one city. The Hibernia Bank has $50,928,461 on deposit, the largest amount in its history and larger than any other savings bank in the State. The German Savings Bank has $30,856,482 and the San Francisco Savings Union hold $30,235,080 for account of depositors.

On Change

Operations on the Stock and Bond Exchange during the past week have been exceedingly limited, the various bonds and securities offering but little attraction to investors.. Sellers, however, showed no disposition to shade their asking prices, maintaining that the present condition was but a periodical dullness and a marked reaction would soon follow. The feature of the week was the listing of the five per cent bonds of the California Central Gas and Electric Company, $104.50 being bid and $105.50 asked. Bidders raised their price to $105 and secured a small parcel at the latter figure but holders generally were firm in their demands for the highest figure. Sacramento Electric Gas and Railway 5 per cent bonds were steady at about the closing price of last week, although there were but few sales recorded. Sierra Railway Company's 6's were firmly held at $117 with but few buyers in evidence. In shares Giant Powder was offering freely in large quantities and buyers obtained stock at a marked decline in rates. With this exception prices for the various industrials showed no marked depreciations despite the general inactivity of the market. Slight fluctuations were held back and there was no unloading of stock. There was a slight movement in sugar securities and small blocks of Hutchison. Makaweli and Paauhau changed hands at steady rates. Alaska Packers ruled firm with but little stock offering for sale.

My Honolulu correspondent, one of the best-informed brokers there, writes me as follows: Once again there is some activity on the stock exchange here. There is no doubt but that the fact that sugar is very low now, and that the plantations themselves are counting the cost of manufacture in cents to see what may be saved, has its effect on the prospective investor in sugar shares. There is no reason to believe the market will continue inert once sugar reaches its normal price, but there is a belief among the factors that the result of the depression and the Cuban sugar crop being marketed, will be a period during which these figures will stand. The first sale of Hawaiian Commercial in many months was recorded a day ago when twenty shares were sold at $38. The price of this stock when last dealt in here was $80. The taking of $315,000 of Rapid Transit Company bonds by E. H. Rollins & Sons, of San Francisco, has brightened things greatly. The Rapid Transit Company owns electric lines in Honolulu which are successful. The security is rated at the top in San Francisco. —The Financier

Never too Late to Mend

Diana sat opposite him for fully five minutes without speaking. Her gray eyes looked directly into his blue ones. It was a gaze big with promise. Harry had asked her, for the third time in as many months, to be his wife.

During the three months of Harry's wooing, their world had looked on with interest mingled with amusement. Some of the men had laid bets on the results. The odds were twenty to one against an affirmative.

Harry was the least promising as well as the richest youth in his golden set. Diana was the prettiest, most fascinating, and the least dowered with dollars in hers. If wagers had been laid by the women, the odds would have been in Harry's favor. Women judge very much by what they would do were the case their own.

But Harry had been in doubt ever since he entered the race. He knew Diana better than her girl friends did. He knew morals cut a greater figure in her eyes than money. Of the former he had a poor stock.

The five minutes of dumb gaze ended.

"I will take you," said Diana, "on probation."

Harry was taken aback. His two refusals had prepared him for another. What he said was:

"You told me you did not believe in long engagements."

"Neither do I. I am ready to marry you this day week if you wish, but—"

"Oh, dash the buts!"

He would have liked to crush her to him and kiss the lips that were pressed so solemnly together. Something in her manner deterred him.

"On probation, I said," Diana went on, "we will be married, you know, and—well, it will be for form's sake. We'll be friends, don't you understand, chums and all that. But before I am really your wife, you must fit yourself to be my husband."

Harry was intuitive.

"Oh, I'll reform," he agreed eagerly, "I'll cut the club and the fellows and—"

"Dash the ands!" cried Diana, laughing, "that's the main part, of course. But, do you really care to have me on these terms?"

Care? Harry would have sold himself to Satan for Diana's "Yes." He agreed to everything and that is how the small odds won their bets.

After the wedding, the young couple went abroad. Then they returned, bought a house and started in to entertain.

"The funniest couple I ever saw," was the verdict of Harry's erstwhile chums, "why, they are just like brother and sister—at least she is. Harry doesn't seem to dare to touch her hand, even."

"'Less than mistress, much more than friend,'" quoted one of the old guard, "they're excessively modern, that's all."

* * * * * * * * * *

"I suppose you'll get a divorce right away," said Diana's bosom friend.

Harry's latest escapade had crept into print. It was just a paragraph at first in a society paper, but the dailies had seized the clue and run the story with names and pictures. And there was a woman in it.

"I see no reason for it," returned Diana, composedly.

A year of matrimony had not lessened her beauty, nor had the esclandres to which Harry's transgressions had subjected his innocent wife caused wrinkles to disfigure her smooth brow. She was as girlishly pretty as before her marriage.

"You have no sense of pride," said her friend, indignantly.

"Oh, yes," deprecated Diana.

"You are cold—unfeeling—shameless!"

The cold, unfeeling, shameless woman only laughed. Later, when her visitor was gone, she cried a little, but the tears were dried before Harry's return. There was an affectation of bravado in his manner as he came into her room.

"I suppose this is the last straw," he said, "and now it's good-bye, Diana."

"I don't see why," she answered, in the same words she had replied to her friend's suggestion of a probable divorce.

"I've shamed you," cried Harry, vehemently, nature getting the better of his affected nonchalance, "those damned papers!"

"Don't say anything, Harry," said Diana calmly, and holding out her hand to him. "You know, dear, 'twas in our compact that we were always to forgive. Nothing you could ever do could make me forget that—"

"Oh, God, Diana!" cried Harry, "if you would only love me. It drives me mad—mad—to live in the same house with you, to see you at my table, by my side, and to know that you don't think me worthy of the gift of your love!"

A sad little smile flitted across Diana's face.

"I oughtn't to have tied you to me," she said, "but I was a silly girl—fancy just a year ago I was twenty-one. I am fifty now! I thought if you had me by your side —you know you always said I was your guiding star—that you would—be different somehow. But—"

She couldn't help it. Her brave sentence ended in a burst of tears.

"Oh, Harry," she murmured between her sobs, "we've got to part. I see no other way."

"There is another way," cried her husband, "you must be my wife. There's enough of this experiment. If you love me, dear, you'll not withhold from me what is mine by right."

He seized her listless hand in his, and kissed the limp white fingers. She had half yielded herself to his embrace. Then she thrust him from her.

He frowned. "You don't love me," he exclaimed petulantly. "I don't believe you could love anybody—you are devoid of passion."

"Oh, no, I'm not," she said and then she blushed. "But you forget what I have so often told you. I know myself. I know that the maternal instinct is stronger in me than mere animal love."

Harry smiled bitterly. "I don't see how you could know that," he said, "you won't give it a chance to develop."

"I'm afraid to. I believe in heredity, and I'll not visit the sins of a father on a child of mine—"

"Now there goes that Woman's Club talk again," he interrupted.

"It's not Woman's Club talk," she exclaimed. "I love you, Harry, but I don't want to abandon my principles. We must part. Go," she whispered, "go!"

In wrathful silence he obeyed her bidding.

A week later society nodded and smiled over the news that Diana had sailed for London and Harry for Hong Kong. Such small things make society nod and smile. The nodders and smilers did not know the contents of that note Harry read so many times in the privacy of his stateroom.

"My dear: I was not strong enough to stay. I love you too well, dear. But I want my husband to be a man. I want him fit to be the father of little children. You did not know, dear, that my father was such a man as you. He broke my mother's heart and to his sons he left the legacy of intemperance, and worse. I remember my brothers. One killed himself for a woman. The other died in a fit of intoxication. Oh, Harry, could you wish—ours—to be like that?"

* * * * * * * * * *

A slim, gray-eyed young woman sat on a bench in Hyde Park and gazed with unseeing eyes at the smart throng of passers-by. Her thoughts were far away in a western city by the sea. She pictured a medium-sized, rather stockily built youth with ruddy cheeks and blue eyes.

"He is probably riding in the Park now with Kitty Lawrence. They'll go to lunch together afterwards, and then there'll be a drive, and dinner, the theatre and the rest."

Her thoughts tinged her expression with melancholy. She did not notice that toward her was coming a medium-sized, stockily built youth with ruddy cheeks and bright blue eyes. She did not look up when he sat himself on the bench beside her. But she awoke from her revery with a start when she felt her gloved hand grasped by strange fingers. A smothered shriek burst from her lips as she turned to see the intruder.

"Harry!" she cried, and her arms went around his neck, in spite of the publicity of the place. She put her head down on his shirt-front and cried for joy. All her resolutions of firmness vanished.

"Cheer up, Di," said Harry, "it's all right. I guess I've pulled up for good this time. There's a deal of truth in what those old hereditists claim. There's something due to posterity."

* * * * * * * * * *

It was three years to the hour of their wedding day when Harry and Diana reached home. They were not alone in their trip across the continent. A neat maid with a neater London accent accompanied them, also a valet likewise equipped. And a French bonne had been brought along to look after the needs of the plump infant which had its father's blue eyes and its mother's sweet mouth.

"Ah," said the astute member of the old guard, when they told him the news, "I always said they were the ideal modern couple. Anything like undue haste is such bad form nowadays."

"And incidentally," said his friend, "it goes to show how far wrong gossips can get in their speculations. How foolish it is to try to give an explanation of domestic phenomena!"

FAIRY TALES.

I used to tell her fairy tales in the days of long ago,
As we sat in the waning twilight by the old farm hedge-row;
I used to see her eyes grow bright when the Prince claimed the hand
Of the maiden fair with the golden hair in the dear, enchanted land.

I used to tell her fairy tales as we sat by the ruddy glow
Of the blazing fire of the broad hearthstone when wintry winds did blow.
I used to see her eyes light up with the flame of maiden love,
As the web of fancy's glorious dreams we two as sweethearts wove.

I tell her fairy stories now, oft in the wee sma' hours,
And swear to their truth in the dim gaslight, by all the eternal powers;
I'm used to seeing her eyes blaze up in a wifely, knowing way,
For I know as I tell the tales she don't believe a word I say.

JEUNE SIECLE HAIRDRESSING.

Smart women nowadays are taking particular care of their hair, recognizing the fact that it decidedly is "woman's crown of glory." They are dressing it tastefully and artistically, and do not hesitate to visit specialists in hair treatment and artists in arrangement. Miss D. Honig, formerly of the Emporium, has recently established herself at 241-243 Geary street, the Waldorf Hair Parlors. Miss Honig who has had wide experience, is prepared to give her personal attention to all customers. She has no branch parlors and can thus give her entire time to the Waldorf. Her establishment is not wholly given over to hair dressing. There are manicure, chiropodist and facial work departments, beautifying the human form and face being a necessary adjunct now to what were some years ago only parlors for shampooing and hairdressing. Miss Honig's establishment is modern in every respect. The Waldorf Hair Parlors also carry the most complete line of fine shell goods obtainable outside of New York. The Waldorf is well stocked with the latest things in French hair goods, cosmetics and perfumery. Wig making is a specialty. Telephone, James 4471.

The Wrong War Dragged In

John Drew went to Blingum Sunday and then Blingum came to Drew. There is an affinity between Frohman's distinguished leading man and Blingum. It was Monday night last, at the Columbia, that Blingum returned the Drew call. The opening night of "The Second in Command" savored of a swell social function. Mr. Drew's polite and prosperous friends were all over the house. If the actor could have been induced to respond to the curtain calls with one of those professional talks with which so many of the profession are equipped it would have been just as though he were chatting with some of his friends in the Tobin drawing room. But he wisely stuck to his trade, and refrained from inflicting the audience with the familiar blast of hot air which enthusiastic auditors usually inhale with ravenous relish. "The Second in Command"is a highly entertaining play. It has one of those simple, sedative plots that supply dainty diversion without taxing the brain. You follow it knowing whither it will lead, and yet you enjoy every step of the way. There are no cryptic complications that compel close attention. You can miss a line without losing the thread, and incidentally you are amused by the cheap chauvinism which the British playwright employed by way of developing the plot. He sends the soldiers to South Africa to fight against the Boers when he could just as well have utilized some other war in which the impotency of his countrymen evoked less jeers and tears. The martial atmosphere and patriotic exaltation that pervade "The Second in Command" would be more impressive under different circumstances. It is hard to take seriously the fuss and feathers incident to the attempted conquest of a little band of brave but deluded Boers. There is something droll about the heroism which wins Victoria crosses in such a struggle. England had other days and better opportunities for heroics. No playwright should care to immortalize British bungling in the Veldt. Imagine Dave Belasco seeking to stir up patriotic enthusiasm with palaver about the capture of Manila by the California First Regiment. Nevertheless Captain Marshall's play is one that entertains and touches the heart strings, but in spite and not by reason of the misplaced heroism in which his characters are steeped. In Major Kit Bingham, the good-natured chap who gets recompensed with a Victoria cross for all his failures to get the prize just within reach, Mr. Drew has a peculiarly congenial role. He is surrounded moreover by an adequate but not a strong company. Mr. Standing is of course all that could be desired as Colonel Anstruther. His is a fine figure in soldier raiment, with the addition, perhaps, of a pair of corsets. But real soldiers wear those off duty. There is a slight suggestion of a family affair about the company for it includes Miss Drew, daughter of John Drew, and his nephew, Mr. Barrymore. The latter exhibits some of the talent which runs in the family on both sides, but I fear that Miss Drew has gone back several generations for the talent she possesses for it is not of the histrionic variety. She has been with the company all season, but she has none of the sparkle of the ingenue. Ida Conquest is a reliable Frohman leading lady, but as Muriel she seems a trifle out of drawing. She has not the knack of concealing the artificiality of her work.

Anent Leading Women

Annette Marshall is to be succeeded by Fannny McIntyre who comes direct from New York and is said in the advance notices to be "beautiful and versatile." Miss Marshall possesses the latter quality but it was not enough to ensure her a continued place in the affections of the patrons of the theatre where she has been leading lady for some months. She is a good actress, her emotional work is fine, but alas! she lacks the pulchritude that Maxine Elliott deplores as her possession. Miss Marshall's increasing avoirdupois also goes against her. she were a trifle slimmer she would be a more graceful heroine. It is hard to get an acceptable leading woman nowadays for a stock theatre and no one seems to find that fact more true than do Messrs. Belasco and Tfall. The management of the Alcazar coped for years with the problem and never got it wholly worked out to their satisfaction. Gertrude Foster came nearest to a perfect leading woman, but her talent could not win her the favor that her lack of beauty denied her. Leila Convere, the sister of Marion, was pretty and clever but not remarkably versatile. Her specialty was emotion and in comedy she was not so good. Gretchen Lyons was charming but she did not like the hard work of a stock actress. A new play every week means drudgery. It is good experience for a raw actress but too much labor for the one who has won her spurs. The Grand's best leading woman, all round, was Maud Edna Hall who served several seasons under the old management. She could do anything from Topsy to Camille.

Kathryn Kidder follows John Drew at the Columbia in "The Country Girl." This was a favorite play of Ada Rehan and Florence Roberts had it in her repertory for two seasons. It is hard to fancy the statuesque Kidder as the romping Peggy. Miss Kidder, by the way, has under consideration a play by a Californian writer.

There is really no use in Fischer's trying to put on anything but "Fiddle Dee Dee," which tests the sixteen hundred capacity of the house at every performance. Freda Gallick will next week introduce an imitation of Anna Held and sing the Held hit, "Mollie Shannon." George Clifton, for years with Fanny Davenport, will be Birdie. Myrtle Rosedall, the champion cake walker, and an electric ballet will be new features.

On Tuesday evening San Francisco Lodge B. P. O. Elks will have a benefit at the Grand. Harrigan will appear in "Waddy Googan" and special vaudeville acts will be introduced. On Thursday evening the 1902 committee Knights of Pythias will have a benefit.

Frank Belcher will again be in English opera next season, with a New York stock company. It is a long time since Stanford Parlor's star baritone visited his old home, though many traveling Californians have heard him sing in the East and Canada.

The Mayor's new march, "The Yankee Hustler" will be on the orchestral program every evening next week at the Grand, Orpheum and Columbia.

Lotta Gladstone, who comes to the Orpheum next week, has a "Rube" monologue that is said to be very diverting.

In Henry Miller's company this season are Margaret Anglin, Ethel Hornick, Dorothy Tennent, Mrs. Walcot, Mrs. Whiffen and Lawrence d'Orsay.

The Latest Musical Hit

"The Wild Rose" is the name of the latest musical comedy. It is by Harry B. Smith and Ludwig Englander. It was produced in New York last week and made a hit. It has several catchy songs which are sung by Irene Bentley, who recently graduated from the chorus into prima donna roles, being a protegee of Mr. Smith. The song that makes the hit of the piece is entitled "She Is No Violet, She Is No Red, Red Rose." It is said that play goers will have to be vaccinated to escape the refrain:

"She is no violet; she is no red, red rose;
And though the lily of the valley's sweet, a sweeter flower grows.
She is no tulip rare in colors bright arrayed;
She's just a wild flower of the forest shade, that little gypsy maid."

Mr. Mansfield is talking about retiring from the stage for two years to write plays. Mr. Mansfield is the premier actor of America, but he is such a whimsical genius that nobody believes him. With all his idiosyncrasies, he has never neglected the box-office, and as he is assured of an income of one hundred thousand a year on the stage it is not likely that he will abandon his art to experiment in play writing.

Laura Nelson Hall, late leading lady at the Grand, is in the cast of "Little Miss Mouse" at Wallack's theatre, New York. The Evening Sun says of her: "Miss Hall was the only woman in the cast who possessed the slightest idea of the rudiments of acting. She had dignity, a charming presence and a delightfully sweet voice."

Oza Waldrop, the sweet little ingenue of the Alcazar company, is a Ukiah girl, the daughter of a Methodist clergyman. She is an immense favorite here and her talent will likely carry her on to a wider field of action. The Alcazar, by the way, has generally had good luck with its ingenues. Laura Crews, who was one of the best, now plays leads in a New York theatre.

A daughter of Jennie Lee, who created the part of Jo in "Bleak House," adapted by her husband, J. P. Burnett, is appearing at Wyndham's theatre in London in "The End of the Story." Joan Burnett is her name and she is said to be clever. Jennie Lee's "Jo" is well remembered by old Californians.

Mrs. Fiske's revival of "Tess of the D'Urbervilles" has been received at the Manhattan theatre, New York, with a popular enthusiasm as pronounced as that which marked the original production of this play at the Fifth Avenue theatre several years ago.

Julius McVicker, right from New York, is a new addition to the Belasco-Thall stock. He plays juveniles.

At the Show Next Week

COLUMBIA—John Drew in the second and last week of the charming play "The Second in Command."

GRAND OPERA HOUSE—Edward Harrigan in his fourth and last week. "Waddy Googan," the story of a happy-go-lucky philosophical hackman.

ALCAZAR—"The Brixton Burglary," one of the cleverest farces of the day, which caused London and New York to laugh for many months. On Tuesday the Companions of the Forest have a benefit.

TIVOLI—"The Singing Girl," still a reigning success.

FISCHER'S—Several new features added to the popular "Fiddle Dee Dee."

ORPHEUM—Picchiani sisters, eight in number, acrobats of agility and strength; Sager Midgley and Gertie Carlisle, both favorites here, in "Taking a Tonic"; Lotta Gladstone, the quaint country girl," new to us, in a "Rube" monologue; Little Elsie, the miniature Cissy Loftus, in imitations; Dooley and Towley, black-face comedians, in dialogue, songs and dances; Lew Sully, the Kelseys in "Uncle Phineas," Miss Chester and her statue dog.

A Notable Event

Mr. H. B. Pasmore has issued invitations for a pupils' concert to be given at Metropolitan hall next Saturday, the twenty fourth. A notable feature will be the participation of students who are pupils of Mr. Pasmore's pupils. About one hundred and fifty students will take part in the rendition of Max Bruch's "Fair Ellen," a cantata for soprano and baritone solo and chorus; Rossini's "Inflammatus" for soprano solo and chorus, and (by special request) H. B. Pasmore's "The Treasures of the Deep." There will also be solo numbers by Mrs. Florence Wyman Gardner, Miss Adelaide Birchler, Miss Beulah George, Miss Lida Benedict (of Napa), Miss Florence Warden, Mrs. Edith Phelps Collins, Mrs. J. Bardilini, Miss Anna Moore, Mr. Thomas W. Nowlan, Mr. A. E. Nowlan, Mr. Will L. Smith and Mr. Don Maclean Those whose pupils will be represented are Mrs. J. Bardilini, Oakland; Mrs. Edith Scott Basford, San Francisco; Miss Lida Benedict, Napa; Mrs. J. Lee Burbeck, Watsonville; Miss Kate Byrne, Berkeley; Mrs. Luella Wagor Coplin, Oakland; Miss Zueletta Geery, Milwaukee, Wis.; Miss Beulah George, Oakland; Miss Virginia Graham, Seattle, Wash.; Mrs. Mary Louise Carr Moore, Seattle; Mrs. Hillman Smith (now a pupil of Wm. Shakespeare), San Jose. Two pupils of Mrs. Smith, Mildreth Spencer and Alice Gussefield, will sing solos, and about forty will come up from San Jose to assist in the chorus, returning by the theatre train.

The Blanchard Recital

An appreciative but far too small audience greeted Mrs. M. E. Blanchard at her first song recital under the auspices of the Channing Auxiliary at the Unitarian church on Tuesday evening. A program of nineteen numbers was rendered, French, German, English, Scotch and Norwegian composers being represented and rendered by Mrs. Blanchard in her usual finished style. Where all were so excellently given it is difficult to individualize, but the "Ruhe Sussliebchen" by Brahms calls for special mention. The coquettish "Reveillez-vous" (Godard) demanded an encore which was graciously given. After the spirited rendition of the "Wild Hunt" (Johns) the singer was recalled to receive the well merited approbation of the audience. Mr. Fred Maurer at the piano accompanied in his usual delightful style. The second recital will be given this afternoon at a quarter after three o'clock, when one would wish for Mrs. Blanchard a larger but not less appreciative audience.

The Philharmonic

Next Friday evening in Metropolitan hall the Philharmonic Society, Giulio Minetti director, will give its second concert of this season. There was a heavy storm on the night of the last concert which prevented many from attending who would otherwise have been there. The Philharmonic concerts are invitational. This organization has been in existence for over twenty years. Organized in 1877 as the Orchestral Union with Mr. William Toepke as leader, it has ever since stood as the leading amateur musical organization of San Francisco. The concert goers of this city will recall the series of entertainments given by the Philharmonic under the leadership of Toepke, Hermann Brandt, Fritz Scheel and others. Mrs. M. E. Blanchard will be the soloist at the concert, and Fred Maurer Jr. will be the accompanist.

The choir of St. Dominic's church, under the direction of Mr. Hamilton Howe, will give a portion of Gounod's oratorio, "The Redemption." The junior choir, which recently gave the opera "The Bohemian Girl," will assist. Members of the solo choir are Messrs. Lillian L. Roeder, Eleanore Joseph and Ella V. McCloskey, Mrs. H. Clark, Messrs. F. Onslow, G. M. Long, Ernest George and G. R. Bird.

At the annual reception of the Associated Alumni of the University of California on Tuesday evening at the Hopkins Institute, an orchestral promenade concert was given under the direction of Henry Heyman. The selections were from ancient and modern composers, and included Moses' College Songs, arranged for orchestra. —The Music Critic

The Authorship Fad

"Dooley" has a good one in the Century. "A Little Essay on Books and Reading." Dooley gets it about right, too. "Th' longer the wurrld lasts th' more books does be coming out." I am going to skip dialect and translate: "Day by day I read in the papers announcements of new publications that look like the delinquent tax list. There is a publisher in every block, and in thousands of happy homes some one is plugging away at the romantic novel or whaling a poem out on the typewriter upstairs. A family without an author is as contemptible as one without a priest. Is Malachi nearsighted, peevish, averse to the suds and can't tell whether the tree in the front yard is blue or green? Make an author of him! Does Miranda present no attraction to the young men of the neighborhood, does her overskirt drag, and is she poor with the gas range? Make an authoreen of her." That word authoreen is great, isn't it? "Reading is not thinking. It seems like it, and when it comes out in talk sometimes, it sounds like it. It's a kind of near-thought that looks genuine to the thoughtless, but you can't get anything out of it. Many a man I've known has so doped himself with books that he'd stumble over a carpet tack And do I object to the pursuit of literature? O, faith, no. As a pursuit it's fine, but it may be bad for any one that catches it. Reading is talked about by all reading people as though it was the only thing that makes a man better than his neighbors. But the truth is that reading is the next thing this side of going to bed for resting the mind. With most people it takes the place of work. Carnegie knows his business. He's studied the situation and he understands that if he builds libraries enough and gets enough people reading books there won't be any one left after awhile capable of taking away what he's got. You bet he didn't learn how to make steel billets out of 'When Knighthood Was in Flower.' He learned it by confabulation after working hours with some one that knew how."

Good Advice Which Will Perhaps be Followed

Ella Wheeler Wilcox's "Answers to Correspondents" column is as interesting and entertaining as such departments generally are, when it is read in the proper spirit. Ella does not condescend to go into particulars as to the renovating of old gowns nor the swapping of patchwork squares, but in heart agonies she is to be depended upon. She knows how to prescribe for marriage and divorce and keep clear of either, and can give expert advice in religious crises and business troubles. It need not spoil the fun of the onlooker that one more than suspects a figure of straw set up to be preached at. Not long since a miss of thirteen who was in need of advice and presumably had no relatives nearer than the open columns of the Examiner to consult, buttered her parsnips by expressing her great admiration for E. W. W. and asked for autograph copies of books. Even supposing that the precocious thirteen-year-old is non-existent, the advice given to the world through the medium of the correspondent, is sound enough—to buy the books that are wanted and send them to be autographed. Authors are annoyed to the verge of endurance by such unbusinesslike requests, but—canny Ella—we all know the story of the careful mother who counseled her brood not to drink any ink while she was gone.

Some busy discoverer has unearthed what to him is as good as a fact that the Dora of "David Copperfield" was a real character, the first love of the novelist. He comments on the "dreadful Miss Murdstone" who had charge of the childlike Dora, but if the rest of his delving has been no more accurate than this we can afford to pass the whole matter over. Miss Murdstone was the sister of David's stepfather, and was routed from the scene by Aunt Betsy Trotwood when David was yet a child. She did her best to spoil Dora more than ever if any indulgence could have accomplished it, and neither she nor the two little canary-bird aunts who took the full-grown infant into their house after her father's death had anything dreadful about them. Aunt Betsy's appearance may have been formidable, but she was not fearful, and any one who has read "David Copperfield" ought to be in no danger of confounding any other character with either of the Murdstones.

DISHONEST METHODS EXPOSED

THE LAW WILL NO DOUBT PUT A STOP TO SUCH CONTEMPTIBLE MEANS.—"THE MONITOR" SHOWS UP THE DISHONEST METHODS OF A RIVAL.

All the leading newspapers have rallied to Mr. George Mayerle's assistance in the annoying circumstances which have been forced upon him.

CALLS IT PIRACY.

The Monitor, the leading Catholic newspaper of the Pacific Coast, in its issue of May third, on page 97, says: "An instance of business piracy unparalleled in this city's commercial history, whereby an attempt was made to rob an enterprising optician of the fruits of his intelligence and experience, has come to light. The offended party is George Mayerle of 1071 Market street, whose ability in his profession has won for him the public encomiums of men enjoying the highest positions in the country. Mr. Mayerle, by reason of his honesty and skill, has won a large and rapidly increasing clientele. His success attracted the envy of certain parties, who secured a store next door to Mr. Mayerle's, and, by making its appearance very similar to his, confused a number of persons. The firm that used this contemptible means of winning success styles itself 'Mayerle & Co.' It has absolutely no connection with the optical institute conducted by George Mayerle, the number of whose establishment is 1071 Market street. Those who intend visiting the latter's establishment should, to avoid mistakes, look for the full name, George Mayerle, and a crown on every window; also the number, 1071."

History and Novels

F. Marion Crawford defends the historical novel on the ground that most of our histories are such dry-as-dust compilations that they make uninviting reading except to the delver after facts. History, for many generations, has been little more than condensed statistics of battles varied by brief accounts of court intrigues. So far as any book evidence to the contrary, the people below the rank of the nobility were of the happy order who had no history. Greene's "History of the English People" is the best, if not the first attempt to make history anything but a bare skeleton. The historical novel undeniably makes history live, but the great danger is that readers will rely upon it for their facts instead of making it supplementary. The novelist is not bound by considerations of accuracy, such as should confront the biographer or historian, nor is he obliged to make even a show of non-partisanship. The result is not conducive of clear vision on the part of the reader who is apt to be biased and narrowed by the view of his favorite writer. It is perhaps, an immaterial point, since devourers of fiction of any kind are not apt to spend much time in independent thought, while those to whom fiction is a recreation only, will be wise enough to read both sides of a question before coming to a conclusion.

Winston Churchill, the author of "Richard Carvel" and "The Crisis," does not believe an author has the right to go counter to general opinion if he deals with historical characters. He believes that statues should be left on their pedestals and figure heads should figure. Those fortunate fellows who have been set up as objects for worship should be worshiped for all time to come, while those who have not received their due from their own generation need not look to rehabilitation from posterity. He thinks a great wrong would be done in belittling Washington or Lincoln or any other popular hero, but the ones who have not had a fair chance should be left to lie where they have fallen even though proof should be discovered which would lighten the ignominy of one who has been execrated. It would be better not to disturb public opinion. It is pretty evident from this that Charles Felton Pidgin can look for no sympathy from his brother artist in his efforts to create a new Aaron Burr.

The ex-Empress Eugenie recently completed her Memoirs, upon which she had been engaged since the death of the Prince Imperial, but as the volume is not to be published until twenty-five years after her death, the curious-minded will have to possess their souls in patience.

It has been the fashion for lo! these many years to decry the English language as a medium of expression and to point to the French as rich in words indicating delicate and subtle differences of meaning, but it seems that we are not so badly off, after all. M. Boutmy has recently pointed out that the French verb regarder has to do duty for look, stare, glance, gaze, glare, gloat, wink and peep. The translator of the Jungle Books has been obliged to use clumsy circumlocutions for trudge, homesick, wobbled, and other simple words, while such longer expressions as "for love or for money," and "singing them home" are lost in the mass of verbiage used to translate them. It is notable that in French books the people of all walks of life speak precisely the same correct language, though it is difficult to believe that they do so in life. There must be colloquialisms in general use, even if they are kept out of print.

Heinemann, the English publisher, is about to try the experiment of introducing some of the unknown American authors to an English audience. It is a truism that the minor British authors are better known in America than their brethren of the same rank are in England, but judging by the preliminary list which Mr. Heinemann has prepared, some of those selected for introduction are as little known on this side of the water.

The London Athenaeum gives currency to the story that when William Morris established the Kelmscott press he had never heard of that useful functionary, the proof reader, or as our English brethren will have it, the "printer's reader." It was not until after several volumes of reprints had been issued that Mr. Morris had it pointed out to him that there was any necessity for checking the errors of compositors, but as soon as he became aware of it he supplied the needed assistant. People who set a value on freak productions and poor workmanship are probably willing to pay well for these practical examples of the ignorance of the founder of the Kelmscott establishment.

A New York jury has found that the phrase "book rights" does not cover dramatic or serial publication. Naturally, the case will be appealed and it may eventually reach the United States Supreme Court for final decision.

OTHER PEOPLE'S IDEAS

From "The Conqueror," by Gertrude Atherton:

"Selfishness in public life is a crime against one's highest ambitions."

"The most astute of men, provided his passions be strong enough, can be fooled by any woman at once designing and seductive."

Hamilton: "The complexity of man so far exceeds that of the average woman, complexity being purely a matter of brain and having no roots whatever in sex, that it were a waste of valuable time to analyze its ramifications, and the crossings and entanglements of its threads."

Washington: "Be careful of giving too free and constant a play to your passions and your capacity for rancour, or your character will deteriorate."

Gouvernor Morris: "Don't you realize that no matter how hard a man may labour, some woman is always in the background of his mind? She is the one reward of virtue."

Hamilton: "In the management of men one of the most important things to bear in mind is their proneness to work forward from the weak, and backward from the strong. On the quality of the strength depends its magnetism over the weak."

Hamilton: "We cannot go through life successfully with the bare gifts of the Almighty, generous though He may have been."

Hamilton's idea of the millennium: "Someone to fight. Someone to love. Three warm friends. Three hot enemies. A sufficiency of delicate food and wine. A West Indian swimming-bath. Someone to make love to. War. Athletics. Books. Song. Children. A religion."

Hamilton: "Perhaps the Turks are wiser than we after all, for their wives suffer only jealousy while—most men being Turks on one plan or another—the women of the more advanced races suffer from humiliation, and are wounded in their deepest sentiments."

Hamilton: "Democracy is a poison, just as Republicanism is the ideal of all self-respecting men. * * * If we could suppress the spirit of democracy in time, we should also suppress the aspirations of encouraged plebeianism—a dangerous factor in any republic."

Washington: "Local prejudices have been, and will continue to be, the curse of this country."

"Genius must ever be imperfect. Life is not long enough nor slow enough for both brain and character to grow side by side to superhuman proportions."

"Jealousy and suffering give a woman, in a week, a fill of knowledge and cunning that will serve her a lifetime."

"It is a weak and dangerous sentimentalism which would protect a woman of commerce against the good name of any man. The financial settlement makes her a party in a contract, nothing more, and acquits the payer of all further responsibility. She has no good name to protect; she has asked for nothing but money; she is a public character, whom to shield would be a thankless task."

"For a born leader of men to care little whether he had a few trusted friends or an army at his back, would merely indicate a weak spot in his brain."

Hamilton: "There comes a time in human affairs when one is forced into a position of choosing between two evils; a time when the scruples of delicacy and propriety, as relative to a common course of things, ought to yield to the extraordinary nature of the crisis."

"Everyone who has written with sufficient power to incite antagonism knows the apprehensive effect of extracts lifted maliciously from a carefully wrought whole."

"Both men and women are allowed a great latitude in this world, they have little to complain of. It is only when the brain fails in its part, or the character is gradually undermined by lying and dishonour, that the inevitable sequence is some act which arouses the indignation of society or jerks down the iron fist of the law."

"Whether or not the soul is given a sentient immortality we have no means of discovering, but the most commonplace being is aware of that ego which has its separate existence in his brain, and is like to no other ego on earth; and those who think realize its inability to mingle with another."

Mrs. Croix: "Men are always philsophers when they are no longer in love with a woman."

"Gratitude is the privilege of a great soul."

Troup: "My instincts are strong enough to teach me that a woman whose whole exterior being is a promise will be driven by the springs of that promise to redeem her pledges."

Troup: "The customary failings of genius—ingratitude, morbidity, a disposition to prevaricate, a lack of common sense, selfishness and irresponsibility."

Muhlenberg: "To be a leader of leaders is a sleepless art; to lead the masses is play by comparison."

Mrs. Croix: "How everybody in politics does hate everybody else!"

"A man of today has to be singularly gifted by nature to shine above his ugly and uniform garb, whereas many a woman wins a reputation for beauty by a combination of taste with the infinite range modern fashion accords her."

OUR OPINION

National Politics

California is such a long way from the centre of the nation's political arena, and our dailies give so much attention to their personal affairs and so little to other things that it is no easy matter for people on this edge of the continent to keep posted in matters pertaining to the situation in national politics. Even the State leaders of the two great political parties hear very little of the gossip in the councils of those organizations, and know scarcely anything of the plans of the machine manipulators. Governor Odell of New York made a flying trip to this city two weeks ago, and he was shown a great deal of attention by the leading Republicans, not merely because of their desire to honor the Chief Executive of the Empire State but by reason of the impression that he is the logical candidate for President of the United States. They hope to be "close up" in the event of his accession to the chair, but the fact is that Odell is no longer regarded as a presidential possibility in the East. It is admitted that he has made a good Governor but he is supposed to have broken away from Platt, and is therefore not considered available. The talk in New York is all Rooseveltian, though the machine is against him. The Republican machine has its headquarters in Wall street and Pierpont Morgan is the Prophet. That great financier thinks that Roosevelt is erratic and he was displeased with the President for forcing proceedings against the merger, and for promoting an uprising against the beef trust. Morgan actually believes that Mark Hanna could be nominated and elected. He thinks that the whole country is enamored of Wall street for giving the people exceptional prosperity, and that Hanna could win on the full dinner argument. He is also of the opinion that Hanna's position as head of the Civic Federation committee for settlement of the strikes would insure him the vote of the workingmen. On the Democratic side the latest most promising leader is Edward Shepard who was defeated by Seth Low for Mayor of New York. Not only does Tammany favor Shepard, but the supposition is that he would be satisfactory to Bryan. The latter has been lambasting David B. Hill in the Commoner, and the supposition is that his attacks are designed to advance Shepard's interests. The Bryanites in the Democratic organization of New York are notoriously enthusiastic over the mention of Shepard.

Plain Truths About Missionaries

Governor Brady of Alaska told some plain truths at a meeting of the Presbyterian Union in this city last Monday. He corroborated much that has been said by Town Talk from time to time concerning the futility of Missionary work under the present system. But his criticisms are not likely to be heeded. He declared that the men who go into the missionary field have no adaptability for the work which they undertake. Moreover, as a rule, they are encumbered with a wife and family, and they are more devoted to the interests of their own home than to those of the people whom they are expected to uplift. He stated that the seminary graduates who are usually chosen for missionary work know nothing of practical life. "We had one of them up North," he said, "who was a good diner, excellent at that, but lazy at everything else." When the people of an Alaska settlement had smallpox, Governor Brady related, the missionary looked at the sufferers through glasses. He was afraid to go near them because he knew he would be likely to bring the disease home to his family. As the missionaries conduct themselves in Alaska, so do they behave in nearly every other country. They are mainly a pretext for raising money for the support of officers of missionary societies.

The Treacherous Volcano

In future, scientists had better omit "extinct volcanoes" from their classification. It is doubtful if any volcano ever becomes extinct. In 1878 Professor John Milne was studying the active volcanoes of Japan. In the course of his travels he reached Mount Bandaisan which had never been in eruption within the memory of man. Certain suspicious signs led him to put her on the active list although she had never done anything wrong, but was just a beautiful, peaceful mountain, green to the very top. Ten years later, on July 15, 1888, with no warning and for no cause that anybody could discover, Bandaisan, like Mount Pelee, blew her own head off and scattered promiscuously sixteen hundred million cubic yards of rock and earth over the surrounding territory. She poured out a river of mud which in twenty minutes spread to a depth of one hundred feet over a region from twelve to fifteen miles long and from five to seven miles wide. Only four hundred persons lost their lives, because the valley was but thinly inhabited, but everything within the reach of the air blast was destroyed, trees being stripped bare and standing crops flattened on the ground like threads. It is supposed that the eruption of Krakatoa in 1883 was the most stupendous ever known. It might be supposed that this region of the earth, with forty-five volcanoes in the immediate neighborhood, would have proved a fruitful field of study for scientists, but it appears that they had totally neglected their opportunities. For two hundred years Krakatoa had done nothing, but when she chose to wake up she astonished the world, the scientists included. A conclave of local savants declared Mount Pelee harmless notwithstanding recent indications of disturbance, and in all probability learned men of greater fame would have concurred if asked for an opinion. Science is arrogant, but she is a guesser all the same, although she calls her guess-work "hypothesis." It is well to remember that even in the twentieth century we do not know it all and that old familiar Mother Earth retains some of her secrets.

About Fiction

Some of the Eastern papers are finding fault with Mr. Carnegie for his remark that he did not favor the purchase of fiction for libraries until it had stood the test of three years. It is claimed, and truly enough, that many books are good reading at the time of publication, but at the end of three years they are practically dead, so that if the libraries do not supply them when hot from the press the patrons are deprived of the pleasures of perusal until they are like a stale dinner, spoiled by being kept back too long. But it is worth while to note that Mr. Carnegie's ideas as to the functions of a library are somewhat old-fashioned. He does not regard the institution entirely in the light of a clearing house for the latest fiction, nor altogether as a cheap form of popular amusement. He looks back to his own boyhood and early manhood and to the restricted opportunities for study and information that were afforded to ambitious youth obliged to work long hours for meagre pay, and out of his abundance he is bent on furnishing something better to the present generation. Naturally, he does not consider it imperatively necessary that they shall devour "The Crisis" or any other novel, even though it masquerade as history, at the rate of half a dozen a week. He probably thinks there are sufficiently interesting and numerous works of history and biography pertaining to the period which the reader can find ready and waiting. He probably holds the opinion that while Colonial histories abound Colonial novels may safely be neglected, and while the average reader has but hazy notions of the customs and conditions of real countries, there is no especial haste required in familiarizing himself with those undiscovered countries whose bounds lie entirely within the brains of Anthony Hope and his followers. A novel which is not worth reading at the end of three years was not worth it in the first place. The people who are embarrassed at not knowing all about the latest favorite are not the ones who are apt to be at home with Dickens, Thackeray, Scott, or George Eliot. Not to have read "Trilby" in its time was all but worse than not to have gone to church at Easter, but who reads "Trilby" now, and who remembers much about what he did read? Yet the book is as good as it ever was. Who can tell off-hand what were the three most popular books at this time last year? Who feels deprived of a pleasure in not having read one of them? Looking on a library as an institution for furthering the intellectual development of the race, the fewer distractions there are in the shape of catch-penny sensations and bargain counter inducements, the better. Books are not necessarily good because they are old, nor poor because they are new. Many volumes of science which represented the advanced thought of their time become practically worthless because of later discoveries. Works of travel, exploration and kindred subjects become antiquated in the course of a few years because conditions change and development advances, but fiction, whether it be purely imaginative, or built up on a historical background, need suffer only because popular taste changes and style in writing varies from time to time. The essential requirement to make fiction live is that the story shall be good, and a good story is perennial.

Criminals in Their Variety

And now comes another learned professor to tell us that crime is only a manifestation of illness and that no one perfectly healthy can be a criminal. He backs up his argument by citing cases where people of wealth and position, having committed murders and thefts, have been saved from jail and treated in private institutions, with the result that they have completely recovered. He thinks the poor and lowly should be given the same chance, and then according to him there would be neither crime nor criminals. Very nice, but there is nothing new in it. We have all known these many years that when there was money back of murder it becomes mania. Ill-temper in the slums is translated nervous prostration when it reaches Pacific avenue, and old-fashioned colic is appendicitis if one can afford to pay the difference. But all of this leaves effects in the same place. A murdered man is just as dead whether some one slew him in cold blood because he was poor or whether he was the victim of a homicidal mania in a man of wealth. Dealers are just as much out of pocket when Mrs. Rich, suffering from a paroxysm of kleptomania, pockets a few jewels, as if it were a common burglar who had helped himself, and when madame's nerves lead her to fling expensive toilet articles at the maid, they are just as irrevocably gone to smash as when Bridget hurls the stone-china crockery at Michael in the tenements. It may be soothing to the vanity of the well-to-do that they are classed as suffering invalids, and it is a delicate business to draw the line in words when the law is supposed to ignore personalities, so that the lower end of the line reaps the advantage, at least in the name of the thing, but after all, what difference does it make? If we admit that insane people are not responsible, that is no reason why they should be left where their actions can injure others. A man who commits a murder in the heat of passion is not necessarily a bad citizen. He may be a vastly better man than the one he has killed. Yet he is liable to be hanged while another, represented to be insane and irresponsible, incapable of appreciating his act, is placed in an asylum for a few years and then turned loose, and the community must take the risk of another outbreak. A burglar is punished if he has not the means to pay for his acquittal but the kleptomaniac is pitied and coddled, though in truth it is seldom that a second offense is committed. The shadow of the jail generally effects an instant cure. One might go through the whole list of crimes and felonies, and call them by euphonious names, but in the end we would be back where we began, with no argument against punishing the offenders. There is more reason for executing insane murderers than there is for sparing them or for destroying sane ones. There is infinitely more reason for punishing kleptomaniacs than for enforcing the laws against petit larceners. since need may drive them to disregard the law of meum et tuum, while greed is the sole motive that leads to kleptomania. All these theorists and philanthropists, in their eagerness to benefit the poor, abused criminal, lose sight of society in general. They are so absorbed in their ideas of reforming and "curing" that they forget about punishing. Jails and prisons are designed just as much to protect the innocent who are at liberty as to make things comfortable for the reprobates behind the walls. When a band of pickpockets and petty rascals is rounded up the community breathes a sigh of relief, not at the educational and moral advantages which the rascals are about to enjoy but at the safety, for the time being, of their pockets and tills. Police departments, when they learn that some big criminal has served out his sentence and is abroad once more, do not rejoice in his improvement under the humanizing influences of the chaplain and the Salvation Army, but they take a tighter grip on their clubs and prepare for action when they learn that he is heading in their direction. In a word, whether we call it crime or disease, certain classes are a menace to the peace of the community and they are locked up for the varying periods to keep them from committing depredations. The same remark so widely quoted in regard to the aboriginal inhabitants will fit the lawbreakers: A reformed criminal is a dead criminal.

The Saunterer

Woes of the Social Push

When one becomes familiar with the manners, customs, vanities and follies of local swelldom, it becomes a matter of surprise that so many of our gregarious rich content themselves in our provincial swim. I know that many of them prefer to scintillate as stars in their own little firmament than to flicker as tallow dips among the radiant planets of a broader sphere, but at times they must be sorely tempted to break out of the little orbit, confinement to which is so irksome. Last week I related that Mrs. Will Crocker had determined to shift her residence in Blingum because of the proximity of certain neighbors. I shall not be surprised to learn later on that she intends to hedge herself in with a triple barbed wire fence or a stone wall. A prominent Blingumite unbosomed himself to me the other day. "I'm going to move," he said. "It's just like living in a little village. They don't have anything to do down there except gossip. Jealousy is rife all the time and over such trivial matters as butlers and automobiles. One woman will boast that she has the best butler in the settlement, and then all the others will begin to knock. The men get into hot arguments over the relative merits of their equipages, and there is constant turmoil. And the latest thing I hear is that the list of delinquents posted in the clubhouse has become the subject of discussion around town. When such personal matters become the subject of common gossip outside of the club I think it is time to quit."

A Serious Problem

One of the principal causes for irritation in social circles is the bitter antipathy which many members of the smart set have for one another. It is well known, for instance, that Mrs. Will Crocker and Mr. Ed. Greenway do not like each other and exchange the glassy eye on all occasions. There are several well known swells who are personae non grata to Mrs. Salisbury, and all down the line there is bickering and there is dissension. Consequently it requires great cunning and diplomacy to give a dinner or any function without also giving offense to somebody. The host or hostess engaged in making up a list of people to invite to an affair has a very serious problem to solve. She may be the friend of both Mrs. Moneybagge and Mrs. Newriche, but they are deadly enemies. It is out of the question to invite both of them to the same dinner, but if one is invited and the other is overlooked there is trouble. Sometimes two deadly enemies are guests at the same function and then there is the ordeal of thawing out the atmosphere. It isn't all easy sailing in the swim.

Heney's Bold Brief

Francis Heney's brief in the Frost contempt case from which I quoted last week has caused no end of comment in legal circles. Attorneys agree that it is a far more bold and daring brief than the one filed by Robert Y. Hayne in the Fair case. Hayne's criticism of the Court was done in covert language. He resorted to innuendo and irony. It was a brief that required interlinear reading to be appreciated, but Heney did not even equivocate. His meaning cannot be misinterpreted. But Heney is a courageous chap, and he is never afraid to say what he means. He does his pleading in open court, and when he believes that opposing counsel enjoys the privilege of whispering into the judge's ear on the side he doesn't hesitate to say what he thinks of that sort of practice. When Heney went before the Attorney-General in Washington to discuss the Frost case he announced that he intended to criticize Amicus Curiae Pillsbury in pretty severe language, and that as Mr. Pillsbury was in town he thought it proper to suggest that the gentleman be notified. The Attorney-General thought so, too. The hearing was postponed and notice was sent to Pillsbury, whereupon the latter discovered that he had important business in New York. The whole story of the Nome cases will probably never be written, but if it were it would reflect considerable discredit on the methods of the local bar.

An Exhibition of Daubs

This year's exhibition of the work of the students of the Hopkins Art Institute reached the lowest level attained by the young men and women of that Nob Hill barn since the classes were opened. Worse than mediocrity is the rule, and only a few bright drawings and some excellent sculpture relieve the monotonous poverty of the show now on. The Mathews' touch is in evidence on the walls of the gingerbread chateau. Save for the really good drawing of Perham Nahl and George Dammenberg, and the pleasing plasterings of the pupils under Robert Aitken, the sculpture teacher, the dozens of things on the walls are unfit to be shown outside of a kindergarten. It is a pity that in a city where nature seems to have established her workshop for her most beautiful productions, the only endowed art school should be made a home of mere faddism, and the seads of the dead patron wasted in the exploitation of the conceit and whimsical notions of a painter gone wrong. Out of the entire year's endeavor in the still life class not a single picture is shown, and in the entire painting class one canvas only is given to the public. The classes are both small and poor; the students of talent and ambition have revolted against Mathews' domination and the false methods attempted by this would-be dictator. They will not roll his paint puddings nor will they try to see the Thing as he sees it. Gradually in the past three years the number of students seeking inspiration and instruction at the Hopkins' has decreased, and the calibre of the matriculates has even more strikingly shrunk. Certainly the offerings of the Hopkins' classes are the same. The dues have not been raised, the scholarships are more easily gained than ever, and the population of San Francisco and all California has grown. But the continual water-cure administered to budding genius by Mathews, the pseudo Whistler of the West, has had its effect. The work of students speaks for itself and is a sad commentary on the pedagogical capacity of Mathews and a reflection on the keepers of the Hopkins' trust who employ him. Yet one of the dailies has stated that this is the "most important exhibition" in the history of the Hopkins' school. I suspect the coursing reporter of having written that.

The Lewers of Waikiki

Mr. and Mrs. Robert Lewers of Honolulu have been spending several weeks at the Vendome, and they expect to remain there for a month or two more. Mr. Lewers is a lumber merchant and one of the wealthiest men in the islands. There is no more magnificent residence in the islands than that of the Lewers' at Waikiki beach, and its reputation for hospitality is unsurpassed in that country renowned for its hospitable people. It was at the Waikiki residence that Mrs. Wall, the charming daughter of the Lewers, was married last October, and the wedding is said to have been the most elaborate affair given in the islands since the heyday of royalty. William Lewers, the actor, who made his professional debut with the Frawleys in this city several years ago, is a son of the Lewers' of Hawaii. He will be a millionaire some day, but acting is his fad and he is indulging it to his heart's content. He is a young man of unusual talent, and especially adapted for juvenile roles which he has been playing with great success in the East. Last season he was leading juvenile with Annie Russell, and he has just closed an engagement with Maude Adams in "Quality Street." Though he has adopted the profession by way of diversion, Mr. Lewers is a conscientious actor, and he is moreover a man of sterling worth and exceptional character.

Lucky Edna May

Poor Edna May! Only a few weeks ago I heard that she created a sensation in London by appearing in some public place wearing the family jewels of some East Indian potentate. And now the cable tells us that she is the corespondent in a divorce suit in which the Earl De La Warr figures as the gay and giddy defendant. But to be mixed up in the domestic dissensions of the nobility isn't so bad for a girl who a few years ago was doing the best she could in the second row of the chorus. Edna May is comparatively unknown to San Francisco theatre-goers, but she has enjoyed great vogue in London. Indeed no American actress ever thrilled the British chappies as did Edna May. Her rise in the theatrical profession was of the meteoric order. A few years ago she was to have appeared in the chorus of "The Belle of New York" but one day the prima donna failed to materialize at rehearsal, and Edna May was selected to read the lines. The part was that of a Salvation Army girl, and being of demure mien the fair Edna was well suited to it. She read the lines so cleverly that she made a hit with the management, and they decided to give her the role. Her success was instantaneous, and her salary was raised from thirty to five hundred dollars a week. She went to London with the company and scored a tremendous hit. Yet she is far from being an artist. She has little voice and no musical training, but she is an exquisite beauty of the Puritan type. She was born in Syracuse, New York, where her father is employed as a letter carrier. Since attaining prosperity she has been accompanied by her mother on all her trips, and she always has her sister in the chorus.

To Break Newhall

Echoes of the late street railroad strike are still to be heard. I was told the other day the story of why the railroad directors were suddenly persuaded to grant the demands of the strikers. They were discussing the question of wages, and Messrs. Tobin and Holbrook were supporting the cause of the workingmen, but they were meeting with opposition. Presently in came the news that Mr. George Newhall of the Union street road had made a grand-stand address to his men during the course of which he declared that he believed in high wages and that he would pay them whatever the United Railroads were forced to give. The syndicate directors immediately came to an agreement, it being the consensus of opinion that there was no better way of hastening the bankruptcy of Newhall's road.

The Reason Why

Alvinza Hayward was asked the other day if he had moved his offices into his magnificent new building at the corner of California and Montgomery streets.

"No," he said, "my offices are in the Hobart building."

"Isn't it rather strange," he was asked, "that you should have a fine new building, and not have your offices in it?"

"I don't think it is strange," he replied, "you see, rents are very high in my building."

A Famous Singer in the State

I have seen no mention in the papers of the presence of Emma Thursby in California. Yet from a private letter from New York, I learn that Miss Thursby is now in California on a pleasure trip. The great singer has many friends in San Francisco who would be glad to welcome her, and treat her to some of the dinners and receptions which Mrs. Gertrude Atherton is now enjoying. Miss Thursby's last visit here was during her concert tour of the coast. Before that she had been here with the Thomas orchestra. One of the remembered incidents of the Thomas concerts was in connection with a farewell matinee. Miss Thursby had sung and, as it was her good-bye number, the audience wanted her to respond to an encore. The autocratic Thomas would not allow it. The audience insisted and the scene became almost an uproar before the singer returned to the stage to bow her thanks.

A Californienne, Miss Thursby's Pupil

Among Emma Thursby's pupils is Mabel Custer, a Californian girl who now holds the position of solo alto of Christ Memorial Reformed Episcopal church in Philadelphia. Miss Custer's parents were pioneers of Folsom, but they also lived in San Francisco. Her father, William A. Custer, is an official of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company, and the family has lived in the Quaker city for some years. They hope, however, to return some day to California. Mabel Custer is a remarkably pretty girl and her voice has been highly cultivated. She studied with Marie Withrow of this city before becoming Miss Thursby's pupil. She is a member of the Caecilian quartet, which has given concerts on the Eastern circuit, and the other members of which are Miss Helen Trautwine, Miss Jeannette Craig and Miss Bella Tomlins.

Mrs. Abby Parrott

It is remarkable how little is generally known of the antecedents of that estimable woman, Mrs. Abby Parrott, whose serious illness was mentioned exclusively in these columns last week. Yet from her has sprung the most exclusive coterie in California's smart set. Mrs. Parrott is of Irish extraction, and she was reared in a purely Irish community in a real Yankee State. She was a Miss Maher, daughter of an Irish farmer of sterling worth, whose family was included in the little Irish settlement in the way-down-East state of Maine. The little village is known as Whitefield, and it is a farming community situated near Gardiner on the Kennebec river. Mrs. Parrott was educated in a seminary at Emmetsburg, Maryland, which was the most aristocratic Catholic school for young ladies in the country. After graduating from the school she became a teacher in the institution, and while so employed she met John Parrott, the Californian banker. He had a daughter by his first wife and he sent her to the Emmetsburg seminary. While visiting her he met Miss Maher, and it was there the courtship began.

The Stork Made Him Quit

An old-timer was discussing my "reminiscences" the other day at the Bohemian Club, and he told a good story about the late Judge Hager. Of course we all know that D. O. Mills was a grocer in Sacramento, that his brother, Edgar, was a drayman, that old "Bob" Hamilton, one of the founders of the firm of Baker & Hamilton, handled freight as a truckman in Sacramento, that Charley Crocker sold newspapers in the streets of Troy, New York, and that his brother, Clark W. Crocker, father of Henry J., Mrs. Van Fleet, Mrs. Bob McCreary and Mrs. Buckbee, worked a small rented ranch in Yolo county until brother Charley forced him into the firm of Sisson, Wallace & Co. and made his fortune; also, that Stanford and his confreres were tradesmen, but it is new to most people that Judge Hager, the learned jurist, was once a "doctor" in this State. The old-timer told the story of Hager's medical experience. It was in Yuba county in the early days. Malaria broke out in one of the mining camps, and Hager quickly sent to town for pills warranted to cure. Then he hung out his shingle and did a thriving business for the pills were effective. But a woman ended his medical career. She was the only woman in the camp. Late one night the doctor was hastily summoned to attend a case of stork visitation. He was filled with consternation, but promised to respond at once. He dressed himself, went to his shack stable, saddled his mule, and made haste to Sacramento. He never resumed practice.

The Inevitable

A good story is going the rounds in Oakland about Master Mechanic Mackenzie of the Southern Pacific Company. A short time ago, so the story goes, he gave a boy a job in the shops of the corporation across the bay. After working about a week the boy went to Mackenzie and surprized him by stating that he had decided to quit work.

"Is the work too hard for you?" asked Mackenzie.

"Oh, no, it's not too hard," said the boy. "I like the work, but I don't like the men."

"What's the matter with the men?" he was asked.

"They're in the habit of calling you all sorts of bad names and I don't like to listen to them."

Mackenzie patted the boy on the shoulder. "Oh, don't mind that," he said, with a smile, "after you've worked for me a few years you'll be calling me bad names, too."

A Coincidence

The other day I read that the J. B. Haggins had leased White Lodge, in Newport, for the season. Thereupon I recalled the story of a somewhat remarkable coincidence. Seven years ago Lispenard Stewart, the wealthy bachelor, opened White Lodge to his friends. He gave a house warming there, which function took the form of a dinner, and every man, with one exception, subsequently married the girl whom he escorted in to the dining-room on that occasion. The one exception was Tom McCaleb, the well-known cosmopolite, who spends most of his time of late in this city. The most prominent couples that were enjoying single blessedness in those days, and are now married, were Cornelius Vanderbilt and Grace Wilson, Clarence Mackay and Katherine Duer, Jack Livermore and Josephine Brooks, Harry Payne Whitney and Gertrude Vanderbilt.

Boy Choirs and Dr. Stewart

The word has been passed that the reason Dr. Stewart does not care to remain in Boston as organist of Trinity church is that he is not in sympathy with boy choirs. But this is singular, since it was this very lack of sympathy with boy choirs that recommended Dr. Stewart to the position from which he has just resigned. When the organist's place was vacant, there were two applicants for the stool. One was Dr. Stewart and one Professor Louis H. Eaton, now organist of Trinity church in this city. The rector of Trinity, Dr. Donald, favored Mr. Eaton who was then in New Bedford, Mass., visiting his parents. But Rev. Dr. Hutchinson being consulted said: "If it is a director for a vested choir of men and boys, then have Eaton, by all means; but if it is to direct a choir of mixed voices, Stewart is your man." Trinity's choir being the latter, Dr. Stewart received the call.

Professor Eaton has made his greatest successes with boy choirs, and under his direction that of St. Paul's in Milwaukee become one of the finest in America. But he is very well satisfied to direct a mixed choir. Since coming to San Francisco he has given a number of free organ recitals with a view of spreading that form of musical culture among us. Dr. Stewart and Mr. Eaton both work on very much the same lines, and both believe sincerely in the free organ recital as a means of culture. I have never heard Dr. Stewart advance his views on boy choirs, but then he has always directed churches where there were choirs of mixed voices.

Entertains Political Lights

It is not always the society women who capture the lions and lionessees that drift this way. When Chinese Minister Wu's wife was in San Francisco en route home, not a woman's club managed to get her to grace a function, but she went to Mrs. William Willis' to dinner. And when Governor Odell of New York was here, though he refused invitations right and left, he accepted that of Mrs. Willis. If there is anything like a salon in San Francisco at the present time Mrs. Willis' parties may be construed to be it. Her dinners partake of political affairs, for they usually have a politician or two among the guests. Mrs. Willis is a widow and though she is still well on this side of forty and as pretty as she was at eighteen, she shows no desire of taking a second husband. Before Will Haslam of Santa Cruz married W. H. Alford's sister, there was talk of his engagement with the charming widow, but it turned out to be but talk. Mrs. Willis' late husband left her with a fine income. When she is not traveling New Yorkward or on the continent she is entertaining at her California street home. Her niece, India Scott, was married not long ago to Arthur Spear. Mrs. Willis' only child, a son, died some years ago.

Federation Aftermath

The returns are now all in from the recent congress of women's clubs in Los Angeles. The air is full of anecdotes and the broad-minded women are saying smart things about one another. The women who are not broad are just as sorry as they can be for the broad sisters. Mrs. Lowe, who is really a good fellow and has never for a moment, as I am told, claimed partnership with the Divine, has a repertory of excellent stories which she sprang on the Federation, and which are still being talked about. It was remarked by one of the sisters that all Mrs. Lowe's stories relate in some way to her twenty servants. When you hear them you cannot fail to realize that she has a very costly household. A splendid epigram was that of Mrs. Decker whose frequent widowhood and marriages have made her an authority on those subjects. Being told of some sharp criticisms made upon a certain widow she said, "It isn't safe to be a widow. I always marry."

Those that were Shut Off

There was great disappointment among those who failed to get a chance to talk on the negro question. The female slogger, as she is known—the lady who objects because her digestion is no better than her reasoning powers—and those broad-minded beings who stand for the Universe were all primed for the fight on the negro question. They saved their fire for that debate, and when it came, so absorbing were their noble sentiments that they didn't realize that their opportunity had arrived. Every divinely ordained emotionalist longs for the time when she may tell how she and God stand upon some very obscure question, and not satisfied with telling she wants to vote on it. The eternal I is positive of its grounds in proportion to its ignorance. Mrs. Pennybacker of Texas moved the previous question whenever she thought things had gone far enough, and she broke the hearts of hundreds of sisters who had traveled thousands of miles to talk oracularly on the subject of the color line.

Bright Women But Dull Papers

The papers read were for the most part dry and uninteresting but the women were not. They were true sports and clever in daily speech. The goody-goody were outnumbered by the intellectually strong who occasionally dared to be original. The only compensation for the rather dull and respectable sessions was the lively election campaign. Apropos of this, a correspondent writes: "Women are great fools. They have always been and always will be. They clamor for empty honors and use their energies to increase their own nothingness. To see them pull the wires and torture themselves for the purpose of securing an election to some office one would be constrained to believe there was something in it for them. There isn't. There is no salary, no expenses paid; there is only the feminine privilege of working for nothing."

School Commencements

When everything else changes, and each season shows something different from its predecessor, the commencement season remains the same. The sweet girl graduate is just as sweet and girly, the brave boy graduate just as bashful and boyish. This has been a week of commencement exercises. Irving Institute held its annual musicale last week and on the evening after the pretty young graduates received their diplomas. Trinity School's graduation came closely upon that of Irving, and Trinity's boys and Irving's girls danced together at the graduation ball. Mills College's commencement exercises extended over several days this week, the closing concert being given on Tuesday evening. The Hitchcock Academy of San Rafael will hold its commencement and presentation of prizes to cadets next Tuesday evening, the exercises to be followed by a dance.

A Prince's Hut

Prince Cupid of Hawaii is adding to the attractions of his magnificent estate at Waikiki a real grass hut, fashioned after the kind dwelt in by his forefathers before the missionary came with the higher catechism and low-proof rum to snare the souls and bodies of the kanakas. Cupid's home is Pualeilani, the old park of the late queen dowager Kapiolani, the widow of Kalakaua. The hut is being made of pili grass from the slopes of Diamond Head and Punchbowl. This grass is very scarce now but its beautiful silky texture and its endurance fit it now as of yore for the thatching of a noble residence.

An Old Landmark Gone

By reason of the Ellis street fire last Saturday, an old landmark went up in smoke. It was the home of banker B. Davidson, the Rothschild agent during the fifty decade. It came round the horn in a sailing vessel and was screwed together. Not a nail was used in the entire structure. It was first erected on the lot now occupied by the Sutter street synagogue, but when the Jewish congregation purchased that property it was cut in two and moved to Ellis street. Davidson was a gay bachelor whose home was the scene of many brilliant stag parties. For years he had a fair housekeeper, a circumstance that rendered him socially tabu.

The Toy Republic

At twelve o'clock Tuesday last, the American flag was pulled down from Morro Castle. There was music, firing of guns, explosion of bombs, ringing of bells, a procession of floats, and a new Republic was born. The Hearst newspapers thereupon pointed with pride to the greatest achievement of yellow journalism. The Hearst newspapers precipitated the war with Spain, and are therefore entitled to the glory of having freed Cuba. But it remains to be seen whether the Cubans are much better off now that they are free. They are a volcanic people, as uncertain as the so-called "extinct volcanoes" that science tells us about.

It would have been better for them if they had been taken into the Union like Porto Rico, and then they would not have had to depend upon the whims of Congress. But the annexation of the Pearl of the Antilles will not be long postponed. A Cuban who is in close touch with the politics and business of the island told me the other day that his people realize that Cuba can never be more than a toy Republic.

The Bohemian Bruguiere

Pedar Bruguiere is back from the East looking just as much like a hoosier as ever. Pedar is the most unconventional of the Bruguiere brothers, and even the fashionable atmosphere of New York failed to affect his tastes. His brother Louis, who has the entree to Newport, tried to interest him in society, but without avail. Pedar is of a bohemian nature, and he looks upon people in the so-called smart set as vapid and inane. He is especially contemptuous of those that affect airs, and dislikes nothing so much as sartorial display. Evening dress he abhors, and I have heard that whenever he invited ladies to Sherry's he insisted that they should wear shirt waists. His wife, who was Madeline McKissick, is still in the theatrical profession, but she has not made much progress. Rumors of divorce proceedings are revived every little while, and I heard a short time ago that Mrs. Bruguiere expected to institute suit soon so that she would be free to marry a member of Grau's grand opera company.

"Who loves a first time is a god
Though he should be forsaken;
Who hapless loves a second time
Must for a fool be taken."
Thus Heine wrote. But what of me,
Who's loved not twice but ten times three?
Each sweetheart swore I was her god
As passion's path each time we trod;
But soon she'd say I was a bore
And then would leave me lone, heartsore.
Say, tell me, am I god or fool?
I've poor success in Cupid's school,
Yet I could fall in love today,
I'd love again, and love alway!

What London Calls Originality

It doesn't take very much to set London society to gabbling. The Duchess of Sutherland not long ago started the custom of leaving informal invitations to her dances on her calling cards. Thereupon her friends hailed her as a most original and daring creature, when possibly she was only moved by motives of economy. There appears to the American mind nothing out of the way, or even unique, in sending an invitation to a small-and-early on a calling card. Invitations to afternoon teas, card parties and small dances have been going out that way in San Francisco for years, and nobody thought of anything but its convenience. Now the telephone has taken the place of even the calling card with many. But they haven't reached the telephone stage in London yet. Telephones are not considered necessities by our cousins across the water, who regard them rather as impertinences than conveniences. If the Duchess of Sutherland should take to 'phoning invitations for dances she would no doubt be regarded as inaugurating a new social custom. The Duchess, by the way, is one of the four daughters of the fourth Earl of Rosslyn. She is a beauty like her three sisters.

Mayor Schmitz is reported to have construed the Rea victory in San Jose as a compliment to himself. The Mayor is taking himself more seriously than many people did just before our last municipal election.

The Crocker Scandal

The story of how Henry J. Crocker was frozen out of the San Francisco Jockey Club by his cousin Will Crocker and Prince Poniatowski has at last got into the dailies. I told the story months ago, and at the same time referred to the row between the Crocker cousins. It is an unfortunate family squabble, and it has been the subject of gossip in club circles for a long time. Henry Crocker was frozen out because the directors of the Crocker-Woolworth bank were very much alarmed over their race-track investment. It was bad business from the start—that of bankers engaging in a race-track enterprise. They were glad to get out of it, but they didn't emerge with flying colors. The bank received a black eye the traces of which will long remain. The Crocker-Woolworth bank may be a solid institution but it will long be remembered that it was once heavily involved in the management of a race-track.

It Was a Surprise

Will Crocker, I am informed, was amazed when he learned of the filing of the sensational suit by his hot-headed cousin. It appears that the entente cordiale was restored some months ago, and that Will Crocker believed that Henry J. had been completely reconciled. The filing of the suit was therefore like a thunderbolt from a clear sky. I have also been assured that the Svengali of the stock transaction was Will Crocker's secretary and not

Prince Poniatowski. Every time a financial loss occurs to one of the Crockers the Prince is blamed. That is perhaps because he is the mentor of the Crocker family, and does most of the thinking for them. The Prince, strange to relate, is the most democratic chap in all Blingum.

Van Dyke on Divorce

Our Supreme Court appears to think it time to call a halt in divorce cases. Divorce has been "easy" in this State for many years; almost as easy as it is in places where judges make a specialty of severing conjugal ties. The grounds upon which people are entitled to a divorce in California are as numerous as they are anywhere, and if no ground exists people who are tired of living together can agree to get a divorce, and get one without the least trouble. But the Supreme Court in a recent decision expressed its disapproval of divorce. Justice Van Dyke wrote the opinion and he said: "The marriage relation is the foundation of all society, and is not to be severed on slight ground or for trivial causes; the policy of the law, therefore, is against granting divorces." The policy of the law may be against divorces but surely our courts have not been, for it is a well known fact that they wink at collusion, and are always accommodating to people suffering from "incompatibility of temperament." But Justice Van Dyke added that "To justify a reversal of the trial court in refusing to grant a divorce, the record should show a preponderance of evidence against the findings." But the fact is that the trial court seldom refuses to grant a plea for divorce, and therefore the Supreme Court seldom has a chance to reverse a judgment in divorce cases even though it were willing to do so.

Death's Constant Claims

The Averys of Sausalito have had rather more than their share of Death's visitations. Two of the boys met their end by accident. Frank was shot some years ago when out hunting and Howard, who received military burial this week, was drowned in Lake Michigan when on a pleasure trip. Allie Avery, the daughter of the family, married Rev. Frank Reed, rector of the little chapel in Sausalito. But Mr. Reed became consumptive and they went abroad, where he died. Lieutenant Howard Avery married Carrie Coit of Belvedere. Russell is the only one of the Avery boys left, and he narrowly escaped drowning in his early youth. Before the Averys moved to Sausalito they used to live in Second street near South Park and the children attended Dr. Huddart's Academy, situated where Lackmann's wine cellars now stand.

It was a King's Gift

Charley Fair came into the possession of a time-piece with a romantic history the other day. I doubt whether there is another watch in San Francisco that cost half so much money. It is of the most exquisite and artistic workmanship, and great patience and labor must have been involved in the fashioning of its jeweled case. But its intrinsic value is hardly greater than its worth as an article of vertu, from the standpoint of the collector of curios. It was made for the King of Bavaria who was infatuated with that fascinating and reckless stage divinity, Lola Montez, and was presented to her as a token of affection. It came to this country as the property of a well known citizen of this city, now dead, a bibliophile, who spent some years in collecting curios as well as books in Europe. Following the example of the Bavarian monarch he presented the handsome chronometer to his bon ami, and from her it came indirectly to Charley Fair. He paid five hundred dollars for it, and it was undoubtedly a great bargain. The case of the watch is studded with pearls in artistic design. The pearls are of all sizes, and so thickly are they set that the metal bed is invisible.

From the Citrus Belt

Mr. J. W. Mitchell of Los Angeles has been in town all week. Mr. Mitchell is an attorney who dabbles quite extensively in politics, and he occupies a prominent position among the Democratic State leaders. At present he is the mentor of Mayor Snyder of Los Angeles who is regarded in some quarters as available gubernatorial timber. But Mayor Snyder's boom has not got out of the citrus belt. He foolishly came north without a guardian some months ago, and put himself on exhibition in the Palace hotel courtyard. The impression he made was far from favorable. Some of the "pollies" didn't like the cut of his whiskers, and others objected to the company he kept. The fact is that Snyder is a glad-hand expert and that in extending the warm member he failed to discriminate wisely. A gubernatorial candidate, like other men, is judged by the company he keeps, and the little Los Angeles Mayor rubbed up against some very bad characters. But Mr. Mitchell vouches for him, and declares that the people of Los Angeles will elect him Mayor again if he wants the job. Meanwhile ex-Governor Budd is still being urged to get into the race, but he steadily declines to become a candidate.

Old South Park

So Daniel Wallace is threatening to plunge South Park into litigation! South Park, now a relic of former grandeur, once the fashionable centre of San Francisco, was laid out by George Gordon, an Englishman. He owned the San Francisco Sugar Refinery which after his death was bought by Claus Spreckels. His widow bequeathed all her property to her brother, a man named Clark, who married Margaret Wallace, a servant employed by Mrs. Gordon. Daniel Wallace, who now claims the South Park property, is a brother of Clark's wife. He is the sole heir to the Gordon estate. A good deal of the social history of San Francisco had its origin in South Park. Only the other day I listened to an interesting chapter from the life of George C. Johnson, the Swedish Consul, who was a neighbor of John H. Redington, the druggist, Isaac Friedlander, Lloyd Tevis, N. C. Masten and F. de Cazotte, the French Consul, in South Park.

Origin of the Johnson Estate

George C. Johnson came to this city in the early fifties, as captain of a bark loaded with United States commissary stores. He sailed her up the Sacramento river as far as Nicolaus, tied her up to the bank, spread out awnings and settled down to take his ease. With a whole cargo of stores under deck, and his salary accumulating, he didn't worry much about the future. There he waited orders for two whole years when inquiry came from Washington as to his whereabouts. Captain Richard L. Ogden was detailed to look him up and the latter found the bark at Nicolaus. The vessel was enclosed with awnings, and going aboard Ogden found Captain Johnson swinging in a hammock, and his wife sitting in a rocking chair. They presented a picture of solid comfort. On inspection the cargo was pronounced worthless for issue. Ogden sold it at public auction. It consisted principally of pork. Captain Johnson bought it in for a dollar a barrel, and after cleaning off the rust and repacking it, he sold it in Marysville for sixteen dollars a barrel. On the capital thus obtained he went into partnership in this city with George W. Gibbs in the hardware business. He became Swedish Consul, was knighted and died worth three million dollars. The wife who in early days had kept a boarding house in Baltimore became one of San Francisco's Four Hundred. Her only son, Robert C. Johnson, became one of our later day capitalists. His wife, Mrs. Kate Johnson, inherited the estate which had its origin in rusty pork. She was a well-known patron of art.

Two of the United States naval officers who will have the good fortune to attend King Edward's Coronation ceremonies are well known in San Francisco, having been stationed here at different times. They are Admiral J. C. Johnson and Captain C. C. Todd. They are cousins and brothers-in-law, too, having married sisters. Mrs. Watson was Lizzie Thornton and Mrs. Todd was Ann Mary Thornton. Both were daughters of Judge and Mrs. J. D. Thornton.

Presidio's Smart Set

There is much rejoicing among our belles over the prospect of an unlimited supply of military beaux at social functions. So large has been the assignment of troops to San Francisco, the Presidio is reported to be cramped for officers' quarters. The newcomers are said to be a "jolly lot," and among those who have been at that post for some time past are many favorites. There are the Rawles, the Girards, the Rethers and the Haydens. Mrs. Hayden, who was Myra Lord, was born, brought up and married in the Army, she being the only child of the late Major J. H. Lord and his second wife. Major Lord was stationed at the Presidio for several years after the war, and the late Mrs. Lord, as Fanny Eaton, was a well known San Francisco belle. She was an intimate friend of Major Lord's first wife.

Coming with Her Latest Husband

Mildred Ackermann is coming back to California. Old friends of the Ackermann family will have a chance to see the beautiful Mildred's latest matrimonial catch, a diminutive Japanese nobleman who is only nineteen years old and wears the title of Count Goibara. Of all the California girls who have given Paris and London a thrill Mildred Ackermann goes to the head of the class. Three years ago her elopement with Count Vladoski was a three cornered surprise, startling the American colonies in Paris and London, and shocking her San Francisco friends. Immediately after the wedding Count Vladoski took his beautiful young wife to Smyrna and just three months afterward he died leaving his immense fortune to the fair Mildred. She wore the weeds most becomingly for a while and then sought to assuage her grief by sight-seeing. In Cairo the impulsive young Countess met and married a British officer with whom she fell desperately in love. Husband No. 2 was sent to the Transvaal and eighteen months ago a Boer bullet made Mildred Ackermann a widow again. She then went to England and joined some "Cookies" in girdling the world. At Yokohama she met Goibara who despite his youth must have been well skilled in Cupid's art. They did not waste much time over their "august ancestors" and in three brief weeks Goibara won the California beauty.

A Picturesque Pair

She at once took her "Jappy Jap Jappy" to Paris to show him to her friends there and he was viewed with more interest than a Satsuma vase. Madame Goibara has taken to the kimona and the pair would make a pretty picture for the Mikado's fan. All Paris tiptoes at them as they drive by but Mildred does not seem to object to the notoriety. She is buying furniture for a home in Yokohama where they will live the greater part of the year. Instead of "riding on the water wagon," as the long sea journey from Europe to China is called, the Goibaras will come to America and Mildred Ackermann will tarry in her old home before crossing the Pacific to the Geisha land.

A Dog Cemetery

Burlingame is to have a cemetery for dogs. It is not meet that high bred canines should lie in unmarked graves. A number of the kennels down there have recently been bereaved and the suggestion of a cemetery for the aristocratic dogs has been taken seriously. If the plans mature, the cemetery will probably be a modest miniature of that final resting place of the Parisian canine aristocrats, the Ile des Ravageurs. Eugene Petit, the great French architect, planned and laid out this cemetery and it is one of the show places of Paris. Behind the high stone facade and the iron grille there are gardens, fountains and statues as well as graves. Many of the graves have monuments wrought by famous sculptors. Barry, the famous French St. Bernard, who saved so many lives before a maddened wanderer in the snow mistook him for a wild beast and killed him, is buried at Berne but he has a splendid monument at the Ile des Ravageurs. So has Moustache, who went through the Italian campaign several times and saved the French army from ambush and attack. The inscriptions on the stones that mark the dogs' graves are a curious study. Some are clever, many absurd, and a few really touching. The inscription "I'Amie de son Maitre" is one of the epitaphs famous for its sincere simplicity.

Where Dogs are Pampered

There are a great many fine dogs down Blingum way and appreciation of them is not confined to the masculine gender. Mrs. Joe Tobin, Mrs. Frank Carolan and other women in that set are keen to recognize a fine dog. Of course English women are the cleverest judges of canine value although since American women have gone in for kennel clubs they can talk dog almost as knowingly as their English sisters. It must be said to their credit that the women in our smart set who are "doggy" go in for a healthy, sensible pastime. They have not made their dogs the excuse for extravagant folly as does the average French woman. The Burlingame dogs are not decorated and pampered ad nauseum. When Lurline Spreckels was out here she had a broad flat collar for her terrier, made of pale blue suede with a narrow wreath of gold filigree running around it and tiny gold filigree balls dangling from the collar. "That is nothing," declared Miss Lurline, "why, in Paris my dog would not even be la mode. To be really chic a dog must have anklets as well as collar pendants and their little coats must not only be elegant but strictly good form. There are certain fashionable establishments that cater exclusively to dogdom. They furnish everything that is newest in dog clothes and dog jewelry, dog kerchiefs, dog boots of india rubber and even robes de chambre of quilted silk for his dogship. In all things sartorial your true Parisian has a conscience. She may flirt with the decalogue or wink at Gallic morals but in matters of the toilet she is extravagantly conscientious. She takes her dog's costuming almost as seriously as her own." San Francisco women have not yet reached that stage of dog mania though a canine cemetery is being considered.

A Smart English Club

Fred McNear and Walter Martin, who are abroad with their brides, have been elected members of the Columbia Club, which provides accommodations for members of American clubs when on a visit to London. A number of prominent English society men, among them General Hubert Eaton, Lord Craven, Sidney Greville and Count Ward, conceived the idea of the new club recently, leased Avondale hotel in Picadilly and put the club on its feet. The entrance fee is two hundred and fifty dollars and the yearly dues are seventy-five dollars. These are higher than in most of the London clubs but according to the Californians who have joined it it is well worth while.

Another Bohemian Author

Another booksmith has bobbed up in the Bohemian Club, in the person of Charley Josselyn. It has been frequently asserted of late that the sponge of commerce had absorbed all the bohemianism in that world-famous club, and that nothing was left for the members to boast of but a glorious past radiant with the memoirs of distinguished artists, musicians and representative literati. But the plumbers and insurance clerks have not yet crowded out all the wits and men of genius. Charley Josselyn is one of our mercantile princes, but he does not spend all his time in the busy marts. He is a lover of letters, a most enthusiastic dilettante and not a superficial one. He has devoted a great deal of time to the study of Napoleonic literature, being a most ardent admirer of that great genius, and he has just published a biography which he has entitled "The True Napoleon." I have received an advance copy of the work, and I have found it to be a masterly account of the incidents in the life of the eccentric Emperor. It is a work which everybody who is interested in the character and life story of Napoleon will find instructive, for it contains information of a most comprehensive nature. The author modestly declares that it was not his purpose to write a life of Napoleon, and that the volume is simply a compilation of anecdotes and opinions. He adds that he makes no pretensions to originality but has simply grouped what he believes to be interesting facts. But, as he also states, the work will save many who are interested in the life of Napoleon the trouble of wading through many volumes to find that which they would like to know. It is a dictionary of events but the incidents are presented in a most entertaining manner. It is a notable addition to Napoleonic literature, and though it was labor of love the author is none the less deserving of credit. The volume is handsomely bound, and contains some rare illustrations. It is dedicated to that other well known Bohemian, Joseph D. Redding.

Other Bohemian Writers

Anent the development of a new author in the Bohemian Club, it may be interesting to know that Jere Lynch, the Egyptian scholar, is dabbling in literature again, and that a new lucubration may be expected from his by no means overworked pen in the near future. It may be also interesting to learn that Louis A. Robertson, who has taken the place of poet O'Connell in the affections of Bohemian Club members, is astride Pegasus once more, and that another installment of his verse may appear in the not distant future. His "Dead Calypso and Other Verses" met with great favor, and the volume proved a splendid seller. Robertson is now the Poet Laureate of Bohemia.

An Author's Mishap

M. le Roux, the celebrated French author and composer who was sent out from France to give the special course of lectures at American universities, has had some very amusing experiences in America, which he tells with great unction. M. le Roux speaks English fluently and at Mrs. Hearst's dinner party in his honor he convulsed the guests with an account of his most amusing mishap. Before going to Harvard to give his lectures, the Frenchman accepted an invitation to stay over in New York with some friends. His host was obliged to go to Canada unexpectedly and begged M. le Roux to make the house his own while he was gone. The knights of the "jimmy" were evidently aware of his departure and the first night after his boat left, M. le Roux was awakened by the clanging of the doorbell. The butler not answering, the Frenchman finally ran downstairs in his pajamas expecting to find a messenger boy. Instead two masked men confronted him. The burglars expected to see a cowering servant and had evidently prefered ringing the bell to breaking in. But at sight of the pistol which M. le Roux always carries, they rushed pell mell down the stairs, the Frenchman after them, wildly shouting, "Sergeant de police!" He could not give them far chase in his pajamas, with the snow four inches thick on the sidewalk, and decided that bed was better than valor.

He was Locked Out

To his horror he found that in his haste he had shut the front door after him and locked himself out. He punched the bell vigorously but the somnolent butler slept on. M. le Roux's teeth were chattering with the cold and he threw the door mat over his shoulders but the ice on it melted and trickled down his spinal column. Finally he remembered that the mansion next door was occupied by the parents of his host and he rang the bell there. When the servant opened the door M. le Roux rushed past him into the hallway without stopping to explain matters. He wasn't going to take any chances on having the door shut in his face. Before he could "explanate himself" the butler gabbed him by the collar and flung him into a room, and turned the key behind him. Then the man rushed to his master and told him that a crazy man was in the house securely locked up in the reception room. The gentleman decided that that was the best place for the lunatic and unless the man grew violent they would wait till morning before summoning the police.

So M. le Roux, secretary to the late Alphonse Daudet, author of "La Belle de Nevernaise" and other pastels in prose, foremost of French critics, dozed in a Morris chair, wrapped in the hangings he pulled down from the door. In the morning two burly policemen followed by the master, his wife and all the servants of the household, cautiously opened the door. "If Madame will retire I will come forth," said the pajamed poet, from behind his barricade of satin cushions. Fancy the surprise of the gentleman when he discovered that the man they had locked up for a lunatic was M. le Roux, his son's distinguished guest.

The Fair Fees

The published list of fees paid by the Fair heirs for services rendered in connection with the wiping out of the trust clause in the will of the dead millionaire was incomplete. Legal talent comes high but salving consciences is also expensive and there was a deal of that done in the Fair case. The story of that litigation can never be written with silver pens on ivory pages. One fee that was omitted from the list was the largest paid. But it was in the nature of a family affair. Hermann Oelrichs received one million dollars, half from his wife and half from her sister, Mrs. Vanderbilt. The money was paid for services rendered in representing the interests of the two sisters in this city during all of the protracted litigation.

A Bachelor Maid's Marriage

Miss Brice will be the maid of honor for Miss Gertrude Goewey at the latter's marriage with Mr. Havens next Monday. It will be the usual thing in weddings and the bride will wear white satin and a veil. Everybody thought that when Gertie Goewey forswore spinsterdom she would celebrate the loss of her liberty in some unique way. But in spite of her advanced ideas, Miss Goewey is like every other society girl when it comes to wedding. She wants it regulation or nothing. She is a very clever girl and rich by inheritance from her late father's estate. She showed her wisdom in selecting Mr. Havens as her bridegroom. He is not a boy but a man of years and experience. The Havens' will go abroad for a few months and will make their home in Berkeley.

The Welch's of Stockton

The engagement has been announced of Beatrice Welch and Mr. Elliott of Stockton. The Welch's of Stockton are quite wealthy. Mr. Welch is the owner of one of the big flouring mills that dot the channel and export flour to the Orient, and he is proud of the fact that he was once a poor man. When his eldest daughter, Grace, was married a few years ago to W. E. Elliott, who by the way is not related to the fiance of Beatrice Welch, a friend of Mrs. Welch hinted that it must have been a disappointment to have her daughter marry a poor man, out of her circle as it were. Mrs. Welch rose splendidly to the occasion, saying that Grace had no need of marrying for money, since paterfamilias had money enough for all. "I married a poor man," she added, "and I never regretted it." The prospective son-in-law of the Welch's is a young man with his way to make in the world. He has been given a position in the Welch flour mill.

Follansbee's Futile Flirtation

Jack Follansbee has always been listed with the ready raconteurs but he is equally facile with the pen. A fellow Bohemian recently received a letter from Follansbee and apropos of a gibe of the clubman Follansbee related an amusing experience he had while down in Mexico. Before he sold out to Hearst, Follansbee spent much of his time in the land of the sloe-eyed senorita. He had occasion to go to a small town where ennui stalked day and night. Jack was really boring himself to death until he discovered that the high window of the house opposite framed a blushing Mexican rose. He tried the language of the eyes but the maiden never quivered a lash. However he made up his mind to get acquainted. He hit upon the plan of boldly knocking at the door and asking whether the senorita would give him Spanish lessons. He was received by Mamma of course, who consented to let her daughter teach him, and the lessons began at once with the mother present. The third day Jack proposed a buggy ride and the senora graciously consented to chaperon her daughter.

Follansbee had to content himself with a lumbering, two-seated spring wagon, a case of Hobson's choice. He comforted himself with the idea that he could stow the mother away on the back seat and enjoy the senorita undisturbed. To his chagrin he found not only the mother but a brother prepared to accompany him. Moreover the mother calmly designated the back seat for her son and daughter and seated herself beside the disappointed Follansbee. The doughty Jack was hesitating between pitching her family into the first ditch or changing seats, when there was a wild clatter of hoofs down the road and four horsemen galloped toward them. It was the girl's father, her uncle and two cousins. "We never allow my daughter to go out alone," explained the senora, and with mounted relatives to right and left of him Follansbee finished the drive without even hinting a rearrangement of the seats. The moral of this story, says Follansbee, is "When in Mexico always take an orphan riding."

Mrs. Salisbury's Summer House

Mrs. Salisbury has taken a house in San Rafael for the summer and purposes giving the resort across the bay a little social prestige by her presence. She will have with her Miss Azalea Keyes and her daughter Margaret whose trousseau is now engrossing the attention of the Salisburys. Miss Keyes, by the way, is one of the great heiresses of society. Her father, W. S. Keyes, son of old General Keyes, is one of the best mining experts in the country, and he has accumulated a large fortune.

While ping pong is flourishing at the Hotel Mateo and in San Rafael, San Jose is enjoying a golf fever. There are several golf enthusiasts at the Vendome. Thaddis Grosscup, son of Judge Grosscup of Tacoma, is one and Mrs. Herbert L. Winn of New York is another.

Her Royal Appetite

The recent affliction of little Queen Wilhelmina of the Netherlands aroused the sympathy of women all over the world. The sympathy was especially keen because it was generally supposed that she was the victim of a husband's brutality, but from an occasional correspondent who has been sojourning in Holland comes a different story. He writes that from what is said in the immediate entourage of the two Queens—Wilhelmina and her mother—it is surprising that they are not always in ill health, so tremendously do they eat and drink. It has been said that even Gargantua himself would have shied at the banquets that are served to them daily. They eat six meals every day. To please her consort the young Queen has filled her cellars with champagne, Burgundy, Tokay and other exquisite wines of which everybody partakes heartily. She is an amiable little woman, says my correspondent, always ready to smile, bow and chatter, putting on her dignified manners only when it suddenly dawns upon her that she is a royal personage, but she is an awful gourmand. Whenever she travels she is always supplied with well filled lunch baskets and she seldom passes an inn without partaking of refreshments. The story is told that when she was touring Switzerland some time ago she was asked how she liked the mountainous country with its lakes and beautiful scenery. She declared that it was delightful because it stimulated the appetite.

Edward Wants It Cut Short

This from my London correspondent may interest those who will not have the pleasure of attending the big royal show next month:

King Edward has decided to make it as easy as possible for those who are doomed to swelter in the Abbey during the Coronation ceremonies. By his order the ceremonial is to be greatly curtailed. It will not last over two hours. It usually consumes from four to five hours and there is a record of one Coronation that lasted ten hours. But Edward dislikes being bored. He has ordered the omission of the First Oblation, the reading of the Ten Commandments, the Hallelujah, the anthem and final prayer. The Litany is to be reduced by about one-half its length, the Benediction is to be shortened, and the Coronation Oath itself is to be modified by omission of all references to the Church of Ireland. I have also been told that he has hinted to the Bishop of London that a short sermon will be greatly appreciated. Nevertheless it will be a gorgeous spectacle, that of the mammoth assemblage of distinguished personages arrayed in their richest uniforms and robes and jewels. And the ceremonial will be an impressive one notwithstanding the curtailment. According to the program which I have seen, after the taking of the oath comes the singing of the ancient "Veni Creator Spiritu." Then the King will remove his robe and cap of State, and seat himself in a chair near the altar while four Knights of the Garter hold over him a rich pall of silk or cloth of gold, and the Dean of Westminster takes the ampulla and spoon and pours in the oil with which the Archbishop anoints the Sovereign. After that comes a prayer and then while the King kneels he is invested with each of the royal ornaments, the crown coming last. About that time the trumpeters will blare out a fanfare and the guns of the Tower in the park will thunder forth a salute. The King has also decreed that his State procession shall be a short one much to the disgust of people who expected to make big money by renting their windows along the line of march which the Queen followed on the occasion of her Diamond Jubilee.

An Unwholesome Atmosphere

An occasional correspondent now in New York writes me that after a brief sojourn there, fresh from London and Paris, he has been forced to the conclusion that the social atmosphere of the American metropolis is as unwholesome as that of the giddy capitals of the old world. "Our preposterously rich," he writes, "are acquiring all the evil habits of the leisure decadents of France and England. Judging from the stories one hears in the clubs of New York, our Captains of Industry are rapidly wasting their energies in seductive dissipations of the character that delighted the old Romans. Intrigues and liaisons abound in our first families. The boldness of wives and the complaisance of husbands are astonishing features of the giddy whirl. Ignorings of the commandment that makes business brisk in the divorce court are so common that it is surprising that scandal is not rife all the time. Affairs between aristocratic married folks are known to everybody and admitted by nobody. Some of the most prominent married women in the swim are known to be the mistresses of some of our most distinguished millionaires who are fathers of families. It appears as though in society a man or woman can rise superior to mere moral law. It is only necessary for them to have money, and to make a bluff at being discreet."

A Characteristic Case

Continuing, my correspondent relates by way of example, the story of a multi-millionaire who is the father-in-law of a Californian heiress, and of a foreign nobleman, and who is identified with large railroad interests. Some years ago he made a superb sacrifice of himself for the sake of his children, by allowing himself to be made the defendant in a divorce suit. His ex-wife is now the wife of another millionaire who was her lover in the days before the divorce suit, and she is in society both in New York and Washington, though everybody is familiar with her past. Well, this millionaire—the one that made the sacrifice—is now essaying the role of Cavalier Servente to a society woman whose husband is his subordinate in a big railroad company's office. This subordinate is an easy-going sort of spouse and it is generally understood that he believes that in swapping a loveless wife for a life-long and lucrative position he's got the best of the bargain. His surname is a distinguished one in railroad circles for one of his relatives recently became the chief of a great transcontinental system and is famous in the world of finance. The woman is handsome. Indeed her picture was recently published in Sunday supplements as that of one of the most beautiful women in society. Even the semi-publicity of her affair with the multi-millionaire who takes good care of her husband has never affected her social standing.

Our French Visitors

That was quite a distinguished party of Frenchmen that arrived in New York last week. They came to assist in the unveiling of the Rochambeau statue in Washington, which ceremony takes place today. Two of the party—Viscomte de Chambrun and Comte de Lafayette, are great great grandsons of of General Lafayette. They are first cousins. M. Croiset is dean of Sorbonne University and comes to this country on behalf of the French Minister of Instruction, to study American methods of education. He will probably come to this coast. Accompanying the party are the Comte and Comtesse de Rochambeau and Comtesse de Chambrun who was formerly Miss Longworth of Cincinnati. The direct lineal heirs of the Marshal de Rochambeau, who assisted in the capture of Yorktown, died out in 1868, and the present head of the family, Comte de Rochambeau, is a descendant of a brother of Washington's comrade in arms. He is the possessor of the chateau of Rochambeau near Vendome where are kept many relics of the Revolutionary war. The statue to be unveiled today represents the French General in the act of directing the movement of troops.

Result of Blunder in Politics

The defeat of the Gage machine in San Jose serves to demonstrate the truth of the statements made by me at the close of the campaign in this city last year, regarding the bungling management of the Gage forces. I have contended for months past that Gage's interests were in unskilled hands, and that the Governor's prospects were being ruined by peanut politicians who though they prided themselves on their perspicacity were of the worst order of incompetents, lacking in tact, and unfit to cope with men of sound judgment. In nearly every instance in which the strength of the Gage machine was tested it was found wanting. And perhaps the worst tactical blunder of which the Gage forces were guilty was the appointment of Johnny McKenzie to the vacancy in the Harbor Commission a month or so ago. Though I am not a Gage enthusiast I volunteered the advice to refrain from making the appointment until after the State convention. The wisdom of that advice is now apparent. I have heard that McKenzie said he didn't want the job until after he had beaten Rea and the Hayes combination. Having failed to beat them he would now confer a great favor on the Governor by resigning.

Spooks Did It

Of course McKenzie finds it easy to explain his defeat. He reminds me of the battered plug-ugly of the prize ring who attributes his knockout to everything under the sun except the blow on the point of the jaw that laid him low. No doubt the Hayes brothers spent a good deal of money to further the interests of good government by restoring the uncanonized Rea to power, but the McKenzie faction did not show signs of being poverty stricken during the campaign. Money was spent lavishly on both sides. McKenzie would be nearer right if he attributed his defeat to spooks. It was a spook that directed the mother of the Hayes brothers to the iron mine in Michigan from which they are extracting the wealth which enabled them to purchase two newspapers and make a successful fight against Governor Gage and the machine which is popularly supposed to be operated by that Prince of political bunglers, Colonel Daniel M. Burns of Mexico. The ghostly element is a new one in politics and it is evidently hard to beat.

REFLECTIONS.

With a woman, never insist—persist.

Woman is a willing tyrant to a slave and a willing slave to a tyrant.

The woman too fond of buying can be bought.

Woman is constant but not consistent.

A harlot-hearted virgin is worse than a virgin-hearted harlot.

It pleases a woman to know that it pleases a man to please her.

It is woman's instinct to be virtuous; man's to be otherwise.

Woman is merciful but not magnanimous.

Woman is always better or worse than man.

Woman demands homage but accepts abuse.

A strong woman is only a little less offensive than a weak man.

You can convince a woman through her faith, her emotion, her intuition, rarely through her reason.

Woman is the moral conservator of the world.

MRS. NED GOLF'S LUNCHEONS.

Conversation between two of Mrs. Golf's dearest friends:

Mrs. One: I shall never speak to Nettie Golf again.

Mrs. Two: Why?

Mrs. One: You ask why? Read this paragraph in "Miss Gossip's Society Twaddle" in the Globe:

The Paragraph: Mrs. Ned Golf, one of Oakland's most happy entertainers, has just ended a delightful series of luncheons at her home on the Heights. Mrs. Golf knows just what menu is pleasing to the feminine palate, and her luncheons were charming. Decorations and everything were renate to a degree.

Mrs. One: Isn't that awful?

Mrs. Two: I was not invited.

Mrs. One: Weren't you? Neither was I.

Mrs. Two: There is Nettie now. I shall cut her dead.

Mrs. One: So shall I.

Mrs. Golf wonders why her two dearest friends turned their faces away when she met them in Broadway.

The Innocent Cause :

Mr. Golf (five days previous to the Globe paragraph): Nettie, I want you to lunch today two ladies, friends of my brother in New York. They are only passing through and can therefore stand for lunch only.

Mrs. Golf: Oh, Ned, our cook left last night. I got breakfast—but a swell lunch, oh, no!

Mr. Golf: Well, come to the Athenian, then—that'll suit them just as well.

At the club a Globe reporter is being lunched by an Oakland friend. Spies Mrs. Golf and two ladies.

Reporter: Who's that?

His friend: Oh, Mrs. Ned Golf, very rich and exclusive, fine house on the Heights, splendid entertainer.

Next Day: Globe office, Reporter and "Miss Gossip" loquitur:

Reporter: Did you ever see Mrs. Ned Golf? She had some ladies at lunch yesterday at the Athenian.

Miss Gossip: Oh, yes, I know who she is. Was it a swell lunch?

Reporter: You bet it was.

And that was all. —The Mathematician.

The Future of Sugar Stocks

Last week I said that Hawaiian sugar stocks bade fair to stay depressed for some time. Yesterday I had a chat with one of the most influential planters in the islands, and went with him over the entire situation. He is heavily interested in several plantations, besides being a leader in Hawaiian commerce, and has perhaps a more thorough knowledge of sugar matters than any man in Hawaii except B. F. Dillingham. He talked plainly, and with no attempt to hide the facts. "We are suffering from an over-production," he said. "That is, not Hawaii's over-production, but the world's. Sugar prices go in waves, high and low. Now the wave is low, and I don't look for a rise until the sugar growers plant less. In Hawaii, sugar stocks will not rise much for many months, perhaps a year or two. Many people have lost confidence in them on account of their meteoric fall in the past year or so. There is apparent reason for this, but I have entire confidence in the future. I think our stocks will never be as high as some of them have been, but there will be ample room for good investments aside from a purely speculative view. The labor problem came on us just when sugar went to the lowest notch. We have had to combat high prices for labor and low prices for sugar. It is marvelous how well Hawaii has stood up under the load she has had to carry. The labor question is slowly answering itself, and will adjust itself fully within a few years. We are not worrying about Cuban sugar at all. We could compete with free Cuban sugar even, until Cuba was able to produce enough to supply the entire United States. This will, however, not be for years, as the estates suffered very much during the years of war in Cuba by neglect and pillage. The worst near feature of the Cuban situation is that Cuba has such an immense quantity of sugar stored, ready to dump in this country when the duty is lowered. This is counted in the reckoning always and helps to keep the price down even at present. The Hawaiian plantations will be more economically administered in the coming years than ever, and savings will be made in directions never considered before. Salaries of head employes will be scaled down and wastes eliminated. Candidly, I would not advise any one to buy sugar stocks unless he could wait calmly for their rising and was not dependent on their returns for an income. I am satisfied to hold my interests and so are the best-informed men in Hawaii" This is a very fair statement from one as deeply interested in Hawaiian sugar as is this planter. However, I must add that a leading San Francisco banker, who made a trip to Hawaii recently has refused to invest any money there, and says he is disgusted with the outlook.

A Short Cut to Wealth

The American Co-operative Association, with offices in "Suit 15," Emma Spreckels building, advertises:

"A patron invested $100 with us; his average dividends were $5.15 a week; in less than five months he had drawn as much in dividends as his principal. Why not do the same yourself? We guarantee you against loss. Dividends are paid every Monday. We have been doing business for years, and never a loss. We accept accounts as low as $10. Write or call for interesting literature."

This reads invitingly. Five per cent a week is good interest, especially when one is "guaranteed against loss." Just how the concern manages to make both ends meet on such a liberal plan is hard to tell. Perhaps some Carnegie incognito is allowing his wealth to trickle through his fingers in this fashion. I would not advise investment until a good bond against loss had been filed.

Gossip on Change

But few securities were dealt in on the Stock and Bond Exchange during the past week, and there were few fluctuations, prices generally ruling steady although buyers were apathetic. Offerings generally were comparatively light as sellers, in anticipation of more extensive business, were not inclined to press their holdings by shading values. Gas stocks came in for some little attention, and San Francisco Gas and Electric Company's shares ruled steady at $44, while several parcels of Oakland Gas and Heat Company changed hands at $03.75, a slight advance. The sharp decline in values for Giant Powder shares noted last week was checked by a better inquiry for the securities and the price recovered a trifle. Awaiting the public announcement of the result of the reported conference between the officials of the Alaska Packers' Association and those of the amalgamated British Columbian canneries, there were but few offerings of the former stock, and these were snapped up quickly at $160. There was a lack of interest in sugar shares and what few sales were recorded were of small volume and at an easy rate. Dealings in bonds were unusually light, and investors showed no inclination to obtain the securities of the favored corporations of a few weeks ago, although offered at a slight decline. The five per cent bonds of the Bay Counties Powder Company were in fair request, and early in the week some $10,000 worth changed hands at $108.75. Sacramento, Electric, Gas and Railway's 5s were neglected at

News of the Oil Market.

Investments in oil shares are steadily increasing and business on the Producers' Exchange during the past week has been well distributed among the various stocks listed. Bidding has been quite active and although prices for several stocks were higher buyers showed no backwardness. Considerable activity has developed for the shares of the San Joaquin Oil and Development Company, and the price has advanced and is held firmly. Transactions were closed as high as $8.25, with buyers having a five days' option on the stock. Sterling continued in demand and sold freely at from $1.85 to $1.90, ruling firm at the former figure. The large Hawaiian contract which this company holds begins with the 1st of June, and with the encouraging reports regarding the increased development in its field conditions are most favorable to share holders. Kern has sold readily at $5 and Peerless has ruled firm at $9.25. It is unofficially reported that the Peerless company has absorbed the United Oil Company. The latter corporation was one of the largest distributing concerns on the Coast, and held contracts amounting to 35,000 barrels a month, running from one to eight years, at a price above the current market. Added to Peerless contracts there will be a demand for 90,000 barrels, which will necessitate large outside purchases of oil. The Aubert Oil Company is credited with a big strike of oil on section 13 of the Sunset field. It was made some time ago, but has been held a secret. The location is within 400 feet of the Sunset Queen, which has been the scene of numerous remarkable developments recently.

The price of Mexican dollars in San Francisco has fallen so low and the demand from China is so light that steamers for Mexican ports have carried back Mexican dollars, in order that they might be disposed of to better advantage. China's payments on the war indemnity amount to some $8,000,000 a month. To meet these payments, which must be made in gold, she is forced to market her silver and this more than supplies the demand in the far East for silver. The outlook in consequence is by no means promising for either Mexican dollars or silver and by some local financiers it is prophesied that silver will go as low as 40 cents an ounce. —The Financier

Mr. Clubman: What good luck Tom had in getting any girl to have him.

Mrs. Fashion: But what an unattractive girl he won!

Mr. Tailor: I wonder if he's paid for that bridal suit? It wasn't made at my place. I must dun him for that last golf suit he bought.

The Bride's Mother: Thank heaven! Kitty's married, and Tom's money is ours at last.

The Butcher: My bill will be paid next week, I guess.

Jack Jilted: Kitty'll regret this—Tom is sure to make her unhappy, and she loves me, I know.

Mademoiselle Rosette: A pretty penny this wedding cost Tom. I'm glad I got my two thousand checque cashed this morning. He might recall it had I waited.

The Mystery of George de Chateaubourg

One evening towards the end of last winter, Count George de Chateaubourg, the handsome Chateaubourg, as his friends called him, went to the Vaudeville theatre accompanied by his mother and his young wife to whom he had only been married two months. At the close of the performance, they were just about to enter their private carriage, when they suddenly changed their minds and decided to walk home, for the Boulevard Malesherbes, where they resided, was not very far from the theatre, besides the night was superb and the sky magnificently spangled with stars. The Count gave his left arm to his mother, while the young Countess, with a light step, walked on his right as gay and happy as a child, for to her midnight Paris was a wonderful world, which she had only seen from her carriage windows in going and returning from soirees and balls; a fascinating spectacle always even to those who are accustomed to it. This reawakening of the Boulevards at midnight, after an interruption during the earlier hours of the evening; the myriads of lights in the cafes, the sounds of music and revelry, the gay men and women, laughing, talking, chatting, coquetting here, there and everywhere are interesting even to the blase, but to the young and aristocratic Countess de Chateaubourg this glimpse of midnight Paris was a revelation—a world of which she had never dreamed.

After they had passed the Place de L'Opera, the lights and the pedestrians became less frequent. Sauntering leisurely on, enjoying the beauties of the night, they at last reached the extremity of the Boulevards directly opposite the Madeleine; at this hour of the night, this corner of Paris is comparatively almost deserted and in total darkness, and just as they were about to cross over to the opposite side of the street a man suddenly emerged from the deep shadow of a large cart which was standing there and advancing resolutely towards Count de Chateaubourg looked him squarely in the face, and then in a loud voice, as though he were meeting a friend exclaimed: "Parbleu! my friend Francois!"

Monsieur de Chateaubourg and the two ladies stopped abruptly. All were greatly surprised at this familiar salutation uttered by an unknown man, whose appearance was entirely in keeping with his stentorian voice, and as he spoke the young Countess involuntarily clutched her husband's arm, as she glanced at the colossal, athletic frame of the stranger, whose apparel was as little reassuring as his huge person. Restless and with his coarse shirt sleeves rolled up to his elbows, and his enormous frame enveloped in a bloody apron, he struck terror into the heart of the gentle little Countess, who hid her face on her husband's shoulder, while her mother-in-law, more courageous, looked defiantly at the stranger. The Count, disengaging his arm from his mother and pushing the young Countess aside, coolly advanced towards the man and after looking him closely in the face, exclaimed with apparent pleasure: "Ah, Joseph, I am so glad to see you!" At the name of Joseph the elder Madame de Chateaubourg appeared to be greatly relieved and putting her arm around the young Countess she drew her away, at a sufficient distance to prevent her from hearing the conversation between her son and the gruff-looking stranger. Perplexed at her mother-in-law's silence and apparent acceptance of this rough acquaintance, the young wife began to form all sorts of conjectures and persuaded herself that her husband must have belonged, when a very young man, to some terrible secret society such as she had read about in romantic stories, and this idea was strengthened by the parting injunction which the rough Joseph screamed after the Count as he joined his wife and mother, telling him that if he did not come as he had promised that he and the rest of his companions would know that he had lost courage and had turned coward!

Chateaubourg, though somewhat excited, was very gay and appeared to be in high spirits, as he continued his walk homewards,though neither he nor his mother alluded to the strange man with his blood-stained apron. When they reached the hotel, the young wife bade the old Countess good night and retired to their own apartments which were on the floor above, and as soon as the door closed after them, the young Antoinette began to remove her wraps, vexed at the provoking silence of her husband, who made no allusion to the adventure of the evening, and convinced that he and his mother were hiding some terrible mystery from her or feared to trust their secret to her discretion, she felt wounded at their apparent want of confidence and resolved not to enquire into the mystery. So, pleading fatigue, she expressed a desire to retire to her own apartments. The Count gladly assented, and Madame Antoinette noting the pleased expression on his handsome face, to get rid of her, swept out of the room without saying good night. The Count, delighted to be free for the rest of the night, ran quickly into his small dressing-room adjoining his own private apartment and hastily taking off his evening suit donned his street clothes. He then went to his mother's apartment on the first floor, where the concierge opened the street door for him. It was then one o'clock in the morning. Meanwhile, the young Countess, bolted in her own room, became a prey to all sorts of strange fancies and after an hour of restlessness ran to her husband's room, determined to make him solve the mystery. To her great surprise the apartment was empty and the covers on the bed had not been disturbed. Running back to her own room, she slipped into bed, after lighting the taper beside it. Sleep, however, was impossible and thoroughly frightened, she recalled the terrifying words of the mysterious Joseph: "If you do not come as you have promised, I and the rest of your companions will think that you have lost courage and have turned coward!" And why had the mysterious Joseph called her husband Francois when his name was George? Worn out, she closed her eyes in the hope of going to sleep, but sleep was impossible, for the vision of the colossal Joseph haunted her. Suddenly she remembered a narcotic on the dressing-table and jumping out of bed she dosed herself with it, and finally, worn out with fatigue and worry, she dropped off into a deep, heavy sleep. It was past eleven o'clock when she awakened and dreamily rang for her maid. "Ah, Madame," said Celeste as she entered the room and walked towards the windows to open them, "a dreadful crime was committed last night." "A crime!" echoed the young Countess, raising herself from her pillows. "Yes, madame, a terrible crime, but listen, the newsboys are crying it through the streets."

The young Countess sprang from her bed to the open window, and as she stood leaning out, the shrill voice of the boy below echoed through the room: "Horrible details of a triple murder committed last night; three women assassinated." The Countess turned from the window and dropped into an arm-chair. "That's quite true, madame," said Celeste, "and the report is that there are three men implicated in the murder. Shall I bring madame's chocolate?" The Countess was in no mood for chocolate. Involuntarily she associated the mysterious Joseph with the crime, and as soon as the maid had disappeared she rushed to her husband's room which she entered without knocking. The Count was in bed and sleeping soundly. The room was still in half darkness, so she drew aside the drapery of the window and opened the shutters and heard once again the newsboys crying in the street below, the terrible triple murder. But her husband was safe and reassured she started to leave the room, when she stopped to pick up the Count's shirt, which he had carelessly thrown on the floor by the couch near the dressing-table, and to her horror found that there were spots of blood on the shirt bosom as well as on the cuffs, which were lying on the dressing-table. Dreadfully frightened, the little Countess ran from the room without awakening her husband, to the apartments of her mother-in-law, for in spite of herself she associated the crime of the night with her husband and the mysterious Joseph.

"Oh, mamma, mamma," she exclaimed, throwing herself into an arm-chair and bursting into tears, "George and that terrible man have committed an awful crime; they have murdered three women!"

"Are you quite sure of it, my dear?" asked the old Countess, dropping her morning paper to listen to her daughter-in-law's exciting tale, and when she had finished Madame de Chateaubourg burst into a hearty laugh. "My dear," said she, "your terrible Joseph is merely a kind-hearted butcher's foreman of la Villette, who wanted to know if George could still kill a beef with a single blow of his club as in the old days of la Villette, and your husband answering in the affirmative, added that if Joseph wished he could prove it to him whenever he desired. 'This very morning,' said the old butcher, and George, finding the idea quite an original one, accepted the proposition, hence his early morning excursion and the blood-stains on his clothing."

"But how did George make the acquaintance of Joseph?" asked the young Countess, settling herself in the arm-chair.

"Your husband," said the old lady, "was almost a confirmed invalid in his youth and his cure being despaired of by some of the first physicians in Paris, I took the advice of an old friend and sent him to live for two years in the abattoirs, the term prescribed for the cure, where he led the ordinary life of a butcher's apprentice, killing, cutting and handling the animals; impregnating himself with their blood and drinking it when necessary—clothed in coarse linen and shod with wooden sabots he worked in the stock-yards. His identity was only known to the largest wholesale butcher of la Villette to whom I entrusted him and with whom he lived during his apprenticeship. To the rest he was simply Francois Dubourg, a provincial. The remedy proved effective and in two years he returned home entirely cured."

"So you have solved the mystery, mother dear," said the Count, who had slipped into the room unobserved and had caught the last of the conversation.

"Indeed, yes," responded the little Countess laughingly, "and don't you ever dare to keep another secret from me."

SHE LEFT A ROSE.

She left a rose; full well I knew
It was for me; its ruddy hue,
Erst glowing brightly on her breast,
Gleamed now from napkin's snowy nest.
Wet with her kiss, love's fragrant dew.
A fleeting glance at me she threw;
There lay the rose, well in my view,—
And, as to my fond heart 'twas prest,
She left—a rose.

But that quick blush gave me my cue;
I sought her out; and there are few
Who would not joy in such a quest.
Her heart responded to the test,
For on Love's shrine, to prove her true,
She left a rose.

The San Francisco Conservatory Concert

Each succeeding concert of the San Francisco Conservatory of Music is an examplar of the improvement made by the pupils under Director Bonelli and his thirteen assistants. On Wednesday evening Metropolitan hall was packed to the standing-room point when the Conservatory's pupils' concert was the occasion. There were twenty numbers, but as the rule was "no encores," there was no extension of the program. The first half of the evening was mainly devoted to the junior pupils, and it is not possible to give critical comment in each instance. Miss Agnes and Master Joe Kelleher, who made their debut at a preceding concert of the Conservatory, rendered Kucken's "Swallow" duet with good effect and also appeared in solo numbers. The Rubinstein staccato etude afforded Mr. W. R. Beatty opportunity to show some fine technique. Four sweet little girls rendered Weber's "Invitation to the Dance" very agreeably. Their precision of attack spoke well for the attention and earnestness of the little students. Their names were Madeline Buckley, Rita Lubelski, Grace Litzius, and Eva Johnson. Miss Litzius and Miss Lubelski also acquitted themselves well as solo performers. Miss Maybelle Kelly did remarkably well in the formidable Chopin Scherzo. This young girl has a suppleness of wrist and a force of stroke quite remarkable for one of her years. She also sustained a heavy part as first pianist in the Hummell A minor concerto. The mandolin numbers were prettily executed, their light harmony being enriched by more serious strings. One of the most interesting numbers was the piano and violin duet, Kucken's No. 1, by Miss Bruce and Miss Litzieus. The latter is a very tiny girl, but plays with remarkable intelligence, and exhibits the effects of her careful training. The program in full was: Violin solo, selection Maritana Op. 79, Papini, Winnie Bruce, Ruth Bruce, accompanist; left-hand solo, "Reverie," Maxson, Charlotte Williams; vocal selections, Agnes and Joe Kelleher, Mrs. Kelleher, accompanist; Staccato Etude, Op. 23, No. 2, Rubinstein, W. R. Beatty; "Forbidden Music," Gastolden, Gertrude Gallick, Alfred Kelleher, accompanist; Serenade Espagnole, Thome, Rita Lubeliski; two pianos, eight hands, Invitation to the Dance, Weber, Madeline Buckley, Rita Lubelski, Grace Litzius and Eva Johnson; vocal, Oh, Shining Light, Adams, F. Erlin; Scherzo Op. 31, Chopin, Maybelle Kelly; mandolin selections, Hearts and Flowers, Tobani, Boston Ideal March, Siegel, San Francisco Conservatory Mandolin Club; Tarantelle Op 14, Karganoff, Hilda Scholoh; piano and violin, duo No. 1, Kucken, Grace Litzius, Winnie Bruce; concerto A minor, Op. 85, Hummell, first piano, Maybelle Kelly, second piano, C. Burns, and the San Francisco Conservatory orchestra; vocal "Waltz," Arditi, Miss Charlotte Towle; sonata, two pianos, C. min., op. 13, Bethoven-Henselt, Anna McKay and Edna Montagne; violin solo, La Suedoise Mazurka, Elsen, Gladys Lahl, Charles Rogers, accompanist; sonata, two pianos, C. min., Mozart-Grieg, Josephine Rahlmann and Evelina Beaudet; vocal S. Tewksbury; "Soavi," Tobani, San Francisco Conservatory Mandolin Club. The recital was of especial value as showing what can be done in educating children to comprehend and interpret. The work of the elders marked the contrast between the beginner and the farther advanced st udent. All the performers were remembered with beautiful flowers and well-deserved applause.

The Wheeler Musicale

The Charles S. Wheelers entertained a few of their friends at their home in Pacific avenue on Wednesday evening. The affair was in the form of a musicale, the program chiefly contributed by juvenile talent. The junior Wheelers are all very accomplished and are probably as cultured children as are to be found anywhere. The program on Wednesday night consisted of two quartets, violin and piano solos and duets, and the participants were the Misses Freeman, Pasmore, Olive and Lilias Wheeler, Robert Rehn Weber and Charles S. Wheeler, Jr., with Giulio Minetti assisting.

The Loring Concert

The fourth concert, twenty-fifth season, of the Loring Club took place on Tuesday evening, May twentieth. The usual choral work of the club was reinforced by an orchestra of nine strings, three winds, cabinet organ and the inevitable piano. I had not the good fortune to hear the opening number but the second, "In Picardie" (Osgood), was a fine piece of vocal work and received a well-merited encore. "The Miller's Daughter," Tennyson's words set to music composed by Arthur Foote, was rendered with the delicacy of shading requisite to bring out the beauty of the dainty little piece. The fourth number, Frithjof's "Return," was full of color, contributed mainly by the orchestra which did some admirable work. Dr. Schalkhammer was the soloist and his fine baritone was never heard to better advantage. Rubinstein's "Morning" opened the second division of the program, an heroic effort for organ, piano, orchestra and voices, after which the nonsense verses in Jabberwocky set to mock-heroic strains were something in the nature of a divertissement. Mr. W. E. Dyer was the soloist in the seventh number, Billeter's "Sunset," and sang a fresh, sympathetic tenor. Grieg's "Discovery" showed good smooth chorus work, Dr. Schalkhammer being the soloist. The club proved itself fully equal to the demands made upon it by an unusually heavy program. Mr. Fyfe accompanied at the organ and Miss Ruth Loring at the piano.

A Classic Concert

The concert of chamber music given by the California Conservatory of Music last Friday evening was greeted by a packed house. The character of the music and the manner of its rendition may be said to lift the California Conservatory concerts out of the usual level of pupils' work into that of the professional musician. In the allegro from the Gade sonate Miss Amy Peterson played the piano part with strength and vigor, overpowering to some extent the delicacy of Mrs. Leon's work on the violin. The Beethoven quartet op. 16 was a well balanced performance, the andante being especially commendable. Mr. Nathan Landsberger's violin parts in the Grieg sonata in G minor and the Raff chromatic sonata were something to be remembered even by those who are familiar with his always excellent bowing. The two vocal numbers, "The Stricken Bird" and "The Lassie I Lo'e Best," composed by members of the 1902 class, were rendered by Mr. J. F. Veaco, and were so well received by the audience that the singer was obliged to repeat them. As compositions they are slightly reminiscent but not more so than might be expected. The most heroic number on the program was the Grieg concerto for two pianos, full string orchestra and lute. Miss Lily Hensen did some fine work at the first piano, fully sustaining her share in this beautiful composition. She has a strong wrist and a sure touch, and her command of difficult passages is wonderful. Miss Anna Mayers and Mrs. Elizabeth Hall Sears deserve mention for their intelligent work as accompanists to Mr. Landsberger's violin in the third and fifth numbers.

Mr. Eaton's Recital

The fourth free organ recital by Mr. Louis H. Eaton, organist of Trinity church, came off on Thursday evening. The organist was assisted by Mr. J. T. Veaco, tenor, and Mr. Hother Wismer, violinist. The program in full was: Concert-satz in C minor, Thiele; Trio in D minor, Bach; recit., "Comfort ye my people," aria, "Every Valley," Handel, Mr. Veaco; Double Theme varied, Rosseau; Canzona, Prayer and Cradle Song, Cantilena, Guilmant; Adagio, Third Suite, op. 34, Ries, violin and organ; Fugue in C major, violin alone, Bach, Mr. Wismer; Symphonie V, Widor.

Inartistic Applause

Apropos of a recent concert in Alameda, Laura Dray Perry wrote, in the musical department of Tidings: "I wished the appreciation of the audience would have manifested itself at times in an audible murmur and quiet clapping of hands when the conclusions of some songs were so exquisitely soft and artistically finished that the limit of perfect art seemed attained." This will be appreciated by many, and could apply to other concerts than the one referred to. It seems almost sacrilegious to rush into noisy applause after some exquisite numbers. There should be some other way of expressing appreciation. Obstreperous applause is as out of place sometimes as a bull in a china shop.

Mrs. Perry, by the way, who is editing the musical department of Tidings, the organ of Alameda's First Congregational church, is one of the finest amateur pianistes on either side of the bay. She was a pupil of Hugo Mansfeldt for a number of years, and was the organizer and president of the now defunct Ensemble Club that gave such delightful musicales in this city a few years back. Among other members of the club were Miss Fannie Danforth, Miss Mira Burnett, Miss Helen Anderson, Miss Pauline Collins and Miss Phoebe Williamson (now Mrs. Allan Munro of Seattle). —The Music Critic

Comic Opera Comedians

Another comic opera comedian has come to the front. His name is Raymond Hitchcock. He is the comedian of the "King Dodo" company which opened in New York last week. "King Dodo" is a Chicago production written by Frank Pixley and Gustave Luders. Chicagoans went wild over "King Dodo" and so did theatre-goers in other towns which are now referred to by the conceited critics of New York as "the provinces." But the new musical comedy did not receive the New York stamp of approval until last week. The first-night audience was skeptical as New York audiences usually are when a company that met with great success in other cities comes in from the road to astonish the bored and blase boulevardiers of the metropolis. They expected to see the comedian try to amuse them with horse-play, and they were sure that the costumes would be tawdry and the scenery cheap and travel-stained. But they were surprised with a first-class show and a piquant up-to-date performance. Comedian Hitchcock was pronounced a great success, but the critics were surprised that when the prima donna was singing at him he stood with his back to the audience. That was of course unusual. Popular New York comedians, and all comic opera comedians who are convinced that they are the whole show, never exhibit a rear view. When one of the characters is singing the average comedian proceeds to mug and grimace over the footlights. He believes it to be his duty to himself to spoil a song by touching the risibles of idiots like himself. When comic opera comedians become stars they insist on songs being cut out when they receive too much aplause. And in the course of time they wonder why they have ceased to be popular. When Mr. Hitchcock discovers that he has made a reputation in New York he will exhibit the same monopolistic tendencies of Francis Wilson, Frank Daniels and—well, other comedians we all know. He will not turn his back to the audience.

One of the great hits of "King Dodo" is "The Tale of the Bumble Bee" song, the music of which is now being played in local cafes. These are the words:

A bold bumble bee, idly roving o'er the lea,
Met a white clover blossom sweet with dew;
He gave her a kiss, and she thought not amiss,
For he swore that he always would be true.

But he looked on the flower as the toy of an hour,
Which a kindly fate was throwing in his way,
And he thought she'd forget, that they had ever met,
But he promised he'd return some day.

Love me, my own, I'll come back to thee.
There's honey in thy heart, guard it safely for me,
Dry the tears in thine eyes, save thy lips for the dew,
Some day again I'll claim thee for my heart is true.

The bee liked to stray, so he gaily buzzed away,
And forgot every loving word he said.
He gives not a thought to the havoc he has wrought,
Tho' he knows why the clover now is red.

'Tis a blush for the bliss of that one stolen kiss,
She is thinking of her lover far away.
Oh, she ne'er can forget for she's loyal to him yet,
And she's hoping he'll come back some day.

Remember, my dear, there is always much to fear
When a maid gives her kisses to a man.
She must be discreet if she'd keep him at her feet,
Love should end where this episode began.

Many men that you see, like this false bumble bee,
Scatter promises and break them in a day.
But beware of the sting, the kiss without the ring,
May you never have good cause to say:

Come back, my own, my love still is true;
There's honey in my heart and it's only for you.
There are tears in my eyes, though the world calls it dew.
I'm waiting for I want you and I want but you.

The Model Couple

Mr. and Mrs. Charles Wolcott, who are expected here with the Henry Miller company, signed a contract the other day with David Belasco to support Blanche Bates in the play which he is now writing for her and which is to be presented in New York early next season. The Wolcotts are veterans in the dramatic world of our country and are one of the most devoted of stage couples. They were married over a quarter of a century ago, and they are known as the model couple of the American stage. Charles Wolcott was Adelaide Neilson's leading man and his wife was one of the most intimate friends of that distinguished actress. The Wolcotts were with Frohman for sixteen years.

Female Impersonators

George Clifton, the female impersonator at Fischer's, is not burdened with the excessive avoirdupois that hampered Richard Harlowe, by many regarded as the kingpin in this line. Clifton, as Birdie the ten thousand dollar prize beauty, wears a pink ballet costume cut low in the neck, and his figure is padded out to make the feminine outline. He is tall and muscular and his impersonation does not give the painful impression that would be produced were he less uncompromisingly masculine. Edward Webb, who acts the disguised boy in "The Singing Girl," has a perfect make-up and is the veritable twin except in voice and walk of Annie Meyers. We have never seen any of the Yarmouth type of female impersonators out here. At least I do not remember any, outside of the clubs and colleges where female impersonators are part of the routine of a jinks. In the East there are many actors who do the feminine act so realistically as often to excite invidious comment. Stuart, the male Patti, is the most prominent of these since Harlowe, the Harvard man who first essayed Queen Isabella in "1492," deserted for other fields. Stuart has a shrill falsetto voice, is tall and ungainly in figure, solemn in manner and perhaps not so bad as he might be. George Fortescue, who was the best Catherine Rice's "Evangeline" ever had, is a ponderous, elephantine, deep-voiced fellow. Urdahl, a Swede who sang French and German songs at the Olympia one season, was so realistic that Yvette Guilbert, who was singing at the same music hall, said he shocked her. The Russell brothers, impersonators of Irish charwomen, are among the best I have ever seen.

Viola Allen will sail for Europe on the Celtic, June sixth, and meeting Mr. and Mrs. Hall Caine in London, will start soon after for Rome, where she will remain for some weeks "studying atmosphere" for the production of Caine's "The Eternal City." Roma, the heroine, is a Glory Quayle magnified. E. M. Holland will have the strong role of the Pope, E. J. Morgan will be Rossi, his socialist son, and De Belleville will be Roma's protector, Baron Bonelli.

The Theatrical Employes of San Francisco have arranged to give a testimonial benefit at Fischer's on the afternoon of Thursday, June fifth, when the entire "Fiddle Dee Dee" company will give the performance. Kolb, Dill, Bernard, Blake, Hermsen, Amber, Gallick, Hope, Emerson and the male and female chorus have offered their services for the occasion. There are also some other volunteers.

Peter Dailey, who comes to the Orpheum next week, has never appeared here before in vaudeville. But we saw him in his star farce, "A Country Sport," and he has been here on other occasions. He was in the cast of Jimmie Powers' "A Mad Bargain," and made a hit equal to that of the star. Peter is one of the heaviest weights in vaudeville but his wit is of the light and brilliant order.

It will be but a fortnight now until the opening of Florence Roberts' season at the Alcazar. On June ninth Miss Roberts will appear in "Zaza" and other plays will be given during her engagement. She has beautiful new costumes for all the plays. White Whittlesey will be her leading man.

Miss Vera McCord of Hanford, a graduate of one of Oakland's schools and of the Emerson College of Boston, recently created the part of Manuela in Charles Hawtrey's new play, "The President," at the Prince of Wales' theatre, London, meeting with decided favor.

According to Fischer's press agent, there is to be an interesting event following the performance of "Fiddle Dee Dee" on the night of June third. One of the leading principals will be married to "a well known society lady."

W. H. Crane's comedy, "His Wife's Father," is in preparation, to end the regular Alcazar stock season. M. L. Alsop and Marion Convere will say farewell in "His Wife's Father," but Miss Wycherly (now Mrs. Veiller) remains with the company.

The matinee girls will like William Courtleigh, who is with Henry Miller this year. "The Gay Lord Quex" will be one of the Miller plays.

Maude Fealy, the new star at the Grand, has been playing the leading part in Gillette's "Sherlock Holmes" during the past two seasons.

Lester Lonergan, who adapted "The Country Girl" for Kathryn Kidder, is a San Francisco boy.

All the theatres will have special matinees on Decoration day, next Friday.

Robert Downing has returned to San Francisco, and has resumed his classes in dramatic instruction.

Kyrle Bellew is to tour in a revival of "The Lady of Lyons" with Mary Mannering.

By special desire "Old Lavender" will be given at the Grand tonight and tomorrow night for Harrigan's good-bye bill.

At the Show Next Week

COLUMBIA—Kathryn Kidder in David Garrick's rollicking comedy, "The Country Girl," supported by Norman Hackett, Robert Ferguson and T. C. Hamilton. Prices during this engagement, one-fifty to twenty-five cents.

GRAND OPERA HOUSE—Maude Fealy, the youngest leading woman on any stage, in the original version of "The Little Minister"; her first appearance as Babbie.

FISCHER'S—Eighth week of "Fiddle Dee Dee." Freda Gallick, the new addition to the company, has sprung into immediate favor.

ORPHEUM—Peter F. Dailey, with his own company in "A Dress Rehearsal"; Stuart Barnes, monologuist in new songs and imitaitons; the two little Pucks, "the brightest juveniles who ever faced an audience"; Sager Midgley and Gertie Carlisle in "After School"; Lotta Gladstone, little Elsie, the Picchianis, Dooley and Fowley and the Biograph.

ALCAZAR—"The Brixton Burglary," second week of the lively farcical success, produced for the first time in this city.

TIVOLI—Another week of "The Singing Girl" which is still doing a rushing business —The Playgoer

Who steal your money by forcing upon you a dangerous counterfeit powder when you ask for the genuine Lablache Powder. Give your trade to honest and reliable dealers who will sell you the genuine Lablache Face Powder, the standard toilet powder which is in general use by the best and most distinguished women, not only in America, but also in London, Paris, Dresden, Hongkong, Shanghai, Japan and Manila, and, in fact, everywhere. Its virtues have been sounded by Sarah Bernhardt, Mme. Emma Eames, Mme. Emma Calve, Mme. Suzanne Adams, Mlle. Rea, Mlle. De Lussan, Miss Maude Adams, Miss Marguerita Sylva and by scores of other famous women of the stage and in private life. The genuine Lablache Face Powder is a positive benefit to the skin. It freshens, clears, beautifies. Restores and preserves the natural softness of the skin, while the counterfeit powder will injure the complexion. We ask that every lady using Lablache Face Powder will examine the label of the box carefully, and if in doubt as to the genuineness of the powder, to send us the circular or the cover of the box, together with the name of the dealer from whom the powder was purchased, and if it is the counterfeit she will be advised by return mail, so that she can demand that her money be refunded and whoever sold it will be prosecuted to the full extent of the law. The Bacon-Shakespeare Controversy

"Truth indeed," says Macaulay, "is essential to poetry, but it is the truth of madness. The reasonings are just, but the premises are false. After the first suppositions are made everything must be consistent, but these first premises require a degree of credulity which amounts to a temporary derangement of the intellect." The observation suggests itself in connection with a consideration of the purported revelations made in the bi-literal cypher discovered and elucidated by Mrs. Elizabeth Wells Gallup. If one can grant the preliminary proposition that in addition to his state labors and the works which Francis Bacon, Lord Verulam, published in his own name, he also produced not only all attributed to Shakespeare, but those of Marlowe, Greene, Peele, Spencer, Burton, and a good part of what is attributed to Ben Jonson, and a few other odds and ends not acknowledged—if in addition to all this he can add some thirteen plays and a biography or two, and a goodly portion of Homer and Virgil, "infolded" or concealed, by means of this cypher, within the other works, and if, still further, he can persuade himself that the redoubtable Bacon concealed a different revelation in each edition of the works, and moreover set himself the task of formulating a distinct style for each different name which he used, and corrected all his own proofs, as indeed he would have been obliged to do in order to have his cypher correctly set forth—if any one is willing to admit this as a preliminary hypothesis, the rest of the story is a small matter. It is impossible for the ordinary reader or student to check up these so-called discoveries and satisfy himself that the latest story concerning the controversy is to be found in the writings enumerated, since given the necessary time, patience, curiosity and that detective instinct essential to the elucidation of mysteries, there yet remains a fatal lack in not having access to original editions or accurate fac similes, so that the majority must act the part of lookers-on and leave the actual conflict to Mrs. Gallup and that committee of Shakespearean scholars who have undertaken the task. The stupendous claim has scarcely excited comment on this side of the Atlantic, but in England there has been considerable excitement, and sufficient investigation has gone on for those interested to feel themselves justified in pronouncing the authoress of the sensation charlatan. In any case, we must give her credit at least for originality, ingenuity and industry. Hitherto it has been supposed by the Baconians that the reason why he used a name other than his own was that to be known as a writer of plays would reflect on his standing as a lawyer, but Mrs. Gallup sets forth quite a different cause for the concealment. Francis Bacon, acording to her revelations, was the legitimate son of Queen Elizabeth and the Earl of Leicester. They were married while she was imprisoned in the Tower of London, and again, quietly, but with the necessary witnesses, later on. Francis was given into the keeping of Lady Anne Bacon and her husband, Nicholas. The Earl of Essex was a younger son of the same marriage, also unacknowledged, a favorite who had supplanted "the rightful heir" in the affections of his mother. The discovery of the secret of his origin was made by Francis at the age of sixteen and his virtual banishment to France ensued. There he fell in love with Marguerite of Navarre and planned to marry her when she had secured the necessary divorce, but his cruel mother refused her consent, hence the Shakesperean sonnets and Romeo and Juliet. The treason of Essex was committed in an attempt to force the Queen's hand and secure recognition of his claims, and the elder brother was compelled by the unnatural mother to play his part in the tragedy of the trial and execution. Elizabeth's coquetries, her ill-tempers, and her "eat with mouse" actions in connection with Leicester, are all set forth, albeit with much repetition and reiteration, and considering the somewhat restricted space, with much moralizing and pious comment, which bears little if any resemblance to the sententiousness of Bacon's acknowledged writings. Neither can the deciphered dramas take rank with those we are acustomed to see published under the name of Shakespeare. Mrs. Gallup's theory is comprehensive, and simplifies the controversy which has raged about the name of Shakespeare for the last half century. It has always been easier to prove that Shakespeare did not write the plays than that any one of the other claimants did. Mrs. Gallup has narrowed the field down to one. With one sweep she has annihilated all the minor contestants, and instead of a contest between Marlowe and Peele, Greene and Shakespeare, Bacon and Marlowe, and so on, she claims everything in sight for her champion. Even the most casual of readers must find something of interest in the matter, though in the point of accuracy either in dates, names or facts, it has been pointed out by English investigators into the truth of the records that, granting the existence of the Baconian Biliteral Cypher Story, it is not more reliable in point of accuracy than the average historical romance. Magazine Stories

Lippincott's short novel, "A Mock Caliph and His Wife," in the May number of that magazine, is both shorter and better than the majority of its class. Edith Robinson tells of the experiences of a young couple, a bank employe and his wife, who are invited by some millionaire relatives to act as substitutes for them in New York society when they are unexpectedly called away from the gay whirl. From a modest suburban flat where the wife keeps house with a single maid they are transported to a metropolitan mansion with a retinue of servants and what is, comparatively speaking, unlimited wealth at their disposal. The list of engagements and guests is already prepared and there is nothing to do but carry out the program. The adventures of the young couple, in their new enviornment, are both amusing and instructive. As they are equal to the position in every respect but one—lack of means, to those with whom they are thrown into contact, this is not a tale of the exalted "wash-lady" but a thing which might easily happen. The story will go none the worse amongst feminine readers because it was the husband and not the wife who fell in love with the glitter and tinsel and needed a sharp stroke to sever him from the delights of society life. Nothing that bears the signature of Francis Churchill Williams will go a-begging amongst readers of "J. Devlin, Boss," and his short story 'The Conspiracy," is a vigorous description of the havoc wrought by a crazed workman in a foundry. Other good tales are by George Moore, Marie Van Vorst and Wolcott Le Clear Beard. Elizabeth Pennell contributes her experience in crossing the Alps by diligence, and Orthon C. Guerlac explains the meaning and make-up of the French Academy. There is the usual amount of good verse, and the best and brightest anecdotes that find their way into print are to be met with in "Walnuts and Wine." McClure's begins in the May number the publication of Miss Stone's story of her capture and life with the brigands. No one who has read "A Sailor's Log" can have any doubt of Captain Robley D. Evans' capacity to tell a good tale, and therefore no one who has any curiosity about the impression made upon Prince Henry on his recent visit will be apt to overlook what Captain Evans has written. He goes straight to the point with his pen as well as with a gun. Emmy Lou, the Princess royal of all the little girls who have ever been written about, makes another step forward, into the grammar school, and also into politics. Clara Morris, who seems to be going ahead in the matter of story-writing just as she did on the stage, contributes a bit of fiction in "Sarah Siddons' Tryst." Frank Spearman has a good detective story. Other stories are by William D. Williams, H. R. Martin. J. George Frederick and Ellsworth Kelley. George W. Smalley continues his article on "English Statesmen and Rulers." The May Smart Set opens with a novelette by Edgar Fawcett, "The Vulgarians," and there are gentle whispers of "Who?" concerning the prototypes of the principal characters, who are Californian ruralites suddenly grown wealthy. Josephine Dodge Daskam, who is well known for her clever stories, contributes a poem on "The Statue and the Bust," which is as clever as anything that she or any one else has ever done. Other names amongst the contributors are Mrs. Schuyler Crowningshield, Onota Watanna, Francis Dana, Minna Irving, Theodosia Garrison, Zona Gale, Bliss Carman, Edgar Saltus and Frank Lee Benedict. "His Courier," by O. Henry, is strikingly original and describes a situation whose novel features could be very well introduced into a vaudeville sketch. The hero has had a misunderstanding with the heroine, who refuses to accept any explanation from him. They both happen to be in the Park at the same time, and the hero gets a gamin to carry a verbal message to the heroine. The manner in which his fine English is translated into Bowery argot, and her answer likewise, is clever, and the end mingles pathos and humor most charmingly. Perhaps the article which will attract most attention in the May Cosmopolitan is that entitled "Captains of Industry." Two interesting contributions concerning stage land are "Staging a Fairy Play," by Gustave Kobbe, and "The American Invasion of the London Stage," by H. G. Rhodes. Clara Morris has a story, "The Troublesome Woman," and there are others by Seumas Macmanus, Alma Martin Estabrook and F. Hopkinson Smith, who is contributing a series of tales under the general title, "No Respecter of Persons." Brander Matthews writes of books and reviewers and Lavinia Hart of "Women as College Presidents." "The Wreck-Master's Work" takes the story of railroad work and workmen forward one more chapter, and the new department of "Men, Women and Things" presents contributions from some of the brightest writers of the time.

Frank T. Bullen is ready with another book. This time it is a collection of short stories which he calls "Deep Sea Plunderings." When one considers that Bullen was an orphan waif, thrown on his own resources at the age of ten, and that all the opportunities he has ever had have been such as were open to a sailor before the mast, one is inclined to wonder what great use there is in all our schools and colleges, and cut-and-dried rule and line efforts to teach the art of writing. Mr. Bullen has lived the life of which he writes, and he can write, but precious few of the college-bred men, sheltered from hardship and taught how to "take pen in hand" have the same power of putting down in words the things that happen about them. Not since "Two Years Before the Mast" have there been such sea stories written as those contained in Bullen's books, albeit they are not stories in the ordinary acceptance of the word.

A new book is to be brought out in Paris on the apparently inexhaustible subject of Joan of Arc. This one, by Captain L. Campion, promises to be a decided novelty, since it is to deal with the noted heroine not from a romantic or historical standpoint, but will treat of her solely as a horsewoman.

Julia Marlowe has published a little volume under the title "Six Girls from Shakespeare." The successive chapters are devoted to Rosalind, Viola, Juliet, Imogen, Beatrice and Marie.

YELLOWSTONE NATIONAL PARK.

One of the most delightful spots on the American continent, and more easily reached via Union Pacific than via any other line, is the Yellowstone National Park. The stage ride from Monida by the palatial Concord Coaches of the Monida & Yellowstone Stage Company is through scenery hardly inferior to the Park itself.

Side trip from Ogden, Utah, or Pocatello, Idaho, via Monida & Yellowstone Stage Co., in both directions, will be furnished holders of all tickets (one way first and second-class, regular tourist, or special round-trip excursion tickets), sold at Denver, Cheyenne and points east, passing through Ogden or Pocatello to points in the states of California, Nevada, Oregon, Washington and that part of British Columbia lying north of the state of Washington, upon application to O. S. L. agents at either Ogden or Pocatello, at the very low rate of $49.50.

This rate will include rail and stage fare covering seven and one-half days' trip, including all meals and lodging beyond Monida.

OUR OPINION

The Suppression of Miles

President Roosevelt has issued orders the purpose of which is the discontinuance of official relations with Lieutenant-General Nelson A. Miles, the highest officer in direct command of the Army of the United States. It has been evident for some time past that General Miles was intent upon making himself persona non grata to the President. The General's conduct bespeaks the demagogue. He has been posing as a martyr to official red tape, and he is a most accomplished poseur. He has made it apparent that he was striving to create a pretext for a quarrel with the President, and Mr. Roosevelt has handled him with greater tact than Miles ever exhibited in the capacity of a soldier. He has gradually shorn the General of those powers which enabled him to keep himself officially before the public, so that now when he talks for publication it will be more apparent than ever that he is lacking in good taste. Everybody in Washington knows that Miles is an aspirant for the Presidency. The tactics he adopted to further his ambition were shallow, and offensive to the dignity of the Army. The War Department is not above criticism, the conceit and arrogance of some of our army officers are disgusting, and the bureaucracy of Washington is a pestiferous element that should be banished from our Government, but Miles is not the man to institute reforms. He rose to power through the same influences against which he now inveighs, and his motives are purely selfish. He is jealous of Roosevelt because the President is seeking to correct the abuses that exist, and is destined to achieve the glory which shall come when the reform is accomplished. Instead of co-operating with the President he has sought to hinder him. The evils and abuses that have been fastening themselves on the War Department for a quarter of a century cannot be wiped out in a day. Even the President must proceed cautiously and with tact and discretion. It is not to the best interests of the army to promote scandal in official circles, and Miles should be aware of that fact. But he is too busy these days booming himself in the magazines. It is too bad that he cannot be suppressed altogether. But he is a great egotist and likes to see himself in print. In one of the current magazines three pictures of the spectacular General appear in two consecutive pages. The caption of one of them is, "Lt. Gen. Miles. A Handsome Figure of a Man, Ready For a Tour of Inspection." Fancy the Commanding General of the Army feeding on that kind of stuff!

Striking Students

The spectacle of a lot of college students on a strike is ludicrous but not sufficiently amusing to warrant encouragement. Mutinies among college students have become so common of late as to suggest the advisability of a combination of college faculties for the purpose of establishing a Black List. Students would not be so eager to go on a strike if they knew that expulsion meant permanent retirement from the academic world. The faculty of Delaware college, in Newark, having suspended a half-dozen students charged with the brutal hazing of a fellow undergraduate, the entire student body of that institution with the exception of the senior class went on a strike. They absented themselves from lectures and refused to take any part in the regular serious work of the institution until the suspended persons were reinstated. The same sort of thing happened recently at Lafayette, and similar insurrections have been occurring quite frequently of late in different parts of the country. Students who show a disposition to injure the institution to which they have been sent to acquire an education should be dealt with promptly and severely. The young man at college takes himself far more seriously than he will ever do after he rubs up against his fellow creatures in later life. When he rebels against academic authority it is because he flatters himself that he is possessed of a finer sense of fairness and discretion than those in authority, or else he is actuated solely by a spirit of mischievousness. In either case he should be dealt with arbitrarily. It is a favorable opportunity to inculcate the virtue of humility. Incidentally he should be taught that the advantages of an education are to be enjoyed principally by those who are fortunate enough to receive it, and that the world at large cares not whether he has received a university training.

The Jordan-Pease Case

One should not be surprised, perhaps, at the insubordination of students. When the faculties of great universities include men of the calibre of those who have been trying to bring discredit on the institution of learning at Palo Alto, it should not be surprising that the students are inclined to take themselves seriously, and to figure conspicuously in ludicrous spectacles. Professor Ernest M Pease of the Chair of Latin at Stanford is the latest asinine academician to bray raucously in the hope of pedestaling himself as an heroic figure, and at the same time with the mischievous motive of disparaging the management of the institution from which he has been drawing a fat salary for ten years. Professor Pease was fired out of the faculty because he incurred the displeasure of President David Starr Jordan. It doesn't matter how or why he incurred the President's displeasure. It is sufficient to know that he did. Having done so he was no longer a suitable teacher, for a university cannot be conducted successfully if there is discord in the faculty. But Professor Pease insists on appealing to the Court of Public Opinion, just as though the people of the whole country were interested in his case. He declares that he lost his job because he failed to stand by Dr. Jordan in the Ross controversy. Admitting that such is the case, Pease has no just cause of complaint. It was his duty either to stand by President Jordan in that controversy or retire from the faculty. Having ignored both alternatives he should have been dismissed. Pease cannot plead in extenuation that Ross was right and Jordan was wrong. The Ross case merely demonstrated that Stanford University is conducted in pursuance of a certain policy. It may be a policy inconsistent with those broad principles which are the boast of the academic fraternity and which are popularly supposed to underlie the scheme of the modern up-to-date university, but where on this broad planet is there a university whose policy conforms with the ideals of the optimistic scholar? The policy of the average university is the policy of its executive, and most American universities are presided over by ordained ministers who have all the prejudices and limitations of their class. The conduct of Professor Pease since his dismissal was that of a petulant spirited fellow, who takes himself as seriously as do the recalcitrant students that go on a strike, and who has as little reason to summon the world to witness his martyrdom. The fact that Professor Pease and Professor Ross have many sympathizers in universitydom who regard their dismissal as a blow to the dignity of American scholarship is of no importance. It merely presages a movement towards a Pedagogical Union for the protection of professors. Perhaps the Walking Delegate is destined to become a feature of university life.

Cruelty to Childhood

A question which has suddenly presented itself for the consideration of London theatrical managers is the dramatic needs of children, and there is some discussion anent the advisability of producing plays which will be attractive to little folks. It seems to be only one more of the devices for shortening the period of childhood and hurrying the infants ahead faster than nature intended them to go. There is no question but that children enjoy dramatic productions, and that it is better for them to be taken to plays which they can comprehend without injury by over-sophistication, if they are to be taken to the theatre at all, but where is the need to take them? Children have plenty of pleasures and amusements suitable to their years, which they must of necessity outgrow, and it seems a pity that they should be driven from these before the natural time for relinquishment, and other things substituted and staled for them when by judicious restraint they could look forward to years of pleasure. The idea seems to have established itself that one of the dramatic needs of children is to see other children act, so we are apt to have an attempt to dramatize children. If there is anything more painful than to see little children taken to the theatre to sit out problem plays and society dramas, it is the spectacle of children on the stage. The poor little stunted creatures are not children but breadwinners, often performing the duties of parents and supplying a means of subsistence for their elders. There is some kind of a vague notion that the babies are endowed with temperament which makes it a hardship for them not to be permitted to act, but more often they are endowed only with lazy and incompetent parents. Not one in a hundred of the precocious stage infants makes more than a mediocre actor in later life. It is a lamentable fact that children, in the old sense of the word, are almost extinct, and instead we have world-worn and sophisticated little cynics.

Hotel Service

It is unfortunate that the Fair heirs have decided to postpone the construction of the big hotel which they planned a short time ago. A little competition in the hotel business would be decidedly beneficial to San Francisco. This is a progressive city, and its inhabitants are fond of the luxuries of life and willing to pay for them, but it is a well known fact that the metropolis of the Pacific coast is far behind the times in the matter of hotel accommodations. We have fine large hostelries, and a hotel grill such as that at the Palace which is unsurpassed and of which we should be proud, but the general service which is vouchsafed hotel patrons in this city is on a par with that which irritates visitors to country towns. We are badly in need of competition. The first hotel that seeks to give its patrons service such as that to which people are accustomed in New York, and even in Los Angeles and Portland, will get the cream of the trade and the highest prices. There is nothing that so impresses visitors as the service which they receive in hotels. If it is bad they immediately conclude that the town is a jay place, and first impressions thus received are hard to remove. Moreover the length of a stranger's visit to a city often depends on the character of the hotel accommodations. Many a person has cut short his visit to San Francisco because of the wretched hotel service. When a person who is accustomed to having every want promptly attended to upon pressing a button, or by announcing it through the phone which hangs in his room, comes to San Francisco and encounters hotel clerks who treat him as though he were an intruder, and experiences delays of all sorts by reason of an inadequate system, he feels as wretched as a shipwrecked sailor. Competition has greatly improved hotel service and has increased hotel patronage by luring people from their homes. When the monster Waldorf-Astoria was thrown open in New York five years ago, everybody thought it would be a failure. But it was crowded from the start and has been very profitable. A great modern fire-proof hotel in Forty-second street has lately doubled in size and now a twenty-story hotel is building in Fifth avenue. Across the street from it half a block of land was lately bought for another hotel and still another is to be built in Forty-fourth street. Suites of rooms are rented in the New York hotels to tenants by the year for prices from two to three thousand up to fifteen thousand dollars. In one of the new hotels there is a butler's pantry in each suite with elevators warmed by electricity for the better serving of meals. These splendidly equipped residential hotels are solving the serious domestic problem involved in housekeeping, and which is a constant source of complaint.

The Saunterer

That Scott Bonus

Senator Perkins is getting the credit these days of having put up the job in Congress to deprive the Scotts of the big bonus which they have been receiving for building warships. I should like to congratulate the Senator on that coup, but since writing about it some weeks ago I have heard another story. It is another version of the affair which attributes the withdrawal of the bonus to that superb tactician Marcus Aurelius Hanna. It appears that Mr. Hanna has a little bone to pick with the Scotts. According to my informant Hanna wrote to Henry Scott some time ago in reference to the grievances of the men employed at the Union Iron Works, and he suggested a method of adjusting difficulties. With his customary lack of tact Mr. Scott sent on an insolent reply to Mr. Hanna. I believe it was something in the nature of a suggestion that Mr. Hanna should not thrust his nose into other people's business but should attend strictly to his own. As Mr. Hanna is a United States Senator it is his business to see that the Government is not fleeced out of money, and therefore it was quite natural for him to urge the lopping off of the bonus.

Significance of Popular Silence

Nothing ever more clearly demonstrated the unpopularity of the Scotts than this withdrawal of the ship-building bonus. The Union Iron Works is a Californian institution, and we are supposed to be more or less proud of it. We should like to see it encouraged, but nobody has heard of any spontaneous indignation meetings to protest against the action of Congress. On the contrary it has been said that a Californian Senator suggested the bonus-clipping measure just to wreak a petty, private revenge, and instead of being execrated he has been lauded. Indeed, it is not unlikely that if Senator Perkins sought re-election with no other claim to the suffrages of the people than that he dealt the Scotts a body blow, he would have a cinch on the toga.

Origin of the Bonus

The Scotts have been doing a lot of grumbling over the recision of the four per cent bonus. They declare that it is a blow to the shipbuilding interests on this coast, and that it was granted originally for the purpose of developing the industry on the Western shores of the country. That is in a measure true but the fact is that in bidding on a government contract for the construction of a war vessel the four per cent bonus is never considered. It is too trifling an item, but of course the money comes in handy after the work has been done. The bonus was granted by the Government because it was estimated that if a vessel built on the Atlantic coast were needed in the Pacific squadron it would cost a large sum of money to send her out here. So the money thus saved, when a vessel to be assigned to the Pacific was built here, was turned over to the builder.

She Dotes on Blue Blood

So the Queen of Song, the divine Melba, is engaged to marry a British nobleman. That is what the despatches tell us, and there is every likelihood of its being true. The British nobility has frequently been recruited from the stage, and I happen to know that Melba has a longing for the nobility. When she was a choir singer in Melbourne many years ago, long before the exquisite quality of her voice had revealed itself to competent critics, she frequently declared that she never would marry unless she could get a blue-blooded husband. And she did get one in the person of a man named Armstrong, a second son of a noble house. As a husband he was a failure. But it was that marriage that revealed Melba to the world. She went to England with her husband, and when she got tired of him she decided to go on the stage. Meanwhile her voice had thrilled people in some of the private houses of London, and she was easily persuaded to go to Paris and study.

An Affair of Her Past

Armstrong was not the only blue-blooded chap with whom Melba had an experience. She was the bon ami for a time of the Duc d'Orleans. All Paris was interested in that affair, and it was thought for a time that the French nobleman would marry the singer, but it never reached such a serious stage. Melba is the daughter of a wealthy Australian contractor, a stern old Scotchman who has never forgiven her for going on the stage. Whenever anybody speaks to him about her he always declares rather gruffly that it would be better for her if she were home behaving herself. She never returned to Melbourne after becoming famous, and it is said that she is sore on the people for not having recognized her talents. Nevertheless she presented the city with a statue of herself some years ago.

THE WORLD OVER

A Blingum Salon

Madame La Bavarde has a naive way of tickling the tympani of our fashionable folk. The other day she declared that "Every once in a while there is some talk of Mrs. Crocker's establishing a salon." I must confess that I have never heard of any such talk, and I am quite sure that I am not deaf to all that is being said by people in the swim. "Because," adds Madame La Bavarde, with her characteristic naivete, "the lady in question has bright people at her house, that is no proof of establishing anything." Isn't Madame La Bavarde clever and adroit in thus forcing upon her readers the inference that Mrs Will Crocker has bright people at her house? It should be interesting to know who some of the bright people are that assemble at the Crocker house. Do they hail from Blingum? Surely not, for there are no bright people down there. There isnt a man or woman in all Blingum qualified to adorn a salon, unless Jack Asserly be excepted. He said one fairly bright thing in the whole course of his life and though it was in the nature of a faux pas it is still being quoted as a bon mot.

Women Competent to Preside

I have frequently heard it suggested that we should have a salon in this city and I know one or two women qualified to act as mistresses of such an institution, but they are not of the exclusive snobocracy. The salon is a Parisian institution and it has never been successfully transplanted. It has been said that the most indisputable source of feminine culture and development in France was the influence of the salons which were conducted under the auspices of such distinguished women as Mmes. de Stael, Recamier, Roland and Le Brun. They were the resorts of men of letters, artists, musicians and statesmen. How could such an institution be conducted by a woman who has nothing but provincial social prestige to qualify her for leadership? Mrs. Crocker is undoubtedly an estimable and an affable woman, well versed in the conventions of good society, but she is not possessed of that culture which is acquired by travel and by associating with men of wit and of intellectual force and of artistic temperament. Moreover, the hallmark of the socially elect is not the cachet of the salon habitue. If San Francisco were to have a salon I should suggest such a woman as Mrs. Hearst or Mrs. De Young for presiding genius. They are women who have not wasted their time in fashion's full herd, crouching to leaders or cringing to rules. They appreciate genius in claw-hammer or in trousers that bag at the knee, and each has had the worldly experience which should render the task of presiding over a salon a pleasant diversion.

Playwright Broadhurst

Some years ago when Dion Boucicault produced his new play, "The Jilt," in this city, for the first time on any stage, he flattered us by saying that he believed the judgment of San Francisco theatre-goers to be superior to that of patrons of the drama in any other city in the country. The fact was that the great dramatist was merely trying his new play on the dog, and that he didn't want us to know that we were doing the canine act. But we swallowed his pretty compliment and voted his play a great success. It isn't often that San Francisco sees a new play for the first time, but the privilege is to be vouchsafed us Sunday night when Mr. Neill is to produce George Broadhurst's "The Red Knight" at the California. Mr. Broadhurst is one of the successful American playwrights, but heretofore his efforts have been confined to farce comedy, and he has done one or two things that entitled him to rank with Charley Hoyt. He came to town several days ago to supervise the production of his new play, and though he does not seek to cajole with the Boucicault style of flattery, he is a little bit anxious, for "The Red Knight" is somewhat more pretentious than any of his previous works. It is a legitimate comedy drama in which incidents that are usually utilized in blood-and-thunder plays with thrilling effect are introduced to titillate the risibles rather than to harrow the feelings.

About ten years ago Broadhurst was manager of the Bush street theatre in this city, and at that time he never thought of writing a play. When the theatre closed its doors Broadhurst went East, and then he tried his hand at farce-comedy writing. He was successful from the start, and he has made considerable money out of such plays as "What Happened to Jones" and "Why Smith Left Home." He is now recognized by the Theatrical Trust as a successful playwright, and his work is constantly in demand, but he prefers to stage his own plays and put his own companies on the road. He is now writing a play for Willie Collier who recently surprised the theatrical world by quitting the management of Jacob Litt by whom he was being starred, and joining Weber & Field's company. But Broadhurst declares that Collier will start out as a star again in another year under Weber & Field's management, and his reappearance will be in the play now being written.

A Genius of the Army

"Keep your eye on Leonard Wood" said a prominent Army officer to me the other day, during a discussion of the merits of men who were likely to become the head of the Army some day. "No man in the Army has made a more wonderful record in the last few years than Leonard Wood. You haven't heard much about him, because he attends strictly to business and doesn't get touted in the newspapers, but if there is a more eligible man for an emergency than General Wood, I should like to know who he is." It is a fact that Wood has come to the front with wonderful rapidity. After the inauguration of President McKinley in 1899, it was announced in the press despatches that Grover Cleveland had gone duck shooting with Captain Robley D. Evans. It was casually stated that a "Capt. Leonard Wood, an army surgeon, accompanied the party." It was that same Leonard Wood who turned over the government of Cuba to the first President of the Republic the other day. The merit of Wood's performance in Cuba is little appreciated outside of official circles in Washington, but if all that he has done were generally known he would be acclaimed a popular favorite.

His Brilliant Record

Leonard Wood first showed his mettle in the Geronimo campaign, when as a surgeon he won the medal of honor for doing the work of a line officer in the most gallant style. As Colonel of the First Volunteer Cavalry at San Juan he enhanced the reputation for intrepidity which he had won in the Indian campaign. His composure under fire steadied his men in the most critical hour of the day. Soon after the battle he was promoted to Brigadier-General. Subsequently he policed the city of Santiago, and when General Lawton returned to the United States, Wood, promoted to Major-General of Volunteers, became the military commander of the province with supreme powers. He cleaned the city, built roads, organized a government, conciliated the Cubans, and when he was later appointed Governor, it was universally acknowledged that he had earned the honor. He had proved himself a man of tact, of versatility and firmness, and a born administrator. As Governor he overcame all obstacles. He established a public school system, improved the sanitary conditions, set the courts in motion, and instituted many reforms. Leonard Wood accomplished a great work, and is entitled to the plaudits of the people.

A Royal Host

A story has leaked out in club circles about a row between Alexander Hamilton of the firm of Baker & Hamilton, and the members of the Hardware Association. The story is that when John W. Gates, the steel wire magnate, was out here, Mr. Hamilton was chosen by his associates to "do the honors." He accordingly took Mr. Gates in tow and entertained him royally. Nothing was too good for Mr. Gates. He had the time of his life in San Francisco, and he went away with the impression that Mr. Hamilton was one of the best fellows on earth. Later on Mr. Hamilton presented a bill to his confreres in the hardware business, for the cost of entertaining Mr. Gates. The bill was for forty-eight hundred dollars. Could anything be more eloquent of the munificence of Mr. Hamilton in the role of host? Surely he did the honors in royal style, but the hardware men shied at the bill. Indeed they refused to pay it. Mr. Hamilton now feels that he has a grievance.

A Misleading Portrait

The moral of a story that I heard the other day in an artist's studio is that if you are bald-headed don't sit for your portrait until after you get a toupee. Some years ago a distinguished citizen of this city had his portrait painted by a high-priced artist who came hither to rake in the shekels of the rich. He turned out a very good job, and for a long time the painting adorned the walls of the distinguished citizen's mansion. It revealed his bald pate in all its resplendent naturalness, and was much admired for its fidelity. In the course of time the gentleman of the portrait decided upon adding a toupee to his other personal ornaments. Presto! the painting no longer resembled the original. As a consequence it impelled inquiries concerning the kind of restorers that had been used. Finally the portrait was sent to Orrin Peck with instructions to put a crop of hair on the bald head. But the thought of tampering with another artist's work is obnoxious to Peck. The name of the artist is on the canvas, and Peck thinks it wouldn't be fair to attempt the work of transformation. The canvas is in his studio but the head is still bald.

The Resurrection of Denis

Denis Kearney has been resurrected. Somebody has blown the breath of life into him for the purpose of starting him out to advocate the adoption of the constitutional amendment providing for the appointment of a commission to fix rates for all quasi-public corporations. There are many things that may be said in favor of the amendment, but none of them can offset the simple fact that Denis Kearney is on the rostrum advocating it. Denis fooled the people some years ago, but he cannot fool them all the time. He posed successfully for a time as a champion of the people's rights, and nobody was more amused than himself over the circumstance of his being taken seriously. He laughs to this day over the success of his chicanery, and yet somebody has started him out again to sway the populace. It seems like a huge joke. But it isn't. Somebody is in earnest. Shouldn't the reappearance of Denis in the role of advocate of the amendment inspire us with greater caution than we should otherwise have exercised?

Annie's Daughter Grace

Though Annie Myers of the Tivoli is one of the most vivacious soubrettes in comic opera, and as young-looking as she acts, she is the proud mother of a daughter who is making rapid strides in the profession. It isn't every young soubrette who can boast of a daughter old enough and clever enough to win applause on the stage. Grace Myers, daughter of Annie, has been on the stage only two years, and it was only a short time ago that she was playing small parts at the Tivoli under the name of Grace Orr. This season she is with the Frank Daniels company, and word comes to me from the East that of late she has been playing the leading soubrette role in "Miss Simplicity," taking the place of Helen Lord, who was ill. Her Heart Still Whole

At the Goewey-Havens wedding Kathryn Dillon had to stand a deal of jollying about when hers was coming off. Miss Dillon made a very striking picture in her handsome maid-of-honor costume. She acted her role with dignity and grace. Miss Dillon, by the way, has had experience in the line of attending brides and no longer feels nervous when acting as bridal attendant. She was one of the bridesmaids at Lottie Cunningham's marriage. Fred Greenwood seems to have given up all hope of winning the obdurate heiress, for he has gone East.

A Spanish Midsummer Jinks

Not since Fred M. Somers' Buddha jinks in the woods back of Mt. Tamalpais will the Bohemian Club have had such a midsummer jinks as is now under way for this year's outing. According to what I hear it was Mrs. Gertrude Atherton who gave the committee the idea. The camp will be metamorphosed into a picture of California before the discovery of gold. It will be entirely Spanish, with an old mission, padres, senors and senoritas, and Indians. The transformation will come with the entrance of the Eastern man with his pickaxe and his money. It will be strictly in accordance with history, but when the idea is carried into the low jinks of course there will be some comic features. The club's star female impersonators, such as Dick Hotaling and Charlie Field, are to masquerade as witching Carmens if all the plans go as arranged. The club chefs are practicing on frijoles, tortillas and tamales so they will be able to add to the general perfection of the color scheme.

A Man Whom Women Adore

The secret of Charles Victor Miller's power over the fair sex is a problem some of our disgruntled beaux are anxious to penetrate. Miller is spending his vacation at Napa Soda Springs, and has hypnotized all the society girls who are staying there. He is a professional clairvoyant and spirit-reviver, and yet there is nothing uncanny in his appearance. He wears jewels of brilliancy and value, and that is all that differentiates him from any other dark man with magnetic eyes. But the girls are all in love with him. When in town Miller occasionally entertains his friends at recherche little dinners. At one of these, where all those around the board were women except the host, the latter wore a Turkish robe, with magnificent jewels everywhere they could be made effective. His home in Bush street is a dream of Turkish luxury and splendor.

Mrs. McCreery Went Alone

Lucille Thornton did not go abroad with Mrs. Andrew McCreery, after all, but stayed behind with friends in New York and let Mrs. McCreery sail without her. When Miss Thornton left here, it was generally thought that she was to continue her travels to the continent. But everybody has the privilege of changing her mind, and rumor credits Mrs. McCreery with being not the most genial of compagnons de voyage. Long following of her own sweet will has made her intolerant and whimsical, as her niece Violet Whitney found when she spent some seasons in Italy and Paris with her aunt. Mrs. Bessie Stewart is another who found Mrs. McCreery's whims a cold douche to what had been a long friendship. The latter is hospitable after her own fashion, but lacks the generosity and thoughtful unselfishness that render travel and life a deux sweet to both hostess and guest. Miss Whitney is going to be married in the fall to Lieutenant-Commander John Lewis Purcell, U. S. N.

When you ask for Jesse Moore Whiskey be sure you get it. Don't let anyone tell you they have something just as good.

An Ardent Flower Lover

It gladdened the heart of Professor Emery E. Smith to see the thousands who visited the late flower show in the nave of the Ferry building. Mr. Smith is the professor of botany at Stanford university, and his interest in horculture is sincere. His especial hobby is California wild flowers, in which lore he is highly learned. His book "The California Poppy," was a labor of love. He spent a deal of money on the illustrations, which embody every stage of the eschscholtzia's growth, and the history of the flower was traced from its embryo.

The Rare Wild Flower

Notwithstanding the undoubted merits of the roses, carnations, pelargoniums, and other floral beauties displayed at the exhibition of the State society, the gem of the collection was the wild flowers—alas, that we may no longer designate them common wild flowers! There were some four hundred varieties on exhibition, but they by no means exhaust the resources of California, though year by year wild flowers become rarer. That but a single one of the school children brought a bouquet to offer for competition is as much owing to the difficulty of finding the blossoms as to indifference on the part of the children. But a few short years ago the Mission hills were a mass of blossoms in the spring time, and instead of being green they presented varying shades of blue and yellow according as the poppies, buttercups, cream cups or lupines predominated. Now one might climb from foot to crown and yet not secure half a dozen specimens. Wild flowers, like wild animals, naturally retreat before the footsteps of civilization, but with this tendency to shrink from man there is also the wanton destruction, which is responsible for the wiping out of the antelope and the buffalo and is fast making the indigenous plants rarer than exotics. The generation which is yet to find its first gray hair can recall the time when within a few hours of San Francisco wild flowers were to be found in seemingly endless profusion. Not only were the flowers destroyed and the supply of seed cut off, but no care or restraint was exercised in the matter of uprooting shrubs, breaking branches or scoring bark. No thought or consideration was given to the destruction wrought, and all too late we have awakened to the fact that our wild flowers, the admiration of Eastern tourists, who often pronounced them superior to the choice treasures of conservatories elsewhere, are all but extinct.

SHEA, BOCQUERAZ & CO., Agts., S. F.

"He is one of the most brilliant men at the bar; he seldom loses a case."

"Extremely well grounded in the law, I suppose?"

"No, he doesn't know much law, but he knows all that there is worth knowing about fixing a jury."

Those Nob Hill Palaces

It is again reported that Mrs. Huntington is thinking of deeding the Nob Hill palace which was formerly the Colton home to the Berkeley university. Two of the old Nob Hill palaces erected by railroad magnates have already been devoted to the cause of education and as Mrs. Huntington does not appear to have much use for her home, she will probably give it to Berkeley. The brownstone pile of the Floods is the only one of the mansions belonging to our early millionaires which is lived in. Miss Jennie Flood makes it her home when in town. The Charles Crocker house is opened only when the George Crockers or the C. B. Alexanders visit the city. I was once told the story that when the Crocker house was being furnished, a friend told Charley Crocker where he could get some rare antiques. The old gentleman retorted that he didn't want anybody's worn out old goods. He said he had plenty of money to buy new stuff. Once when he was complimented on the appearance of his library he proudly declared that he had "the finest bound set of books in the country."

A contributor to my chronicle of reminiscences informs me that when Charley Crocker kept a merchandise store in Sacramento, he waited on his customers in a long linen ulster and that Mrs. Crocker was his bookkeeper. They lived in the rear of the store. The same contributor declares that the foundation of D. O. Mills' fortune was a legacy of twelve thousand dollars that came to his wife. He deserted his soda water wagon and opened a bank. Later on William C. Ralston made him President of the Bank of California.

His Feet are Out

While writing of the Crockers I am reminded of the bon mot of a clever society woman which amused the members of the Century Club not long ago. She was arguing that refinement could not be instilled into the blood until at least two generations had enjoyed the advantages of wealth and position. "Now there are the Crockers," she said. "Old Charley Crocker had both feet and his nose in the trough, and now we have Will Crocker—well, everybody knows that he has taken his feet out."

A society bud in Honolulu who wrote to the society adviser on one of the papers there, asking the proper thing to do when her cavalier brings a quintet of native musicians to serenade her at a late hour, was replied to: "Steal softly downstairs and put a bottle of gin on the front porch."

Political Gossip

One hears some very amusing political gossip these days. It is evident that the effect of spring medicine is now being felt in the blood. One of the silliest of rumors is that Abe Ruef, the Mayor's mentor, is seriously thinking of getting into the fight for United States Senator. Of course Abe is too busy handling the Schmitz gubernatorial boom to find time for a contest over the toga. Meanwhile Gage is kept busy preparing a defense in the matter of the attacks against the management of the State prisons. The fight against him is growing more bitter every day, and his enemies are making it impossible for him to withdraw. He must seek a vindication, say his friends, and he will go before the people demanding it. He is going to have another row on his hands over the Yosemite Valley commission. C. G. Clinch, who has been a commissioner for many years, has been notified that he must retire this summer, and it is said that the reason is that he incurred the displeasure of "Ole" Bill Foote. Clinch being a Republican his friends declare that it is an outrage for a Republican Governor to put a commission under the control of a Democrat. Another story on the curb is that ex-Judge Van Fleet wants to go back on the Supreme Bench. In Democratic circles they are now talking of ex-Lieutenant Governor W. C. Jeter as an available man for the gubernatorial job. Jeter has fewer enemies than any prominent Democrat in the State, and during his term of office he had considerable experience owing to the serious illness at times of Governor Budd. Few men have such a clean record as Jeter.

The Charley Fairs are to start in a few days on one of their periodical jaunts to Carlsbad. They will be away about three months.

Williams-Lilley

There was a pretty wedding at San Rafael on Tuesday last when Miss Juliette Williams and Mr. Alexander Lilly were the contracting parties. Miss Juliette has been one of the belles of our swim for several years past, for a time sharing the honors with her beautiful sister Hannah, now the wife of Walter Hobart. The Williams girls come of an old, well known family. Their great aunt, one of old Billy Neil's daughters, married Governor Dennison who was afterwards Postmaster-General, and the Dennisons' two sons were well known in San Francisco. The eldest son, William Neil Dennison, was an aide on the staff of General McDowell and during his service here figured quite prominently as a high roller as well as a society beau.

A Tragedy in the Family

The second son, Erasmus, was in the Navy, and while his ship, the Saranac, was in this port he married Lissette Woodworth, the six months' widow of Commodore Selim Woodworth, whom he had previously met in Europe. Mrs. Woodworth-Dennison was the senior of the two and very wealthy, but as she preferred to hold the purse strings differences arose between her and her handsome young husband. One morning society was shocked to hear that 'Ras Dennison had put a bullet through his brain, in the rooms of Mammy Pleasant in Washington street, where he and his wife had formerly boarded. Mrs. Dennison had begun divorce proceedings against her husband.

A Swell Tailor's Son

In discussing the Williams-Lilly wedding, the dailies have referred to the groom as a rich and fashionable young widower. It is not to the young man's discredit to tell the truth. Indeed it would be snobbish to suppress the fact that he is the son of a swell military tailor of Columbus, Ohio. The senior Mr. Lilly was an estimable citizen. He made money and an enviable sartorial reputation by garbing soldiers and members of uniformed societies. The Lilly firm is well known throughout the Buckeye State for enterprise and fit. I do not think that young Lilly ever handled the tape, but Pa Lilly could take one's measure as quickly as any ninth part of a man ever did. The Lillys were not in society a few years ago, but they are now.

A friend writes from Washington, D. C., that Mrs. Oscar F. Long is having a gay time in the nation's capital and will soon have her hands full of social duties. She is to spend the summer in California.

Loves a Poor Young Man

The rumor of the engagement of Miss Bernice Landers and a certain Jack Johnston of Los Angeles seems to rest upon a sound foundation , judging from the latest advices I have received. The reputed fiance hasn't a nickel to his name, so my correspondent says, but his name is such a remarkably good one that he scarcely needs a dot to back it. He is a real blue blood and his morals are as irreproachable as his breeding. Miss Landers' parents, it is said, are not enthusiastic over the match. But they are rich and shouldn't care. Bernice Landers is a very pretty girl and she has a natural chic that is charming. She was one of the "Florodora" sextette that warbled "Tell Me Pretty Maiden" at the Doll Show last winter.

A Charming Hostess

One of the ladies in society to whom the young people are particularly indebted for much pleasure is the very agreeable mother of Miss Jean Nokes, the popular debutante of last season. Her frequent teas, little dinners and luncheons are never failing sources of enjoyment to her friends. Mrs. Nokes is the most charming of all the numerous daughters of Captain and Mrs. A. F. Rodgers. It was while she was employed in the United States Mint, in a brave effort for her family, that an unexpected legacy from an Eastern friend enabled her to take the position in society which she now adorns.

A Male Prude Turns Smasher

Out of the South has come a new "smasher" who may make Carrie Nation look to her laurels. His name is Charles T. Roberts, his home is Mississippi, and he is now sharing the fate of Mrs. Nation—spending a month in jail. Roberts' bete noir is not liquor but lingerie. He thinks petticoats and such frivols should neither be seen nor heard. The rustling of silken skirts is the signal for action with him and the sight of bifurcated linens and laces arouses Roberts' iconoclastic blood. All through the South he has left a trail of broken glass and prostrate forms, for his special task in life is laying low the seductive wax and wooden models which in shop windows wear the feminine things with insidious naturalness. Roberts' latest blow for the cause of modesty was struck at Memphis. He was passing the windows of a big drygoods firm there when his attention was attracted by the glances of a divinely-shaped creature garbed in diaphanous pretty things which only accentuated instead of hiding her waxen charms. Her rounded limbs were enhanced by silken stockings of bright lavender, and she smiled bewitchingly at Roberts. He blushed, stood a moment in silent prayer, and then put his foot through the plate glass. Down tottered the false beauty mixing up with peignoirs and other garments abhorrent to Roberts, who had his eyes raised to heaven when they were blacked by the shop keeper. In court Roberts offered to pay the damages from a fat purse, and said that he would ever destroy what he thought a menace to the growing male generation. If the Southron ever strikes San Francisco his busy day will have come surely.

Bosh and By-Laws

Mrs. Shafter Howard met the president and some of the leading members of the Century Club at a tea the other day. "You haven't been to the club for a long time," said the president sweetly, "why don't you come up to some of the meetings?"

"I've come to the conclusion," answered Mrs. Shafter Howard, "that women's clubs are all bosh and by-laws. It's only the individual woman who can accomplish anything. A club of women is as purposeless as a band of sheep without a shepherd and a dog."

This sort of sledge-hammer criticism is new in clubdom and club women are shocked at Mrs. Shafter Howard's slap of disapproval.

Smitten with a Widow

Every one who meets William Whittier Sr. wonders at his rejuvenation, for he is whiskerless and he has laid aside his staid, substantial, prominent citizen's broadcloth for jaunty things in tweeds cut like a college boy's, or the young lover's in the play. He seems quite happy when his friends tell him he looks ten years younger, and he assures them he feels so. As is usual people ask the wherefore, and as usual it is whispered that a woman is the cause of it all, and as not infrequently happens the woman is a widow, extremely pretty and chic, and possessing glorious brown eyes. She is Mrs. Laura Roe, the widow of the late George Roe, the capitalist, who is said to have caused a Mount Pelee to burst forth in Mr. Whittier's heart. She is rich, too, and perhaps that is the reason that the capitalist's suit is as yet unsuccessful. At first he thought she rebuffed him because of his whiskers. Then he attributed her coldness to clothes, and now he is a changed man, feeding upon hope. It is not the first time love has been the fountain of youth to a man past middle age. Doctor Robert McLean, the famous surgeon, was stricken with locomotor ataxia, but his second marriage has so revived him that he is almost vivacious. Tom Magee Sr. lopped off ten years when he fell in love the second time.

Huntington Simplicity

San Francisco has long since accustomed itself to the simplicity of the H. E. Huntingtons. When they inherited the bulk of Uncle Collis' wealth there was some hope that they would splurge, but they haven't. Their gowns and their entertainments are still the essence of simplicity, and they are going to live in Los Angeles where you couldn't spend much money even though you tried. And since Clara married Mr. Gilbert Perkins, she has crept into even a more modest shell. When the Perkins' were down South on their honeymoon they were pointed out to a distinguished English woman as relatives of the Princess Hatzfeldt. The woman lorgnetted Mrs. Perkins for a moment and then drawled:

"Well, really, I call that a beastly shame, don't you know. If the girl is the niece of the Princess, why on earth doesn't the Princess do something for the little thing? She could send her over some of her gowns, to make over if nothing else!"

The lady was told that the bride could afford to buy clothes for the Princess, and she was amazed. The story has traveled up from Coronado, and has caused many a laugh. But the Huntington girls are extremely popular, even though they never will set the fashions for San Francisco.

Louis Bruguiere has taken Malborne, Mr. Henry Bedlow's place at Newport, for the summer, and Peter Martin has rented Mr. John Cadwalader's place in the same town.

"Jake" Dressler

After reading the glowing eulogies of "Jake" Dressler that appeared in all the dailies I reflected that perhaps the asperities born of rivalry in journalism were not so bitter as I had imagined. Mutual admiration societies, so common in other professions, are unknown in journalism. The active newspaper man seldom reads flattering notices of himself. But he is abundantly execrated by those who have justly felt the sting of his scorn. "Jake" Dressler was content with the friendships which he established in his own profession. He knew that those were sincere. Conscious of his fidelity to duty he cared not for the opinion of those who were not of the newspaper business. His only ambition was to do the sort of work which was of value to his newspaper. His shortcomings were not such as should grieve either God or his fellow-man. It was by reason of his treatment of "Jake" Dressler that William R. Hearst first commended himself to my esteem. Ten years ago Dressler was believed to be dying of consumption. He didn't have a cent in the world. Mr. Hearst compelled him to take an indefinite leave on full salary, and sent him to Arizona. He staid there until completely recovered.

A Chapter of Gertrude's Past

How it must amuse that bright and cynical woman, Gertrude Atherton, to be gushed over and lionized by the club women of California! And how it must all impress her with the shortness of the feminine memory! Time was, and not so remotely of the past, either, when the talented authoress made these same club women the target of her pungent ridicule. That was before the world discovered that Gertrude Atherton was a genius. It was also before Mrs. Atherton acquired that tact and commercial instinct which are now deemed indispensable in the literary world. The Ebell women and the members of the Women's Press Ass., as she was wont to dub that organization in the long ago, doubtless bore her now as bathetically as they formerly did but she recently put a new book on the market and she knows the value of booming. In this age of keen competition no literary genius can afford to depend solely on the merit of his work. Pressagenting is an essential accessory to merit.

Her Sensational Attacks

Years ago when Emilie Tracy Y. Parkhurst, the daughter of that pioneer educator, John Swett, put forth her pet project of organizing the women writers of the Coast into a press association, Gertrude Atherton was one of those who responded to her call. In those days Gertrude was known only as a writer of erotics, and consequently there was uplifting of the eyebrows of some of the dear old ladies who felt that her work was scarcely in the same category with theirs. But things went smoothly until Gertrude began writing for one of the dailies a series of sparkling and spicy articles on the subject of her sex. The climax was reached when she discussed the women of St. Louis. The "lady writers" of the Womens' Press Association fumed fiercely at what they considered a libel on femininity. The Executive board held a meeting to consider the propriety of bouncing Gertrude from membership. But Mrs. Parkhurst espoused the cause of Mrs. Atherton and her pacific counsels prevailed. However when Mrs. Atherton learned that her articles had evoked severe and adverse criticism she resigned. Thereafter she discussed the ladies of the association in print, and won the warm approval of Ambrose Bierce, that association being his pet aversion. Together they lampooned the poseurs of the association in a manner that shocked those unfortunate women. But that is ancient history now, and Mrs. Atherton is being properly lionized. Even the members of the Atherton clan —the Macondrays, the Athertons and the Eyres—all of whom frowned when "The Randolphs of Redwood" was published, are now entertaining the gifted woman and worshiping in her limelight.

No Referenc to Hellfire

According to the press despatches when the Presbyterian General Assembly adopted the "brief statement of the Reformed Faith" one of the delegates declared that it was the beginning of the end. This foreboding was received with yells of derision, but many sober-minded people will take it more seriously. The dilution of the Westminster Confession by the General Assembly indicates a lack of positiveness of religious belief. The distinguished theologians handled the subject of eternal punishment with gloves. It is a delicate subject for it is no longer fashionable to believe in hellfire. They amended the Article of Faith concerning the last judgment to read that Christ will come again "to make a final separation between the righteous and the wicked. The wicked shall receive the eternal award of their sins," etc. This is indeed vague, yet the article was amended for the purpose of enlightenment. In the original it was set forth that the wicked "shall be cast into eternal torments and be punished with everlasting destruction." There is nothing vague about that. It is almost as plain as the chapter of St. Matthew on which it is founded wherein it is stated that the cursed shall be consigned to "everlasting fire prepared for the devil and his angels." The amendment is a fair sample of the shallow revision which Presbyterians are asked to accept.

The reporter who had been writing up the Stanford college controversy was fired by the city editor for failing to get certain pictures that his chief had instructed him to obtain.

Thereupon he wrote to the City Editor demanding a written statement of the case so that the whole world might know why he had lost his job.

The City Editor did not deign to reply.

Thereupon the reporter applied for a job as a college professor. "I want a job," he explained, "where a fellow is guaranteed to figure in a front-page story in all the dailies, in the event of his being fired."

The King Corners the Wine

From London the news comes to me that it is impossible to get the finest vintages of champagne there at any price, even at the most fashionable and most expensive hotels, because the King has cornered the market in anticipation of coronation festivities. An ocean of fizz will be consumed by the hundreds of fat and favored guests of Edward VII, to say nothing of the thirsty courtiers and attendants. sherry bins in the royal cellars hailed a new temperance leader. One preacher sermonized on the advance of the world in teetotalism. But these folk were mistaken for Edward sold out the port and sherry only because they were unfashionable and he needed the room for champagnes. Queen Victoria had old-fashioned ways and served the heavy, sweet wines after society had declared them out-of-date, but her son lost no time in showing his tastes after his accession. Champagne is today the wine par excellence in London whether for breakfast or banquet, and ever since he auctioned his Spanish and Portuguese wines, the King has been buying the choicest stocks of the province of Champagne. He has had the most skilled connoisseurs in France selecting his wine, and has made heavy draughts on the rarer vintages felt all over the world.

Don Enrique a "Champ"

There appears to be no limit to the ping-pong craze. It is spreading all over the world, and is frowned on nowhere outside of Paris. It is too tame for the Parisians who regard it as an emasculated sport. Nothing emasculated goes in Paris. Enrique Grau the Peruvian Consul who is known as Don Enrique because of his noble Spanish birth has achieved the distinction of being the champion ping-pongist of the Bohemian Club. He has won medals in the tennis court, and ping-pong comes easy.

Why It's Popular

Alice Hoffman, the all-round sportswoman of the smart set, is not suffering from ping-pongitis. Miss Hoffman is an expert tennis player and the parlor edition of the game does not appeal to her.

"Why do you suppose it has taken such a grip on the girls?" a gentleman asked her the other day.

"Haven't you observed how pretty they look when they say, 'Do you play ping pong?' " responded Miss Alice.

Of a truth ping-pong is as puckered as "prunes and prisms" and can be just as shapely mouthed. As a vocal exercise ping-pong will probably send prunes and prisms into the ark. It twists the lips into a more inviting pout and besides one can do this vocalization while playing the game. The naming of the game must have been the stroke of genius that popularized ping-pong.

Mixed His Genders

John Drew told a good story at the University Club just before leaving town. He said that a Frenchman once called on Augustin Daly and tried to persuade the manager to accept a play that he had translated. When he started to go he apologized for taking up so much time.

"I fear I have cockroached on your time, Mr. Daly. I hope you will pardon me."

"Not at all," said Daly, "but that word, my dear fellow, is hencroached."

"You are very kind to inform me," said the Frenchman. "I see, I was mixed up in my genders."

Somewhat Exaggerated

Hermann Oelrichs has come to the conclusion that Town Talk has as large a circulation as any of the dailies. Last week I announced that the genial Oelrichs had received one million dollars as his fee for services rendered in managing the litigation over the Fair estate. I was told the story by a club man who I supposed obtained it from an authentic source. I have since ascertained that it was as much of an exaggeration as the report of Mark Twain's death some years ago. Every day since the publication Mr. Oelrichs has received numerous letters of congratulation. And the story was no doubt wired East for he has also received telegrams of congratulation.

Junketing Foreigners

Prince Henry of Prussia had such a glorious time in this country that other distinguished representatives of foreign nations are eager to come over and try their hand at cementing the bond of friendship. The visit of the French delegation that attended the ceremony at the unveiling of the Rochambeau statue, is said to have been prompted by a desire to offset that of Emperor William's brother, and now there is talk of the British government soon being represented by a junketing member of the royal family. And only the other day the news came from Washington that the Grand Duke Boris of Russia will reach there late next month to spend a week at the Capital. He is the second son of the Grand Duke Vladimir. His mother is the social autocrat of St. Petersburg, and is said to possess a more powerful influence than the Empress herself. It is somewhat significant that within six months two princes of the great imperial houses of the world will have visited us.

A Lively Session Expected

Trouble is brewing in the order of the Native Daughters of the Golden West. The Grand Parlor is to hold its annual session in this city next month, and already an ominous rumbling is to be heard. The action of the joint committee which has been arranging for the entertainment of the delegates, in appropriating two hundred and fifty dollars for the purchase of some silverware for Grand President Genevieve Watson Baker, has provoked a deal of comment. It appears that the committee had incurred liabilities to an amount six hundred dollars in excess of the funds raised for the entertainment of the delegates, and that the deficit will have to be met by an appeal to the subordinate parlors. Some of the members believe, therefore, that it was imprudent to increase the deficit by buying a present for Mrs. Baker. Moreover, they suggest that it was an exhibition of bad taste for a member of Mrs. Baker's parlor to make the motion for the appropriation of the two hundred and fifty dollars. They say that the Grand Parlor always presents the retiring president with a ring, and that if it is desired to present anything else the money is raised by personal subscription. Mrs. Baker is a very enthusiastic Native Daughter and some of her friends have talked of urging her to stand for a second term. If they should start a fight for her in the Grand Parlor it would precipitate a very lively controversy. The San Francisco parlors are already being severely criticised for trying to capture all the offices, and the opposition to Mrs. Baker has sprung the story that she once made a speech against the Order of Rebecca and the Order of the Eastern Star. There are representatives of both orders in the N. D. G. W.

It never occurs to the selfish person, when expressing admiration of forgetfulness of self in others, to practice the virtue himself. It is much easier to enjoy the benefits vicariously.

Jordan's Shortcomings

President David Starr Jordan may be a man of splendid executive ability but I am of the opinion that he is not a good judge of human nature. The men that have fomented dissension were chosen by President Jordan to fill the positions that they have occupied, and it is evident that his judgment was seriously at fault. Men holding responsible executive positions should have the ability to discriminate in the selection of subordinates. The conduct of some of the Stanford professors of late was unworthy of members of a university faculty. A good, sound spanking is what some of them need. I fear that Jordan is so much in love with the sound of his own voice that he doesn't devote sufficient time to the management of the institution. He is always ready to lecture, and he doesn't charge high prices for his services. I am told that he will accept a round-trip ferry ticket if people cannot afford to give him more. On his lecturing trips he reminds one of an old-fashioned Methodist minister on a foraging tour.

Vulgarity at Stanford

While Stanford is being bothered with broils everything is running smoothly at Berkeley. President Wheeler and Mrs. Hearst are jubilant over the progress that the university is making, and it is said that they no longer regard Stanford as a rival institution. I am told that when tactless strangers tell Mrs. Hearst how much good she and Mrs. Stanford are doing for the State she does not exhibit pleasure. Mrs. Hearst is a woman of refinement and she would be shocked at the vulgarity that obtains at Stanford where the visitor is shown the trappings of Leland Stanford, Jr., and the gloves that Mrs. Stanford wore when she shook hands with Queen Victoria.

Napoleon's Degenerate Order

The recent celebration of the centennial of the Legion of Honor recalled to mind that the decorations of that order are becoming quite common in this city. Napoleon established the Legion of Honor as an order of merit to encourage excellence and probity in the State, but its decorations are no longer difficult of attainment. Sylvain Weill was decorated because he happened to be President of the French Hospital. Major Rathbone was put on the rolls for his broad-mindedness when Consul-General to Paris. He exhibited this quality by not blushing at the songs he heard in the Parisian cafes. Turkish Consul George Hall, who already has as many medals as the average crack-shot, is said to be striving for the French honor. George has had his picture taken with all his medals on his breast, a bit of conceit that perhaps should be pardoned in a young man who has so many good qualities to outweigh that almost unpardonable vanity. I should hope that he will get the ribbon from France, if for no other reason than that Napoleon's order has so degenerated the sooner its decorations become commonplace the quicker will they become absolutely worthless as evidences of merit.

Just When Mary Came Back

"Oh, the irony of Fate, or rather to put it practically, the uncertainties of Army life," said a charming young matron at a University Club luncheon the other day.

"Why do you say so?" was asked.

"Why, there is Winn ordered off to Utah just as Mary Kip has come home from the East, and won't he be missed at San Rafael this summer!" All of which is true. Miss Mary Kip made conquests by the legion, say her friends, during her Eastern visit, but one of the girls of our swim vows that "Will Evans" was decidedly in the lead of those who made any impression on the Californian belle. If he should follow her out here Captain Winn might find himself out in the cold, so perhaps it is just as well.

Apropos of Army beaux there is a persistent rumor that one of the pets among the officers who are stationed at the Presidio has been made captive by a prominent belle whose popularity in military circles is well known.

"Mash Notes"

According to Ashton Stevens, Mr. Scott of the Alcazar company is not only a bad actor of the School of Impossibles, but to his sin of acting in defiance of criticism he adds that of flaunting his mash-notes. When such a bad actor as Scott receives mash-notes, shouldn't the average thespian feel that there is no occasion for felicitating himself on his capacity for fluttering maiden-hearts? The conceit that prompted Mr. Scott to exhibit to Mr. Stevens the scented note of a passionate married woman, filled the critic with disgust and impelled him to toss the bad actor on his pen point. But the fact is that most actors accept mash-notes as testimonials, and preserve them just as they do press notices. They do not consider it egotistical to flaunt the evidences of their ability. The average actor doesn't hesitate to tell you that he is a good actor and that he has a big following. He will condescend to be your guest by the hour if you will listen to him expatiate on his professional success. In stock companies mash-notes serve the same purpose as press notices. They are exhibited to the management to prove that the actor has a following. Consequently some bad actors are so bad that they have to write mash-notes to themselves to hold their jobs. Perhaps Mr. Scott is one of them.

Stevens' Fame Spreading

By the way, Mr. Stevens' clever work in the Examiner has attracted the attention of the newspaper profession on the other side of the continent. I heard the other day that some weeks ago he received a very flattering offer to join the staff of the New York World. But he prefers to remain on the pay roll of Mr. William R. Hearst even though the San Francisco field is somewhat limited for talent such as his. However, I do not think it will be long before he does go to New York. The Journal's critic, Alan Dale, does work similar to that of Stevens, and he is the most widely read dramatic critic in the country. He is detested by members of the theatrical profession, and he is also feared by them, but on the first night of a new production in Broadway the management is exceedingly anxious to know what Alan Dale thinks of it. The actors would rather please Alan Dale than all the other critics combined.

Poniatowski and the Brandts

Mr. and Mrs. Brandt, the latter a niece of M. H. de Young, are being royally entertained in Europe where they have entree into the innermost circles owing to the social position of Mr. Brandt's family. Mr. Brandt's father was the foremost surgeon of France and was called into consultation whenever a royal personage was seriously ill. Queen Victoria, the Czar of Russia and all the other majesties have had his services and have knighted him. The son came to California in the capacity of an electrical engineer, a graduate of the famous French School of Engineering. He had letters to the De Youngs and shortly afterward married Mr. de Young's niece. Apropos of Henry Crocker's Sierra railway fiasco, I am reminded that Mr. Brandt suggested to him the value of conserving the waters of the Sierra lakes into electrical power and the Prince saw that the scheme was a good one. According to Brandt's story it was agreed that he should get a plump sum if he accomplished the feat, together with some stock. Brandt did the engineering work and the Prince attended to the financiering. In the end Mr. Brandt was frozen out and he threatened a sensational suit but the matter was compromised. It has been since reported that the Prince afterward sought letters of introduction through Brandt's father but young Brandt curtly replied that he would not undertake to introduce a Poniatowski into European society.

A Titled Chaffeuse from Fresno

Countess Scoletti will this summer attempt an automobile trip from San Francisco to New York. Count Scoletti will accompany his daring wife and as they are both expert chaffeurs they may manage the trip without drawbacks. Countess Scoletti is the daughter of Henry B. Spaulding, president of the Fresno Fruit Growers' Association. Irma Spaulding was expected to make her debut in San Francisco, where the smart set flung wide its doors to the prettiest girl in the vineyard country. But instead Irma went to Europe, and shortly afterward her engagement with Count Scoletti was announced. The gossips at once tagged him another penniless aristocrat, eager to annex American dollars. Much surprise was expressed, as Irma Spaulding was never rated the sort of girl to rummage at the bargain counter of broken down titles.

It turned out that she had not done so in this instance. The Count's individual fortune is larger than the Spauldings'. Two years ago the Scolettis came over from Paris and have spent much of their time at the Spaulding

Miss Minnie Bley, Miss Camille Bley and their sister-in-law, Mrs. Joe Bley, gave a delightful tea last Saturday afternoon at their home in Eddy street. Fully two hundred callers were received and entertained. A feature of the afternoon was the presentation to the little son and heir who lately brightened the menage of the Joe Bleys.

Philomath Actresses

The Philomath Club's theatricals on Monday afternoon were quite out of the regular order of women's club talent, and revealed a degree of dramatic ability that was scarcely expected. The play was a one-act farce, "The Corner Lot Chorus." Mrs. Greenebaum as Spriggie, Mrs. Triest as Penelope, Mrs. Sloss as Lavender and Miss Esberg as Challie were especially artistic and convincing. Mrs. Kahn's imitations were as clever as anything I have seen done in professionaldom and Mrs. Lewin's singing elicited much applause. Mrs. Sloss and Mrs. Weil gave a pas deux that was graceful and original.

The De Youngs are entertaining considerably in London. One of their recent affairs was a dinner in honor of their daughter Helen. It was given at the Carlton hotel, and the guests were Mrs. Chauncey, Mrs. T. P. O'Connor, Miss Neef, Sir John Henerie, Mr. J. Ridgely Carter, Mr. Walter Neef and Mr. Vaughan Morgan.

A Mere Suggestion

An unknown correspondent who thinks that our after-theatre cafes should have dressing-rooms sends me the following:

San Francisco people take such keen pleasure in visiting the cafes after the theatre that it is quite to be wondered at that a few fashion leaders do not institute some reforms; that they do not demand, as it were, more formality in service and reception. San Francisco has more pretty women to the square block than any other city in the country, and these same pretty women have as many pretty clothes andtake as much pleasure in being seen as their more stylish sisters in New York. Strangers from all over the world have remembered our bright cafes filled with beautiful women and their escorts listening to such good music as is not to be heard in any other American city's cafes. But alas! there is a rough and tumble air about it all as if the restaurateurs realized that they must scramble about and make as much money as possible in two or three hours, and so the pretty women in dainty gowns are hurried in and their wraps hustled off and hung over strangers' overcoats or laid on the seats of chairs. In New York in every restaurant that aims at good form there is a dressing room and maid to receive wraps so that the ladies may sit unencumbered in the cafe. San Francisco husbands and fathers are such cheerful payers and willing escorts that there is no reason why their women-folks should not have everything done for them to eradicate that air of provincialism in their surroundings when they spend their evenings in public. And it seems odd, too, that in this land of palms and flowers, public dining rooms should be almost devoid of floral decoration. We have beauty here, beauty which gladdens the eye very often away from the bosom of home; then why not have an appropriate setting while we are about it?

Society in the Summer

Though San Rafael was brought into prominence by the liveliest libel suit that ever gave society material for conversation, it is really a very dull little burg. It is so quiet over there now that the concerts of the toads are the only sounds disturbing the somnolent evenings. There is expected, however, to be a revival of gayety there as the summer moves on. Addie Murphy was over at the hotel this week, and is expected to return there later with her sister, Ethel Biddle, who is now in San Francisco on a visit from Philadelphia. Then the Salisburys have taken the Boardman home for a season, and when Margaret returns from Napa Soda Springs she will go to San Rafael with her mother. The whole Salisbury menage will be transported to the Boardman place. The Harry Mendells have taken the Sidney Smith home.

The Vendome in San Jose is more like itself than it has been during any previous season in ten years. The veranda looks quite like old times, when the Jim Keeneys, Wallaces and J. D. Phelan were always to be seen there on warm afternoons. Mrs. Frank Powers is at the Vendome this year. She is one of the prettiest young mothers to be seen these days, and her beauty has not waned since the days when as Jennie Gallatin she charmed the beaux of Sacramento and San Francisco.

There were thirty-two new arrivals at the Hotel Mateo this week. The hotel cottages are all taken for the season.

The Coming Fake

The daily papers are giving those two astute plug-uglies, Messrs. Fitzsimmons and Jeffries, a deal of free advertising these days. It appears to be their purpose to magnify the importance of the coming event in ring circles. After almost every prize-fight that takes place in this city the dailies lament that the people of San Francisco are so easily gulled. After each fake the wise sporting editors point out the numerous suspicious circumstances that should have warned people against patronizing the hippodrome, but it is because they treat such affairs seriously that people are lured to the ring-side. They know that Jeffries and Fitzsimmons have come to this city to make a little easy money. Fitzsimmons knows that he cannot win unless Jeffries is paid to lose, and nobody familiar with the history of pugilism has any confidence in either.

When Bob Read Thackerary

Bob Davis is coming to the front in New York as a writer of vaudeville sketches. He finds time to scribble for the stage, on the side, as it were, for he is one of the literary editors of the New York Journal. It was about ten years ago that Bob Davis came to this city from the Sagebrush State. He had sagebrush in his hair and a Carson appeal in his innocent blue eyes when he walked into a newspaper office and asked for a job. He could offer no recommendation except that he was a brother of Sam Davis, the Nevada humorist. He was appointed a member of the Call staff and he was soon one of the cleverest reporters in the town. He was an ambitious chap, and he formed a co-partnership with Alice Rix and Nankivell the artist who has since made a reputation in the East, and the three started a bright weekly paper called Chic. It lived through about six issues. That Bob Davis is now a literary celebrity in New York is surprising news to those who remember his debut in local journalism. One day at the Press Club he picked up a copy of Vanity Fair and was soon absorbed in the story. After reading through several chapters he turned to the title page and read the name of the author. Then turning to a friend he asked: "Who is this fellow Thackeray, anyway? By Jove, he knows how to write!"

Our Ambassador's Breeches

SpecialAmbassador Reid declared at a banquet in New York the other night that he intended to wear knee breeches at the Coronation of Edward. He is consequently being abused by indignant Democratic editors who are sticklers for Jeffersonian simplicity. Yet Reid has abundant precedent for knee breeches. Jefferson himself wore them, and they were part of the prescribed costume of our foreign representatives down to 1853 when they were banished by order of Secretary of State Marcy. James Buchanan was the first American Minister to Great Britain who appeared at Court in full length trousers, and when Queen Victoria saw him she could not help smiling.

The Patterson Sisters

When Eudora (Dodie) Patterson marries, none of the Patterson sisters will be left in single blessedness. Grace was the first to wed. She was followed by Kitty, the youngest, and then Josephine, the second sister, who went East to study music, and made a great success with her voice in concert, gave up her career to retire into domestic life. "Dodie" is the third sister and resembles Grace somewhat in complexion and feature. She is to marry Frederick W. Van Meter in August, if present plans do not go awry. The Pattersons reside in Santa Clara avenue, Alameda, all except the head of the family, Captain Martin Patterson, who is in the Emperor's steamship service in North China.

Gerald May Win Elena

The Denver gossips are coupling the names of Gerald Hughes, the jilted fiance of Mrs. Baxter-Tevis, and Elena Robinson. There is no doubt, they say, that Hughes is serious in his attentions to the charming daughter of Mrs. Jimmy Robinson. When the Robinsons went South for Mr. Robinson's health, Mr. Hughes joined the party and was very devoted to Elena. It was probably at his solicitation that they decided to try the Denver altitude. Immediately upon their arrival the Robinsons were seized by the Hughes' clan, but Mrs. "Jimmy" is too seasoned a leader to become involved in a social war. So she has accepted the hospitality of the Baxter element too. But Elena spends most of her time with Gerald, and the gossips say that Cupid has his victims hard and fast. Elena Robinson's eligibility has been a theme for the matchmakers ever since her debut a season or two ago. It took place under the auspices of Mrs. Eleanor Martin, for the Robinsons were then living in San Jose for the benefit of Mr. Robinson's health. Elena spent so much time in the Martin domicile in those days that Mrs. Grundy hinted that Mamma Martin coveted her for a daughter-in-law. Then came the rumor of her engagement to Knox Maddox, who recently tried so hard to become a Supervisor. The gossips were again on the wrong scent. If Elena should marry the Denver swain it would be a great strategic achievement for the Hughes' family. It has always been acknowledged that Mrs. Jimmy Robinson was born to be the leader of the smart set. But her husband's ill health has caused the family to be nomadic, and as a consequence the predestined mantle has fallen on other shoulders.

Mrs. Martin's Sobriquet

Mrs. Eleanor Martin is not aware of it, but the wise ones among her friends always send her a dinner or luncheon invitation with the hour given as half an hour earlier than they expect her to arrive. Unless they do so Mrs. Martin is always half an hour late, and as a consequence she has acquired the sobriquet of "The late Mrs. Martin."

California Women's Gowns at Court

Mrs. Charlemagne Tower, who was formerly Nellie Smith of Oakland wore one of the handsomest gowns at King Edward's second Court. It was of yellow satin embroidered with gold, the train of pale blue satin embroidered with gold and yellow floss. Mrs. Richardson Clover wore a blue satin gown trimmed with silver and opals and with a point lace flounce. The court train was of blue velvet. Her diamond tiara was superb and fully equaled in point of beauty those of the titled women present.

Sample Court Gossip

My correspondent informs me that women at Court comport themselves about the same as they do at less pretentious functions. Stately dowagers wag their heads in comfortable gossip in cosy nooks just as do the Madame Grundys in the lower stations of society. In the low murmur of conversation that hummed through the splendid corridors and rooms one caught amusing scraps of conversation. "Her bodice will soon come off entirely!" "His attentions mean nothing, I assure you!" "Who is that man: her very latest?" "I won a clean hundred at bridge yesterday!" The subjects discussed were as petty as the surroundings were grandiose and dignified.

Seductive Grace, though gifted well
With charms most physically fair,
Assumes a method spiritual,
And spends much time in holy prayer.

She makes complaint that her poor knees
Are worn, by kneeling long and oft;
And now declares that, for her ease,
She'll pray on cushions good and soft.

I asked Miss Grace, quite recently,
How worked her plan. With blushing frown
She said: "Full well, sir; for, you see,
I always pray now sitting down."

REFLECTIONS.

To interest a man get him to talk about himself.

The man who has no enemies, deserves no friends.

When a man rails against Fate be sure he is a failure.

With the Money Makers

Giant Powder Company Decline

There has been almost a panic in the stock of the Giant Powder Consolidated Company. The stock has been going down steadily for weeks and at the beginning of this week tumbled badly. During April the stock was strong and went up from $78 to $80.25. The dividend of 75 cents a month has made the stock very attractive to investors and it was on rumors that this dividend was to be decreased that the shares slumped. The rumors proved correct and the dividend now will be but 50 cents a month, or $10,000 instead of $15,000. It is said by the company that the former dividend was too much and that the wisdom of increasing the surplus urged the reduction. The increased price of nitre has had something to do with the drop. Nitre went up from $1.36 to $1.85 per 100 pounds but has since been reduced to $1.73. Giant has always been a good local security and the fall in its shares created something of a sensation on the rialto. There is no reason to believe that the lowered dividend will not be regular, and there should be no further slump in share prices.

Hawaiian Situation Improving

Certainly the most information to the average San Francisco investor and speculator is about Hawaiian sugar stocks, for a vast sum of San Francisco money is tied up in Hawaiian securities, and the situation has been critical and depressing for many months. I have received, by the last steamship from the Islands, authoritative news of affairs there and am able to write at some length. My correspondent says: "With sugar down to a low price and a tight money market depressing us, it is very pleasant to know that the conditions of labor on the various sugar estates are reported to be more satisfactory than at any time since annexation. Wages have been gradually reduced from time to time until the present scale is but a few dollars higher than the scale in vogue during contract service. One plantation manager on the island of Oahu reports an over-supply of labor. A feature of the stock market is the sale of a block of 350 shares of Honolulu Rapid Transit and Land Company stock belonging to Millionaire Alexander Young, who is now in Oakland, the purchasers being Honolulans. A number of small blocks of Ewa Sugar Company changed hands at $24. There were transfers of Hawaiian Sugar at $25, although trading at present is slow at this figure. Considerable Kihei Sugar Plantation stock has been bought by one broker at $10.50. McBride Sugar Company sold readily at $6.50. Olaa Sugar Company assessable stock is offered at $5 and paid up at $13. This stock has been dull since the announcement by the agents that the remaining assessment of $8 will be called for in four equal installments of $2 every two months, beginning June 20th, making the entire stock paid in by December 20th. Sales of Waialua Sugar Company shares were offered at $65, the closing quotation being that figure bid and $67 asked."

Honolulu Traction Stock

The Honolulu Rapid Transit & Land Company has held two important meetings, at which meetings it was decided to increase the present bonded indebtedness of $460,000 to $1,000,000, to be used at any time in the future in the further development of the system which is required. The capitalization was also increased to $1,000,000, not to be issued at this time. The large bond brokerage house of Rollins & Sons, of New York and Boston, have taken $315,000 worth of bonds. Of this amount but $106,000 was in the treasury of the Rapid Transit Company, the remaining $209,000 being exchanged through local holders, for 6 per cent preferred stock, to be transferred at any time at the option of the holder into common stock of the company.

Oil is Confident

Transactions in oil shares started in well during the early part of the week, the aggregated sales being extensive and the prices held well in hand on a substantial basis. During the last few days, however, buyers have been rather backward and an easy tone appears to have got a foothold on the market. While prices have not declined materially there has been less disposition to meet asking figures and a slight decline has been the result. Holders, however, appear to be very confident as to the future of the market and as they are making few concessions business has been largely curtailed during the last two or three days. Sterling was fairly steady at $1.89 and Monte Cristo finds buyers at $1.35. Junction is held quite firmly at 25c. and Sovereign brings 35c. There have been a few sales of Imperial at $16 but this stock is held in few hands. Advices from the oil fields announce the opening of new wells in several districts, some of which are unusually large producers. Well number 36 of the Santa Fe Oil Company in Fullerton district has turned out to be a veritable gusher, having produced 1,200 barrels of oil per day for several successive days. The oil at times spurted over the top of the derrick. The Clairmont Oil Company has several good wells in the Kern oil fields, one of which during March yielded nearly 10,000 barrels. The Santa Ana city trustees recently ratified an agreement with Orange county by which the latter agrees to install a plant to prepare oil for road sprinkling, the city to

Stock and Bond Exchange

Dullness ruled on the Stock and Bond Exchange during the week, and prices while rather easy showed but few fluctuations from day to day. Sales generally were of small volume and were confined to a few securities. The shares of the Giant Powder Company Consolidated were very weak and with the opening of the 10:30 session on Monday brokers began to unload the holdings of many of their clients and the price in consequence receded sharply. By the closing session $70 was the best price bid with more stock offering than buyers wanted. On Tuesday morning the stock dropped to $68 but subsequently recovered to $69.75 and some 400 shares changed hands between these prices. At the afternoon call further gains were made and sales were recorded at $70.25, with that price bid for more. Up to about two weeks ago the stock was one of the favored offerings and was in good demand at from $78 to $80.25 a share, generally ruling steady at $79. There was but little business in water shares, Spring Valley selling as low as $90.50 and slowly at that figure. San Francisco Gas and Electric shares were slightly firmer, buyers bidding $44.12 1-2 against $44 last week. Other light and power shares came in for some little attention and while transactions were limited the steadiness noted last week continued quite pronounced. There were but light offerings of Alaska Packers Association's shares and these were held steady at $160, with bids at $159.50. Several fairly large blocks of shares of the California Wine Association changed hands at $100.75, a slight improvement over last week's price. In bonds trading has been narrow and prices have not varied materially. Spring Valley 4s, third mortgage sold in fair quantity at $102, as did the 1910's of the Southern Pacific of Arizona at $114.75. Government bonds came in for some little consideration at maintained figures.

Metal Men Advancing

Sales of mining stocks during the week have made a very good showing and prices have been steady with indications of considerable strength in some of the leading stocks. In some instances the fluctuations have covered a wider range than for some weeks past. Caladonia has been selling freely, the price varying as much as 7 cents in one day. At the beginning of the week this stock sold at 75c. and 82c., gradually hardening so that the ruling figures were 82c. and 83c., and then easing off towards the close of the week to 73c. and 74c. as current figures. Consolidated California and Virginia also came in for a good measure of attention. The price varying from $1.45 and $1.55 with the first named figure prevailing at the close. Ophir has been very steady and the same may be said of Mexican and Confidence. Potosi has fluctuated but slightly and has been quite a favorite at 34c. and 35c. Generally speaking the market may be said to be in a better condition than for some time past, for although there has been no marked advances values generally appeared to be well sustained. The Mountain Copper Company which has a large operating plant at Keswick, Shasta county, has recently re-incorporated in London with a reduction in capital stock from $6,250,000 to $1,250,000. The shares of the original company had a par value of $25 each. In the new corporation there are 250,000 shares at $5 each and the remainder of the capitalization is taken up in $3,750,000 in debentures of $15 denomination bearing 6 per cent interest. It is arranged that these debentures are to be paid off gradually, thus finally reducing the capital to the amount named in the new corporation. The company is in first class condition and has a reserve fund of $2,500,000. The Financier

TRUNKS FOR TRAVELERS

There is no excuse these days for any one to pack a shabby, old-fashioned trunk, or carry a traveling bag that is out-of-date. The A. B. Smith Co., 128 Ellis street, carries a complete line of trunks, all sizes and makes, of fine quality and at remarkably reasonable prices. Their alligator bags are very handsome and are just the thing for travel this summer. They also carry the latest makes of suit cases.

Lord Temple cigars are smoked by all clubmen who will take nothing but the best.

The Loves of Felix

[Translated from the French of M. Neant.]

When wine is in, wit is out. When more wine is in, either the man falls under the table or else he tells big stories of his amatory conquests. Most men are liars when it comes to that. The men who have never had any affaires de coeur are the worst in this respect. I thank God I have never been one to boast of my success with women. When Paul and Charles and George and the rest of them brag over their fourth bottle how Madame This and Mademoiselle That, and Hortense and Marie and Therese have fallen victims to their charms, I have ever been silent. Perhaps it is to my discretion that I owe my good luck with les femmes. "Great souls have wills; feeble ones have only wishes." Many men waste their time wishing, when if they only willed they could easily have their desires for the mere prusuit of their advantage. But men are fools when they meet a woman. I am a poor weak fool myself. But I do not boast of my favors—that exhibition of weakness I am spared by the merciful Providence that has endowed me with a mind.

* * * * * * * * * *

There are ways and ways of winning women, and ways and ways of dealing with them after they are won. "L'un qui aime, et l'autre qui se laise aimer." Except your women of commerce, and widows of a certain age, I have found that most women prefer to love rather than be loved. They take the latter for granted, and like nothing so well as to lavish the strength of their affections upon their lover, be he ever so cold. I have at this moment four women in love with me. I drive them four-in-hand, but three are always invisible to the other one, while the one is leading. What would happen were the invisible cloaks to fall, I do not know. It might be calamitous. But as I do not love any one of the four, the calamity would only cause me a little annoyance. My heart is bestowed elsewhere.

* * * * * * * * * *

I dined with Hortense today. She is a tropic flower and she spends all the fervor of her passionate heart upon me. She is not extravagant in her whims. An occasional diamond, a new gown once in a twelvemonth are all she exacts. I am not the only one she receives at her home. But I am not jealous. Why should I be? She loves me, and not the others, while I do not love her at all. When I am wearied of the Faubourg Germain in l'amour, her Quartier Latin passion is as rejuvenating as an ice-cold plunge followed by a Manhattan.

* * * * * * * * * *

But give me Madame d'Orsay for passion. If she had not been born in the aristocratic quarter she would have been a successful rival of Hortense in her own field. She is a widow, young, rich, not beautiful but with the indescribable quality we call fascination—the magetism de diable. She is a tigress for jealousy, yet I disarm her by telling her of all my loves. She rallies me on Miss Harcourt, the American heiress who was at one time erroneously reputed my fiancee. She bids me "make the dear girl happy." But if I did, I would not give my bride a month of undisturbed happiness. Madame d'Orsay would soon chase serenity from that unruffled white brow. Miss Harcourt is not one of the four-in-hand. I do not yet count her as mine. She is one to be worshiped at a distance. A charming girl, sweet, unaffected in manner, if she loved me I would count myself among the immortals. Madame always loves to give me good advice. "You must marry, cher Felix," she says, "and you must not go any more to see Hortense." Of course she knows all about Hortense. She fancies she knows all my heart secrets. "What you should do is to settle down. Some nice girl—"

"But why girl?" I ask, "why not a woman of the world—a widow, say?" and then she always turns the conversation. But I do not think I shall ever marry. Why should I?

* * * * * * * * * *

Mrs. Dexter is a pretty Englishwoman, and her flirtation with me began some years ago in a country-house where we were both staying. We have kept it up intermittently, whenever we happened to be chez the same people. Then she came to Paris last year while her husband was in China. What were men put into the world for if not to minister to women's whims? She asked me to look up an apartment for her. I did, and then naturally I fell into the habit of dining with her occasionally. Sometimes there were others there, but more often we were a d eux. I thought it would be but

"A little warmth, a little light
Of love's bestowing—and so, good-night!

"A little fun, to match the sorrow
Of each day's growing—and so, good-morrow!"

But it seems she took it au serieux. She took it so seriously that I became a trifle frightened. I balked at the fence and turned my steed back. I did not call for a fortnight. Nor did I answer, except verbally, one of the dainty little billets doux that came to my apartment every day. Perhaps it would have been better had I done so. My valet was just preparing my bath one morning and I was sitting in neglige costume smoking a cigarette. "Monsieur, une femme," announced Jacques, and without waiting to find whether I was ready to see her Mrs. Dexter burst into the room. "Oh, Felix," she cried, "my husband is on his way to Paris. What shall I do?" "Do?" I replied, "why, return home immediately." But she threw herself into my arms and wept, and cried: "Oh, darling, my Felix, I can't—I can't. He'll kill me if he knows." "Knows? My dear Mabel, there is nothing to know." In spite of her sobs—I have no desire to be brought into a divorce suit as co-respondent—I bade Jacques see her to her automobile. And that afternoon I was speeding on my way to London. When I returned, I called on the Dexters and was very genially greeted by the Major, who thanked me for all my kindness to his "little Mabel" during her stay in Paris. "She says she cannot fancy what she would have done if you had not been so kind," said the Major. I don't fancy she would. However, I still visit Mabel. She is one of the most high-strung and least to be depended on of my four-in-hand.

* * * * * * * * * *

I saw Gwendolyn Harcourt today. We rode in the Bois for an hour. Ah, what a girl is that! What would I not give to kiss those sensitive lips? But I have tried every wile in my book of love upon her, and all that results seems to be frank friendship.

VARNEY W. GASKILL, Special Agent
With HILBERT BROS., Importers
TELEPHONE BUSH 25 SAN FRANCISCO

Gwendolyn evidently likes me, but she doesn't place me on a pedestal. Therefore she will never love me, for women like her can never love men. They must have gods.

* * * * * * * * * * *

After all, I am not fitted to be the husband of a virgin soul. I would probably be bored after the glamour of the lune de miel had worn off. I would sigh for Hortense, or Mabel or Madame d'Orsay, or perhaps Folly, the high-stepper of my four-in-hand. Folly is a little danseuse at Les Varieties. She is chic, piquant and unlettered. She calms me when I am angry, amuses me when I am sad, and no one knows better than she how to order a dinner. Folly is the antidote when the passions of the others turn to poison.

* * * * * * * * * *

George had a dinner today in honor of Madame Lepages. She is a quiet, rather pretty little woman. Her reputation as a heart-breaker and man-slayer had led me to fancy quite a different kind of a person. I was almost moved to add her to my collection. George introduced me as "The man who does not care for women." Afterward, he told me Madame Lepages, who is not a widow but a divorcee with a tri-husband experience, had desired to meet me. She had long been interested in me and had come to Paris this winter solely for the purpose of meeting me. I wonder why—Cleopatra having a fancy to cross swords with Don Juan?

* * * * * * * * * *

My physician told me today that I was on the verge of a mental collapse. "Cigarettes?" I asked. "No, women," he answered. I had never thought of it before. It is true, Hortense has been rather exacting on my bank-book lately, and Mabel has been unpleasantly indiscreet. Madame d'Orsay looks at me with eyes aflame, and when she bids me "reform," I feel that such a course could mean but one thing—give up the others for her. But constant passionate embraces, warmth without the realization—could I stand it? I asked the doctor what must I do for a cure. "Get married," he said.

* * * * * * * * * *

I have made up my mind. I shall ask Gwendolyn Harcourt to marry me. In no other way can I cut loose from all these entanglements. Perhaps she will not have me. But I will ask her anyhow. If she were only capable of feeling the passion that moves those others! But no, she looks for an ideal.

* * * * * * * * * *

On my way to Miss Harcourt's I met Madame Lepages. She is a woman who gains one's heart slowly but surely. I have dined with her several times, but she never permits more than a hand pressure. She seems to be colder in her indifferent way than even Gwendolyn Harcourt is. Oh, is it worth while resigning my liberty—to give up all I love in life? But yes, I must remember what my doctor said.

* * * * * * * * * *

Gwendolyn loves me. My pulses thrill with the rapture of that first kiss. She says she has always loved me. We shall be married immediately. Gwendolyn is not cold—she has if anything an exuberance of warmth. These young girls have not been taught by experience to temper their passion.

* * * * * * * * * *

Apres, le deluge! Gwendolyn is now Madame Felix. Hortense was the most rational of the four-in-hand. She wrote her congratulations, thanked me for my liberal donation to her exchequer, and bade me come in and see her now and then "when Madame is away or indisposed." Madame d'Orsay has written nothing—I feel that her wrath slumbers. Mrs. Dexter wept bitterly, threatened me with all sorts of things and then—consoled herself with Pierre. As for Folly, the poor child killed herself—drowned herself in the Seine. I had not thought Folly would care so much. Madame Lepages met us in the street a few days after the wedding. "I'm awfully glad," she said, "and I know you will be awfully happy." Such is the heart of man that, up to the brim in bliss that I am, I found myself wishing Madame Lepages had been by my side instead of Gwendolyn. I wished she had looked sad, instead of indifferently joyous.

Etta Butler will spend her vacation in San Francisco but next season she will star in a play of her own. Etta Butler has risen rapidly since she graduated from amateurdom. Her first hit of any moment was made in vaudeville with her imitations of Mrs. Fiske and Mrs. Carter, but she can do other things quite as well as imitation.

Maude Fealy has made an excellent impression this week at the Grand as Babbie in "The Little Minister." But next week one will have a better opportunity to judge of her capacity in "My Lady Dainty."

STAGE

The Country Girl

In the old days when John Drew, James Lewis, Ada Rehan and Edith Kingdon were members of Augustin Daly's company, "The Country Girl" was regarded as one of the most charming comedies in the repertory of that superb organization. Its drawing capacity was equal to that of "Love on Crutches," "A Night Off" and "Dollars and Cents," but after seeing it presented by the Kathryn Kidder company one marvels that it should ever have afforded entertainment. Have we become too blase to enjoy such simple comedy and mild horseplay? Or is it because Mr. Lonergan ruined it in adapting it for an up-to-date production? I am inclined to think that Mr. Lonergan, whom I remember as a very bad actor, should share the responsibility with Miss Kidder and her company. It is not pleasant to feel that one's earlier judgment was so faulty, and it is safe to assume that Mr. Daly was a better hand at adapting plays than Mr. Lonergan, and that the members of his company were less likely to jar on one's feelings than—Mr. Monroe Salisbury for instance. Mr. Salisbury comes to us heralded as a blood-relative of the Salisburys of the Fortnightly Club. I am surprised that they did not persuade him to conceal the fact. Mr. Salisbury acts right out before everybody in a manner that proves him innocent of the vice of self-consciousness. If he were conscious of the figure that he cuts he would desert the stage and become a cotillion leader, or join a Living Picture show, for he has a knack for posing that might be perfected. Miss Kidder is scarcely suited to the role of the country girl, for she imparts to the character a grotesque air. The simple maiden was of the hoydenish type, but she was alluring withal and winsome. The Peggy of Miss Kidder is a caricature. The Harcourt of Mr. Hackett is pleasing to the eye but it is not artistic. Mr. Hamilton's Moody is unnecessarily noisy. The other members of the company do fairly well. The story of "The Country Girl" was recently woven into a comic opera libretto and set to music under the title of "Dolly Varden," for Lulu Glaser, and it has made a hit. The play has a comic opera flavor and should be relegated to the realm of music.

Gorky Writing Plays

After scoring such a success in the field of fiction, Maxim Gorky, the young Russian writer, has turned his attention to the drama, and has been almost equally successful. In "Mestchanie" (the Small Bourgeoise) he makes use of the same theme chosen by Tourgueneiff in his novel "Fathers and Sons," but while Tourgueneiff has placed his scenes amongst the wealthy and upper class, Gorky takes those just above peasants and wage laborers. His drama is an illustration of the family life of a small tradesman. The father is ignorant and tyrannical, the mother a colorless inanity, and the children ill-bred and superficial. There is a son expelled from the university for participation in political intrigue, and an adopted son, a half-educated mechanic, while the daughter is a teacher. They quarrel in pairs and in trios, with occasional variations when the whole family takes a hand. They marry against the wishes of the father, or die by their own hands from disappointment in love, and there are lapses into insanity—just such a picture as we have been prepared to expect from the author of "Foma Gordyeeff" and "Twenty-six and One." Translations of criticisms from the Russian press state that though the individual scenes and pictures are good, on the whole the drama needs development.

A New Leading Lady

Fanny McIntyre has settled down to enjoy her sojourn in San Francisco as one of the Belasco-Thall company's leading ladies. She has domiciled herself and her souvenirs of travel in a cosy little apartment at the Van Nuys, just diagonally across the street from the Cumberland where lives Marion Convere, the other Belasco-Thall leading woman. Miss McIntyre made a most favorable impression in the play last week, and she promises to become one of the best loved leading women a southside audience has ever applauded. She is a handsome woman with the charm of perfect femininity. Her voice is capable of fine grades of expression.

The actors at the Theatre Francaise are clamoring for an allowance for clothes. They complain that the class of plays they are required to produce requires so much dressing that their salaries are inadequate, and they demand the same recognition which is accorded to the actresses.

Lorraine Hollis' "Du Barry"

In a popular price Brooklyn theatre, Loraine Hollis last week produced a new version of "Du Barry," Mrs. Leslie Carter's great success. The Hollis version is called "Jeanne du Barri" and judging by the caustic criticism given it by New York's professional carpers it is utterly without merit. The characters are all jumbled up and the plot becomes so incoherent as the play progresses that it is impossible to follow it. Loraine Hollis always had a penchant for producing "her own" versions of plays. I remember when she put on "The Clemenceau Case" at the Bijou. I believe Lester Lonergan was in the cast, the same Lonergan who adapted "The Country Girl" for Kathryn Kidder. Loraine Hollis is one of those actresses who, given every opportunity to rise in their profession, never manage to do anything worthy. When she first went upon the stage she was given a position by Augustin Daly. But she did not like to play small parts in New York after having been featured in San Francisco. She preferred being a big toad in a small puddle, and so she returned here to star and tour with her own company—a very mediocre one gathered from the byways of the Rialto. Loraine Hollis is a daughter of Laura D. Fair, the heroine of Mark Twain and Charles Dudley Warner's novel which brought the immortal Sellers into existence. Loraine, or Lillie, Fair was married quite young to an equally youthful husband named Andrew J. Hynes. He was a newspaper man and the only son of a Southern couple of aristocratic feelings but reduced fortunes. The young people, being both spoiled children, disagreed after a time and separated.

Robert Downing is largely centering his ambition these days in the dramatic career of his daughter. Minnie Downing made her debut here last year as the slave girl, in that powerful Biblical drama "The Voice of the Wilderness." Her sweet, plaintive voice, unaffected manner and graceful posings made a remarkable impression on audience and critics. She is very young, not yet seventeen, but is studying hard and there is reason to believe she will become an actress of note. Mr. Downing's ex-wife, Eugenie Blair, also has a daughter on the stage, Eleanor Montell, who lately made her first appearance in the East. Eugenie Blair's first husband was Forrest Robinson.

Peter Dailey is as good as he ever was. His comedy is not of the intellect but it is sparkling. He is the real thing in American humor. He gives us twenty minutes of good fun that makes the most dejected man forget his pessimistics for awhile. His amusing nonsense is effective and it would be well if we had more of that sort of thing in vaudeville. Dailey, by the way, was for three years one of the best comic men on the variety stage, so vaudeville is not really a new venture for him. His humor is as much his own as his avoirdupois. He doesn't need other wits to manufacture clever lines for him, because he can get them all out of his own head. If you do not laugh at Peter Dailey's jokes, you are either stupid or a prig.

Mrs. James Brown Potter and Kyrle Bellew gave an adaptation of Dumas' "Francillon" at the Baldwin some years ago. It is a comedy with a decided emotional interest, the way a wife took to win her husband back to her being the keynote. The motif is not unlike that used in "The Masked Ball," in which Maude Adams made her first great success. The adaptation made by L. Du Pont Syle is entirely new, and the play will probably differ in many particulars from that we saw Mrs. Potter and Mr. Bellew in.

At the Show Next Week

COLUMBIA—Kathryn Kidder, for the first time on any stage, Professor L. Dupont Syles' adaptation of Dumas' "Francillon." This is a society drama of deep heart interest, with a bright comedy element.

ALCAZAR—"His Wife's Father," the first time in stock of W. H. Crane's delightful comedy. This will be the farewell appearance of Marion Convere and M. L. Alsop, and the last week of the present stock season.

GRAND OPERA HOUSE—Maude Fealy in "My Lady Dainty," by Madeline Lucette Ryley, one of the greatest successes at the Madison Square theatre, New York, last season. Miss Fealy will be seen as Jemima Jeffrey, the role created by Effie Shannon in the New York production.

TIVOLI—"The Toy Maker," with Ferris Hartman in his old success the title role and Annie Meyers as the doll. New mechanical effects are to be introduced.

FISCHER'S—"Fiddle Dee Dee," still packing the house so the management cannot take it off. Maude Amber and Freda Gallick in new songs.

ORPHEUM—Walter Le Roy and Florence Clayton, renowned Irish comedians, their first appearance here, in George Cohan's "Hogan of the Hansom"; Irene Franklin, character singer and dancer, in her latest songs and imitations; F. Wilbur Hill and Willette Whitaker, new to us, in a refined musical interlude; Murphy and Slater, colored comedians, also new; Stuart Barnes, Lotta Gladstone, Peter F. Dailey, the two little Pucks and the biograph.

MUSIC

A Great Choral Concert

The Pasmore concert last Saturday evening was more than a success, it was an event. The stage of Metropolitan hall was like a flower garden, crowded as it was with row upon row of daintily-costumed women, against a background of sombre-clad men. There must have been at least one hundred and fifty voices in the chorus. The body of the house was likewise well packed with an audience whose interest was manifested by close attention to a long program. The opening chorus was Mrs. Hemans' "Treasures of the Deep" set to music by Mr. H. B. Pasmore, and with Mr. Fred Maurer at the piano. The chorus was in good voice and rendered Mr. Pasmore's eloquent music with fine feeling. Mr. Maurer has been fast making a name for himself as an accompanist, but he never appeared to better advantage than on this occasion. He accompanied all the choruses and several of the solo numbers and did most effective and intelligent work. This was particularly marked in the Weber number. Miss Warden's solos, which were set down for number one, were postponed until later in the evening, and Mrs. Charles C. Hughes took her place upon the program. Her number was "Should He Upbraid" (Bishop) and was admirably rendered. Mrs. Edith Phelps Collins succeeded well in Meyerbeer's "Nobil Signor," that stumbling block for many an ambitious vocalist. Her voice is smooth and flexible. The Brahms number was also well done. It would be unfair to criticise Miss Gussefield's "Sancta Maria," as the young lady was evidently suffering from a severe case of stage fright and did not do herself justice. Mr. Maclean's Wagner solo was also a source of disappointment. The gentleman's voice was hardly equal to Wolfram's song. The "Inflammatus" was splendidly rendered by Miss Mildred Spencer, pupil of Mrs. Hillman-Smith, her beautiful soaring tones being fully adequate to the music. She was well supported by the chorus. Mrs. Mary Bardilini was set down for two numbers, but as Mr. Pasmore had forgotten to bring the music of Chaminade's "Summer" it had to be omitted and Miss Bardilini repeated the little song "The Only Voice," by W. J. McCoy, words by Oscar Weil. This tiny gem was one of the delights of the evening. It is a little sigh of tenderness and regret rendered to perfection by the vocalist who, contrary to all precedent, did better in the encore than in the first rendering. "The Only Voice" was heard on this occasion for the first time, but deserves to be well known as it certainly will be. It should be unnecessary to add that Mr. McCoy and Mr. Weil are residents of our own State. Mr. Nowlan's two songs, "O That We Two Were Maying" (Nevins), and "Ostination" (Fontainelles), were given with sentiment and grace, accompanied by the little cellist Miss Dorothy Pasmore. The audience demanded an encore, which was sternly refused by the obdurate director. "Ocean, Thou Mighty Monster" (Weber) was one of the great efforts of the evening. Miss Lida Benedict, soloist, and Mr. Maurer, pianist, between them vanquished its difficulties. Mr. Maurer's work in this number was particularly fine. Mrs. Smith's class next did some excellent part singing, followed by Miss Beulah George in the Bell Song from "Lakme" (Delibes). This selection was well adapted to display the brilliant qualities of Miss George's voice, and in its execution she did herself full justice. Miss Adelaide Birchler was suffering from a cold and was also nervous, but in spite of these drawbacks her rich contrallto interpreted with much feeling three selections, "Von Ewigen Liebe" (Brahms), "My True Love Hath My Heart" (Randegger) and "My Heart at Thy Sweet Voice" (Saint Saens). Miss Florence Warden was heard in two Chaminade songs, "Ritournelle" and "The Silver Ring." The latter with its haunting refrain, "Oh the little silver ring that once you gave me" is exquisitely tender and was rendered with grace and delicacy by Miss Warden. Mrs. Florence Wyman Gardner has a crystalline soprano, well adapted to the Mozart arias, "Ah lo so" and "Gli and dui d'inferno" ("The Magic Flute"). The program closed with Max Bruch's cantata "Fair Ellen," Miss Anna Moore and Mr. Will L. Smith soloists, assisted by the chorus. The dramatic exigencies of the cantata were fully met. The music is fine and thrilling, particularly the choral finale. The concert was given by pupils of H. B. Pasmore and their pupils and of Mrs. Hillman Smith of San Jose, assisted by Miss Grace Barstow, violinist, Dorothy Pasmore, cellist, and Fred Maurer, Jr., accompanist. Those whose pupils were represented were Mrs. Blanche Ashley, Mrs. J. Bardilini, Oakland: Mrs. Edith Scott Basford, San Francisco; Miss Lida Benedict, Napa; Mrs. J. Lee Burbeck, Watsonville; Miss Kate Byrne, Berkeley; Mrs. Luella Wagor Coplin, Oakland; Miss Zuletta Geery, Milwaukee, Wis.; Miss Beulah George, Oakland; Miss Virginia Graham, Seattle; Mrs. Mary Louise Carr Moore, Seattle.

No brand of whisky is more popular than Argonaut "O. K." It is recommended by physicians and epicures. E. Martin & Co., 54-56 First street, are proprietors of Argonaut "O. K." whiskies, rye and bourbon.

Mr. Pasmore conducted and also accompanied many of the numbers.

The violin department of the San Francisco Conservatory of Music gave an interesting recital on Wednesday evening, pupils of Mr. T. D. Herzog rendering the program. Those taking part were: W. R. Beatty (piano); Maude Easton and Alfred Lamb, with Daisy Jacobs at the piano; Beulah Graham, accompanied by Edith Lincoln; Mary Lutz; Leroy Clark; Gladys Lahl, accompanied by Charles Rogers; Mary Conlin, with quartet accompaniment by Ada Conlin, Mrs. Judson Davis, A. Schwartz and R. Harrison; Hubert Hill and Gladys Couth. A quartet by Beethoven ended the program, the performers being Mary and Ada Conlin, Mrs. Davis and R. Harrison.

The Philharmonic Concert

A very large audience enjoyed the second concert, new season, of the Philharmonic Society. The society is doing admirable work under Giulio Minetti's direction. On this occasion the society were assisted by Mrs. Etta Bailey Blanchard, who rendered three numbers. The program in full was: Rossini's overture, "La Gazza ladra"; Schubert's Symphony in B minor; Brahms' "Liebestrau" and R. Strauss' "Water Lily Serenade," Mrs. Blanchard; Bolzoni's Minuet for strings; Massenet's "Scenes Pittoresques"; "Air de Salome" (Herodiade), Mrs. Blanchard; Meyerbeer's "Coronation" march.

Miss Eleanore Joseph, the pianist and dramatic soprano, of St. Dominic's church choir, sailed on the Belgenland for Europe. She will spend the summer in Paris, studying vocal with Madame Laborde, Calve's teacher. Miss Joseph expects to return here in the winter.

Dr. Schalkhammer, one of the baritone soloists at the last Loring Club concert, gave a song recital in Heine hall last week.

LETTERS

Major's Dorothy Vernon

Sir George Vernon of Haddon Hall, possessed of an iron will and only daughter for whom he has arranged a marriage which suits himself, has a quarrel with his nearest neighbor, Lord Rutland, which Sir George thinks can be wiped out with blood alone —the blood of Lord Rutland and his only son, Sir John Manners. The situation is elemental. Of course, the offspring fall in love with each other on sight. Dorothy takes the initiative and does all the courting. She arranges the meetings, initiates the correspondence, inveigles the rest of the household into helping her schemes, fibs unblushingly when she is caught, masquerades in male costume to keep her rendezvous, and defies Sir George even to the point of the whiplash and dungeon. Needless to say, Mistress Dorothy gains her point and marries the man of her choice. Sir Malcolm Francis de Lorraine Vernon, cousin of Sir George, and first choice of the pater as a husband for his wilful girl, in order to keep his estates in the family name, is the narrator of the story. He is wise enough to see that Cousin Dorothy is kittle-cattle, and contents himself with her blind cousin, Madge, whose quieter disposition promises more chance of peace in a household. Sir Malcolm, whose mother was French, and who had spent his early manhood at the French court, enamored of Mary, Queen of Scots, had followed that ill-fated queen to Scotland where he remained in her train, at times a favorite, and again cast aside. At the beginning of the story, just as he had about decided that his wisest course to pursue would be to desert the fickle royal lady entirely and marry his cousin Dorothy and her broad acres, he is secretly notified of the need for flight. The regency of Murray has been decided upon. Mary has been seized and such of her friends as hands can be laid upon will be summarily dealt with. Under these conditions and provided with a purse of gold by Mary's friends, Sir Malcolm stands not on the order of his going, but makes straight for Haddon Hall and his relatives, knowing nothing of the feeling in England that has arisen against the Scotch Queen. It is during this hasty flight that he meets Sir John Manners, a courtier of Elizabeth, who has pledged himself to assist in the plot of liberating Mary from Loch Levin and giving her sanctuary in England. Sir John knows nothing of the plot within the plot, to depose Elizabeth and elevate Mary to the English throne. Like over confident lovers since the beginning of time, he lets his tongue run away with his discretion, and Dorothy, like the jealous woman, gratifies her spleen of a moment by telling all she knows just where it will do the most harm, and then does penance in trying to repair the mischief she has wrought. Both Mary of Scotland and Elizabeth of England, as well as the Earl of Leicester, and minor historical characters, are introduced, but they are wisely subordinated to the actors in the double love story, who are on in every scene. Sir Malcolm, as narrator, tells the story forty years after the occurrences are supposed to have taken place. There is no attempt to reproduce the language and speech of the time, and we are spared the usual array of Elizabethan oaths and the inevitable anachronisms, but Sir Malcolm's observations are often as modern as his speech. Whistling girls were still under the ban long past the last half of the nineteenth century, and some of his apologies for over indulgence in wine would better fit a later period. Likewise, his reflections on religious tolerance would have been out of place. "I shall probably die orthodox and mistaken" was not the spirit of the Elizabethen era. Religion, like patriotism, may lie dormant in quiet times, but when heads may pay the penalty for mistakes, whether in the holding of opinions or the free expression of them, people are more cautious of their utterances. On the whole "Dorothy Vernon," by Charles Major, is a very fair specimen of the historical novel of the day, or rather the novel with an historical background. The parental prerogatives of Sir George are not one whit exaggerated; fully a century after his time it was no uncommon thing for noblemen to lash the females of the household into compliance with their wishes. The reader will lose nothing by plunging at once into the story, without stopping to investigate the page and a half of preliminary "Black Magic." [The Macmillan Company, New York. Illustrations by Howard Chandler Christy.]

Nancy's Misdemeanors

"The Misdemeanors of Nancy," by Eleanor Hoyt, with dainty illustrations by Penrhyn Stanislaus, has just been published by Doubleday, Page & Co. Nancy is an entrancing young society belle with bohemian tendencies. Her adorable adventures have already appeared serially in Everybody's Magazine and in the New York Sun, but it gives one a peep into the sunshine land where a happy, wholesome, luxury-surrounded young beauty lives; and whether you are a fascinating young thing like Nancy herself, a flesh and blood beau with a heart to be captivated by a woman's wiles, or a delightful old daddy which the first chapter describes Nancy's own to be, you can't help being glad that there are such dear girls in the world. There is not a serious moment in the eleven stories but every now and then one finds oneself seriously trying to analyze the particular quality of fascination that draws all men to some women—Cleopatra for instance, and Josephine de Beauharnais, and—and Nancy. By the way, the scene of one of the Puritan Circe's adventures is laid in the New York bachelor flat of two ex-Californians, a son of J. C. Stubbs and J. O'Hara Cosgrave. These two prosperous young men have a charming home in Washington Square where often are entertained clever people from the two worlds, art and society.

The illustrations throughout are superb.

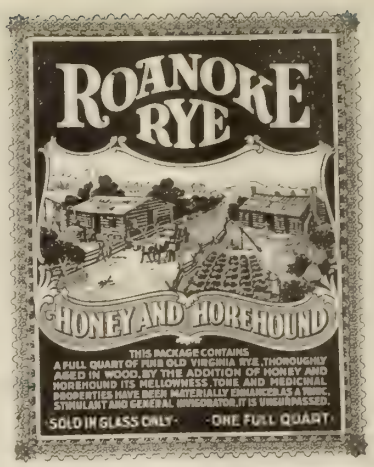
Short Novel

The shortest novel on record consists of two hundred and fifty words. The necessary two copies have been placed on file at Washington and copyright has been secured for this unique work, which was written, set up, printed and dispatched to its distination within six hours. It contains thirty-three chapters, divided into four books and printed on pages three by four inches in size. There are twelve pages in addition to cover, title page index of chapters and book headings similar in every respect to the three hundred and fifty-page book it represents except in size. Of course there is a history back of the production. Francis A. Adams, deep in the work of superintending the publication of his novel, "The Transgressors," discovered that a pirated edition had been built up from a synopsis of his production surreptitiously obtained. Not having the two completed copies necessary to file in order to protect his work, he immediately condensed it into the smallest posible compass, and by his prompt action headed off the scheme which had been hatched. Without the two complete copies in the hands of the Librarian of Congress an author can protect his title only. The body of his work may be stolen and published under another name and he has no redress. This is the first time that this means of protecting literary work has been made use of, but it is simple, speedy and effective. The work in question, "The Transgressor, a Story of a Great Sin," deals with the trust problem and the fortunes of a presidential candidate.

Some of the Socialist leaders have discovered "The Octopus," and are inclined to make it a tract in favor of pub lic ownership of railroads and a dia tribe against capitalists. It is just possible, therefore, that Mr. Norris may find himself fitted with the cast-off shoes of Edward Bellamy. "The Octopus" did not receive the attention which it deserved from the mass of readers, whose minds were taken up with the love adventures of mythical Revolution ary heroes, but it is a book that will keep. Long after the "Philip Winwoods" and "Richard Carvels," and all the rest of the ragged regiment are forgotten "The Octopus" will make good reading. It is not the Socialists alone who have discovered the book, for from quite a different quarter there comes a tentative suggestion that other descriptions of growing fields of grain be compared and collated with Mr. Norris' work. The author is hard at work on the second volume of his trilogy, "The Pit." It cannot fail to prove interesting though it will be no light task to equal, much less to surpass the earlier volume.

Shall Quotation Marks Bo?

Bernard Shaw wants quotation marks abolished. He can see no necessity for the inverted commas and is willing to head a crusade against their use. The wretched things have not been foisted upon us for much over a century, and though they appear to be firmly fixed they have never been really welcome. If Mr. Shaw can convert others to his views he will remove a potent source of profanity from the path of ye intelligent compositor, who has no joy in needless points. English usage has somewhat simplified the usage by reversing the American plan and using single marks for an ordinary quotation and doubles for a quote within a quote, but there is no good reason for their use at all. The context generally makes it plain when the words of another are used. When it does not the remedy to be applied should be a recasting of the whole expression. There is not a single mark of quotation throughout the Bible, and yet, in all the endless controversies and contentions which have centred round Biblical expressions and meanings, not one has arisen from any doubt as to who the speaker might be, or where the speech begun or ended. It might take a little courage to be the innovator of the custom of printing matter without quotes, but surely not so much as to be a pioneer in spelling reform.



"Love Letters of an Englishwoman" are having a great vogue in Paris, where, however, they are thought rather dangerous and inflammatory. This bears out the statement that the lurid French romances which all the rest of the world reads and is shocked thereat are unknown in France. Like a good many other commodities, they are manufactured for their market and are not known outside the limits of the factory and only handled by those who deal in them.

Popular Authors

The English society of Authors has recently held its annual meeting and reports itself as in a flourishing condition. One of the acts of the society was to grant its first pension, sixty pounds a year, to J. H. Ruddell. He was a popular and successful author a generation ago though practically forgotten now, and some surprise is expressed that he should need assistance. But a popular author in the '60's did not sell his books by the quarter million, nor was there an international copyright law to protect his interests. Popularity did not spring up over night, nor were there a half hundred magazine editors vying with each other to obtain contracts with the latest favorite. A "new" book might have been on the market a year or two instead of as many hours and an author did not count on tricks and antics to keep his clientele. Perhaps, too, an author in those benighted times was satisfied with a moderate compensation and did not expect to vie with royalty in his expenditures. But it is, after all, only the few who belong to all time, and of these, not all of their books can last forever. Authors, like other workers, must

Albert Bigelow Paine is at work on "The Commuters," which will be a chronicle of the further tribulations of the "Van Dwellers."

The indefatigable Marie Corelli is at work on still another novel. It is given out that the subject which engrosses her is one never before treated of in fiction. It is pretty hard to conjecture in these days anything in the heavens above or the earth beneath or the waters under the earth, which has not been exploited. Marie herself found one world too confined for the operations of her genius.

OTHER PEOPLE'S IDEAS.

From "Middlemarch," by George Eliot:

"If youth is the season of hope, it is often so only in the sense that our elders are hopeful about us; for no age is so apt as youth to think its emotions, partings and resolves are the last of their kind. Each crisis seems final, simply because it is new."

"Ardent souls, ready to construct their coming lives, are apt to commit themselves to the fulfillment of their own visions."

"Nettle seeds need no digging."

"What do we live for if it is not to make life less difficult to each other?"

"There is a man's character to speak for him beforehand."

"Character is not cut in marble—it is not something solid and material. It is something living and changing, and may become diseased as our bodies do. * * * Then it may be restored to health."

"People glorify all sorts of bravery, except the bravery they might show on behalf of their nearest neighbor."

From "Romola":

"One of those lawless moments which come to us all if we have no guide but desire, and the pathway where desire leads us seems suddenly closed * * ready to follow any beckoning that offered an immediate purpose."

"Marriage must be a relation either of sympathy or of conquest."

"She who willingly lifts up the veil of her married life has profaned it from a sanctuary into a vulgar place."

From "The Under Secretary," by William Le Queux, now running in the New York Evening Sun:

"When, however, a woman really loves, it is difficult to deceive her. She reads a man's innermost thoughts as clearly as though they were written upon an open page. The wavering of the eyes, the twitching of the lips, the slight movement of the muscles of the face, and the almost imperceptible swelling at the temples, although entirely unobserved by the woman who is not in love, are to her whose lover he is plain and open declarations of the truth. Truly the intuition of the eternal feminine is inexplicable and marvelous."

OUR OPINION

Blocking a King's Game

As the time for the formal crowning of King Edward approaches the troubles of that fat and frivolous monarch appear to be crowding upon him most unpleasantly. A more unpropitious time for the unloading of court scandals there could not be, and it bespeaks a spirit of rank disloyalty in the breast of the subjects of the merry monarch that they should at this time, just as he is preparing for the proudest moments of his life, seek to drag his peccadilloes into the light of day. We all know that Albert Edward had a strenuous and picturesque past, abounding in episodes in which la femme played a prominent part, and it is not to his discredit now, wearing though he does the robes of State, that a lively sense of gratitude impels him to generous deeds. During his philandering days as Prince of Wales, the gay Albert incurred many obligations in the pursuit of amatory diversion. Many beautiful women of elevated social position and many brilliant women of comparatively lowly station contributed to the gaiety of his princely pastimes. He has never shown a lack of appreciation of their favors, nor has he ever assumed, as some of his predecessors have done, that his royal condescension was paramount to all other considerations. In his new role of monarch of all he surveys he views with gracious eye the fair ones that danced attendance in the lighter hours of a dreamy past, but in the fulness of a sense of gratitude the rarest of kingly virtues, he is eager to bestow on them such little tokens of his royal favor as may compensate them for losses that may have been sustained in a social way. Some are in need of social rehabilitation, and some crave that social prestige which was their birthright but which they forfeited by a disregard for the conventionalities. And there are husbands who earned the gratitude of King Edward by a complaisance born of loyalty to the heir apparent. All these are expectant of honors as the Coronation Day approaches for that is the day on which the King bestows the cherished baubles on his loyal subjects. But there are sticklers for the proprieties high in Court circles who decline to connive with the King in his efforts to give prestige to those that won his favor in the purple hours of a pampered past. The despatches tell us that Lord Salisbury objects to recommending a complaisant husband for a peerage, and that the Duchess of Buccleuth declines to obey the behest of her King because it was in the interest of one of his feminine favorites. The obstinacy of the Lord and the Duchess was unfortunate, for it provoked gossip and scandal of a most deplorable character. It is a miserable plight for a gallant King to be in. Whoever heard of a King being powerless to reward his favorites? Edward presents a miserable spectacle to his subjects. He has never done anything in his life to command their admiration except as a sportsman and a gallant. His record as a sportsman is clean, and all the world knows that as a gallant he perjured himself like a gentleman, but now comes the opportunity for him to prove himself a model lothario, and he is estopped by a brace of meddlesome cranks suffering from a spasm of virtue.

Roosevelt's Defense of the Army

President Roosevelt's Memorial Day address was a manly and dignified reply to the criticisms of the Army in the Philippines. He did not contend, as many Republican statesmen and partisan newspapers have done, that the charges of atrocious cruelties were utterly without foundation, and that no military crimes had been committed. He declared that he deeply deplored the fact that representatives of our army had practiced cruelties on the Filipinos, and that determined effort would be made to punish every person guilty of barbarity. Of course he argued that there was much to be offered in extenuation of the cruelties of our soldiers, and that the Army in the Philippines was no worse than the armies of the North and South during the Civil War, but he did not seek to excuse those that had shown contempt for the limitations of military authority. President Roosevelt knows that there is foundation for the severe criticisms of the so-called anti-imperialist organs, but he considers it unjust to condemn the whole army for the shortcomings of a few. And he couldn't resist the temptation to take a smash at some of the blustering, bombastic spellbinders from the South, for he declared that there was "far less justification for a general condemnation of our army than the lynchings afford for the condemnation of the communities in which they have taken place. In each case it is well to condemn the deed, and it is well also to refrain from including both guilty and innocent." The criticisms of the partisan carpers have undoubtedly roused the ire of our leading Republican statesman, but they invited the investigation in the hope of achieving political glory, and they have themselves to blame for its disastrous results. Some of the stories that have come from the Philippines are revolting, and the Army cannot escape responsibility. When a lynching occurs in a Southern village, it is a disgrace to the community, and you cannot condemn the deed without charging the community with responsibility. Lynchings occur only in those communities that are impregnated with a sentiment of a brutalizing nature. Atrocities would not be committed by men of the Army if the spirit of brutality was not more or less rife in the Army. It is absurd to offer in defense the history of other wars. War is undoubtedly demoralizing, and the soldiers in the Philippines have become demoralized. Nevertheless the nation is disgraced. Our whole course in the Philippines has been disgraceful. We should never have been there. We took possession of the Islands for commercial and selfish purposes, and it is rank hypocrisy to contend that we were actuated by a desire to enlighten and free the natives. Our soldiers know that they are conducting a war of conquest, and in their hearts they feel that they have no more occasion to be pleased with themselves than are the British soldiers in South Africa. Demoralization easily proceeds from such a state of feeling as our soldiers are in.

The Surrender of the Boers

The rejoicing in London over the signing of the peace terms was greater no doubt than the enthusiasm aroused by the surrender of Mafeking. Yet the gladness of the people did not proceed from a sense of triumphant achievement. There was no glory for British arms in the surrender of the Boers. British statesmen brought the war to a close because it was a severe drain on the national treasury and was becoming more unpopular every day. They would have preferred, no doubt, to have persuaded the Boers to quit immediately after a big British victory, but there was no longer a prospect of any such achievement. They were therefore glad enough to end the conflict upon any terms, so long as they should be the dictators and it should appear that the Boers acknowledged defeat. The terms of peace were consequently quite liberal, and it may now be asserted that British statesmen sometimes deem it expedient to be generous. Among other things they have guaranteed the right to teach the Dutch language in the public schools of the Transvaal and Orange River colony. That was a concession which it was very hard for them to make. They have also promised the Boers self-government, and granted them the privilege to bear arms. Surely the surrender of the Boers was free from every aspect of humiliation. Their fighting was not in vain. They fought until their vitality and resources were exhausted, and though they surrendered it was not until they had humbled one of the most powerful nations of the earth.

An Important Church Problem

To the layman and looker-on there is something almost laughable about the efforts of the clerics to fill up their church pews, and the discussion of ways and means by which one class or another can be wheedled or driven inside of the church edifices for a few hours one day in the week are as ludicrous as they are pathetic. It appears to have just occurred to the good men that the thing to do is to catch their congregations young and train them up in the habit of church-going. Suddenly it has dawned upon the ministers that the Sunday school is not a feeder for the church; that out of all the children who attend classes in their infant years, only a small proportion become communicants, while the great majority are lost completely, so far as even a perfunctory attendance at church service is concerned. The reason is not far to seek, provided it is sought in the right direction. Children attend the Sunday schools where they are told pretty stories, taught to sing hymns and recite verses. So far all well enough, but they are not instructed in the doctrines of their denomination. They do not know of any reason why they should attend one school more than another, unless because their playfellows do, or perhaps, as one child remarked, she had read all the books in the Congregational library, and they had some new ones in the Presbyterian. Sunday school classes are maintained by the process of amusing the children. Their minds are kept on the alert for festivals and good times. There are the Christmas tree, and the Easter Egg festival, the picnic, the Harvest Home, the tableaux, the New England Dinner, and one or another more or less theatrical spectacle, and these things follow each other in quick succession. There is hardly a week that some Sunday school is not holding some sort of a celebration in which the children take part, and there are all the heart-burnings and jealousies which attend similar affairs when not given under church auspices. Any congregation can point to whole families who have deserted in a body because of some ill-feeling engendered by a social. The children do not regard the Sunday school as a "little church." It is not a place where they learn to worship, but a place where they go to be amused and entertained. When they have outgrown the amusement stage they do not feel that they belong anywhere. When the religious reformers exulted in having established their independence of the Pope they quite lost sight of the fact that they had set an example which others would follow in declaring their freedom from any dominion whatsoever. The Puritans, the Calvinists and others looked forward to being themselves the dictators and nothing was further from their contemplation than the idea that a time would come when they could no longer stand in the pulpit and call the heads of families to task for the absence of some child or invalid. Freedom of conscience was the last thing they admitted, unless it were the freedom of their own consciences to dictate to all else. Unlike the Jews and the Catholics, who provide doctrinal instruction for their juveniles, and admit them to full membership as soon as they show a proper understanding of what they have been taught, most of the Christian denominations demand some "experience" on the part of the applicant for membership, and very few children, if indeed any, pass through religious crises. They do not know what it means to "come under conviction of sin," or whatever form of expression happens to be in use in their particular denomination, but hold aloof, waiting for something exceptional to occur to them as a mental experience. Without it they do not feel that they can become church members, so they drift away because there is no cord of attachment. Ian Maclaren scored the "chicken dinner and candy pull" methods of the churches, in reference to that form of inducing or holding adult membership, but the festival and Christmas tree plan of keeping up Sunday-schools, and letting the children drop off when they have outgrown or become surfeited with these pleasures, is quite as bad. Amongst the Catholics and the Jews, where attendance at services is obligatory and not voluntary, and where the children are expected as a matter of course to become recruits and are instructed in the doctrines of their denomination, with a view to having them take their places in the congregational membership with full duties and obligations at about their fourteenth year and often much younger, there is no complaint either of falling off in adult membership, or of the children who are "lost."

Gifts That May Revert

Now that the Carnegie libraries are pretty well under way, some one who has been bold enough to look the gift horse in the mouth has called attention to the fact that the communities which have availed themselves of the offerings of the benevolent millionaire have bound themselves to expend large sums annually, and that in default of their doing so at any time the property will revert to the Carnegie heirs. While there is not the slightest probability that Mr. Carnegie is contemplating the enrichment of his remote descendants at the expense of the communities which have solicited gifts of libraries, it is not improbable that some such thing will happen in more than one instance. Hardly a week goes by that suit is not brought somewhere for the restoration of funds or property alienated from the use which the donor or testator had in mind in making the gift. We have here in San Francisco, at present, an action for the recovery of South Park which was given to the city under conditions more than fifty years ago, also the claim of the Sutro heirs for restoration of Balboa boulevard. A congregation on Long Island is called into court to show cause why the church and grounds should not be surrendered to the descendants of the man who donated the site and erected the building two generations ago, to be held so long as they were used as a place of divine worship for the denomination to which he belonged. Today his grandson lays claim to the place on the ground that the building is made use of as a place in which to hold church suppers, fancy fairs, lectures and other entertainments which are not acts of worship within any meaning of the term, and distinctly opposed to what his ancestor would consider such. Instances without number could be cited of similar occurrences, and it is just as well not to be too rash in undertaking to answer for the future conduct of unborn generations. Just as the social side has dominated the religious in churches, the athletic may take the place of scholasticism, and fifty years hence the buildings erected for libraries and stocked with books may be turned into gymnasiums, and the books used as fuel with which to furnish light and heat to the coming race. We cannot know what conditions will prevail even ten years from now, much less fifty or a hundred. Old methods become cumbersome and old buildings inconvenient and ruinous. Many a well-intentioned man has left his property so tied up, in his desire to act with the greatest wisdom for the benefit of his heirs, that they have been prevented from acting for their own advantage when other times brought other manners. Communities and municipalities are not more gifted with foresight than are individuals, and it might not be altogether edifying to the wandering shades of those good people who are so anxious to obtain a share of the Carnegie loaves and fishes, to find that those for whom they are so busily taking thought for the morrow neither thank them for their solicitude nor value the gifts secured for them. Opportunities are valued not according to their profusion but in accordance with their rarity. Compulsory education does not make scholars. Free libraries and reading rooms are as much of an evil as they are a benefit. They furnish warmth and shelter to idlers who might be making better use of their time in hunting for an occupation by which to support themselves, instead of loafing through the day turning over the pages of magazines and newspapers. Reading, as "Mr. Dooley" says, is all right as a diversion after the chores are done, but as a substitute for active work and real thinking it is not a success.

The Saunterer

Gage and the Call

When Mr. Gage was running for Governor of this State it was vaguely hinted that he had once been engaged in the sheep stealing business. The voters either believed that that was a campaign lie or admired Mr. Gage for having kept out of the penitentiary, for they gave him a handsome majority. From recent publications it appears that he has been spending a good deal of his time in the penitentiary, and that he has diverted his attention from sheep to furniture. He scorned to notice the sheep-stealing story, but the yarns about the purloining of furniture have aroused his indignation, and his friends declare that he will not be content until he has secured the conviction of John D. Spreckels for criminal libel. Mr. Spreckels has had considerable experience in libel suits, but they do not appear to have inspired him with fear. He has made some very bold charges against Gage, and as the campaign is approaching it behooves the Governor to seek vindication.

A Dangerous Practice

It may be hard to convince people that the Governor of the State was engaged in the practice of receiving stolen goods as the Call has alleged, but it is evident that as a politician he did not exercise due caution. He knew that several of the leading journals of the State were on the qui vive to obtain material that could be used against him for campaign purposes. He should have been on his guard. It is dangerous business accepting presents from State institutions. Some of his predecessors avoided being similarly involved. I believe that there is a very handsome table in San Quentin which was made for Governor Markham, and it is pointed out as "the table that Markham was afraid to carry off." Markham was a cautious statesman. Nothing could ever tempt him to be caught "with the goods on him." When Jim Budd appointed General Dimond Major-General of the National Guard that gallant militiaman sent the Governor a very handsome and beautifully inscribed watch as a token of gratitude. Governor Budd sent it back with thanks. It would not have been wrong for him to have accepted it, but Governor Budd was a man of experience and he took no chances.

THE STANDARD FOR CHAMPAGNE QUALITY IS

THE WORLD OVER

A Bitter Feud

It does not make much difference whether Governor Gage accepted a whole set of bed-room furniture, or only a foot-stool made in the penitentiary: whatever he received served the purpose of a peg to hang a campaign story on, and it remains to be seen how the people feel about it. The fight has become a most bitter one, for Gage has begun to strike back in his usual aggressive fashion, and there is no telling where it will all end. When Editor Garrett of the Post was brutally assaulted on the street by hired ruffians, the gossip promulgated from the Gage camp was that the thugs received their blood-money in the Call office. Peter Dunne, the railroad attorney, was employed for the prosecution, and the knowing ones immediately declared that he was expected to trace a relationship between Garrett's assailants and the Call. The Post threw out hints to the effect that the sponsor of the thugs was known, and it is an open secret in newspaper and political circles that it is the theory of the Post people that the editor of the paper was the victim of a conspiracy hatched in a rival newspaper office, in the furtherance of a bitter political feud. The Call people doubtless know what the Post people are saying, but they affect a contemptuous indifference. The facts as to the Garrett assault may never be determined judicially, but that it has served to intensify the bitterness of an already acidulous and virulent political feud there can be no doubt. And it is certainly startling enough that it has been even seriously suggested that the assault was prompted by a spirit of revenge growing out of political differences.

Not since the Heath case in Fresno has anything occurred to better aid one to a conception of the bitterness engendered in factional strife. Of course the Call has not taken cognizance of the gossip set afloat by the Gageites. No definite charges have been made. There has been nothing but innuendo, and nothing tangible to be taken as a pretext for a reply. But meanwhile the Call is pumping hot shot into Gage, the Governor hopes to retaliate by libel proceedings, and incidentally Baron Von Schroeder has been induced to accept the services of Peter Dunne as his attorney in his famous libel suit against Mr. Spreckels. The case that was to have been dropped a few weeks ago is to be prosecuted with renewed vigor, and the air is full of ominous rumors.

More of the Frost Case

A copy of the report of Attorney-General Knox made to President Roosevelt, in the matter of the application of Claude Frost for pardon, has been received by me. It was sent from Washington. Frost was the officer of the Department of Justice who was convicted of contempt of court by the United States Court of Appeals of this district and sentenced to one year's imprisonment. It was in this case that Attorney Francis Heney filed a brief severely criticising the judges of the Criminal Court for their treatment of Frost. Attorney-General Knox's report is hardly less severe than Heney's brief. From his brief summary of the case it appears that Frost was convicted of the charge of interfering with the process of the court, on the unsupported and uncorroborated testimony of a man named Vawter, who was United States Marshal at Nome, and who was compelled to resign because of a report made by Frost of conduct entirely inconsistent with personal and official integrity.

The Silence of Pillsbury

The more I read of this Frost case the more am I surprised and shocked at the conduct of some of the people involved in the Nome mining litigation. I have no doubt that the Federal judges of this district had reason to believe that there was a deal of corruption in official circles in Nome, but how they were convinced that it was all on one side in those mining cases I am at a loss to understand. Perhaps they were impressed by the zeal and aggressiveness of Amicus Curiae Pillsbury, but if Mr. Pillsbury was the hired attorney of one set of litigants what right had he to pose as the friend of the Court? The presumption is that an attorney who appears in court as an amicus curiae is a disinterested party who has only one interest and that the interest of the Court to observe. Undoubtedly he went too far in the Frost case, and the wind-up must have been a bitter pill for the Court of Appeals to swallow. If Mr. Pillsbury is truly a friend of that Court I am surprised that he does not now step forward and say something in defense of that tribunal. Of course the good faith of the Court is not questioned, but the Heney brief comes dangerously close to the line, and yet Mr. Heney is still practicing law and is apparently still in good standing.

Excessive and Unusual Punishment

And when one reads the Knox report which undoubtedly had great weight with President Roosevelt, for he pardoned Frost, one's amazement at the silence of the distinguished friend of the Court grows. "In any event," says the Attorney-General, after discussing the weakness of the testimony against Frost, "the punishment imposed is excessive and unusual." Continuing he called attention to the fact that McKenzie, the arch-conspirator, was sentenced to only six months' imprisonment on each of two charges, that Noyes and Wood were sentenced from four to six months, that the lawyer who counseled the disobedience of Court was the only one involved who was not convicted, and that "Frost, who was unquestionably the least implicated of any, received much the severest punishment." Strange things indeed are done in the name of the law.

He Has "Arrived"

George Lask has returned to town for the summer, this being the off season in New York theatrical circles. George Lask has "arrived," as they say on the Rialto in New York whenever a stranger scores a hit. San Franciscans have been "arriving" with great frequency in the puffed up metropolis of late. They have not only won laurels on the stage but they have gone to the front in other activities. Lask has jumped into the first rank of stage managers. He left the Tivoli about two years ago, and since then he has staged some of the big successes at the Casino and Hammerstein's Republic. Like Dave Belasco, who is now the premier stage manager of America, he had his first experience behind the scenes in this city. It was not so many years ago that he was producing melodramas at the original Morosco theatre in Howard street. He now devotes the most of his time to comic opera and musical comedy and he has exhibited exceptional capabilities in handling big spectacular productions. During his sojourn here he may stage the Frawley pieces at the Grand.

Neumann's Adventurous Son

Paul Neumann, son of the famous Paul Neumann, banker, bohemian and soldier of fortune, has started out to make a career for himself as interesting and romantic as was his father's. He went to Edinburg three years ago to study medicine and at the end of the second term was seized with the military mania. He enlisted in the medical corps and was shipped to South Africa. He did not find patching up wounded soldiers exciting enough and he relieved the monotony by potting Boers whenever the chance offered. On one of these little sorties he dragged back to cover, at the risk of his life, an equally venturesome confrere who had wandered too far afield and received a bullet in his hide. For this Neumann received distinguished service orders and the little silver medal so highly coveted in the British army, which is sometimes given with the orders. Upon his return to England he found it impossible on account of his health to go on with his medical studies, and he is now in New York doing newspaper work.

Rumored Naval Engagements

Some of the smart folks are discussing a rumor that was set afloat during a reception on board the Wisconsin just before her departure, of two Navy engagements. In view of the frequency of Service weddings of late, it has been remarked that our business men are somewhat slow compared with our gentlemen in blue. Our choicest maidens are rapidly being recruited for domestic purposes by our Army and Navy, and according to the Wisconsin rumor, when that vessel steamed away two of the young officers aboard felicitated each other over the success of the suits they had prosecuted in the local swim.

Will Study Art in Paris

The friends of Therese Morgan are inconsolable because that popular society girl writes that she does not intend to return to San Francisco for many a long year. Her interest in art, which many hinted was only feigned because of her liking for the blond artist who coached her, is a real one. Her idea is to join the hard-working young women of the Students' Club in Paris, and see what she can do with her talent. Except Kate Clement and Laura McKinstry there is not a girl in the swim who will be more sincerely missed than Therese Morgan. She is a girl of remarkable independence and, though she is not so unconventional as the Loughborough girls and others in their set, she was always shocking the tabbies. She openly confessed that she could mix a cocktail and that there was no nerve composer like a cigarette. The young boys adored her for she never snubbed them but treated them all with as much consideration as if they were the seasoned club wits who also delighted in her conversation. But Miss Morgan, fond as she is of society, never intended to fritter away her life in the social whirl. She has always said she intended to do something better some day, and now she seems about to fulfill her prediction. By her father's death she came into a nice little independent income. Mrs. Morgan and Ella will return from Paris in a few months, but Therese will remain abroad until her ambition is achieved or dies.

The Oakland Tribune's "Meddler" wrote some interesting paragraphs about dinner giving in last Saturday's budget. Among other things she told of a hostess whose purse is not elongated but whose brain makes up in fertility for the pocket-book's lack. This hostess is giving a series of national dinners. She began with an Italian dinner at Sanquinetti's and took her guests to the Italian theatre afterwards to see the marionettes. The next was a French dinner at one of the lesser rotis Francais with an afterpiece of one of M. Le Roux' lectures. The next is to be a Chinese restaurant dinner with the Chinese theatre for the apres, and then a German affair and, last of all, a "health food" dinner. She has the souvenirs, name cards and flowers correspond with each dinner's nationality and the idea is one that can be easily imitated or enlarged upon.

San Jose's Swagger Event

San Jose's smart set is once more suffering from a volcanic eruption. Dissensions are always rife among the swagger folks of the Garden City. Whenever one of the elite attempts to do something on a grand scale the afterclap is always of the heart-burning variety. The other night Dr. and Mrs. A. M. Barker opened their new home in the Alameda and it was "the event of the season." The house was gorgeously decorated for the occasion, and the broad porch was transformed into a floral bower for the musicians. The society reporters of the San Jose dailies were spurred to "fine writing" by the spectacle. They told of the "cut-glass vase filled with carnations" which occupied the centre of the dining room table, "standing on an exquisite lace centrepiece." They told how "red roses in the window ledges harmonized with the tints of wall and ceiling" and they proudly proclaimed the fact that the refreshments "included individual ices moulded in various forms"; also that Mrs. Barker "received her guests in a gown of white chiffon with yoke of white handmade renaissance lace and black velvet trimming." The guests were no doubt highly pleased at being received in a gown, and like the reporters they must have remarked that Mrs. Barker wore diamonds.

And the Coachman was There

The guests included, as most affairs in San Jose do, the elite and the bourgeoisie. The butcher, the baker and candlestick maker were there, but, horror of horrors! in the midst of the guests was the Barker coachman and his good wife. They are estimable people and in this democratic country there is no reason why they should not have contributed the glow of their presence to the house-warming. But society was shocked. Even the shoe clerks and dry goods clerks thought it bad form for the coachman to be included among the invited guests. That reception will be the theme of discussion in San Jose social circles for many moons.

When Miles was Here

The news that the sword of Damocles is hanging over General Miles' head has not caused any weeping or wailing on the Pacific coast. When General Miles was stationed at the Presidio he roused the ire of the smart set by trying to run things in the Army and out. At that time it was necessary to drive in from the Presidio and the roads were very bad in winter. One night General and Mrs. Miles were invited to a large dinner party in town and upon their non-arrival at the appointed time the other guests sat down to dinner. An hour later the Miles party drove up. The General's full dress glory was mud-smirched and he had a bad pain in his temper owing to his tardiness due to the fact of his carriage catching in a rut. Instead of eating humble pie as a late guest, when the General found that the host had not waited for him, he turned on his military heel and angrily escorted his supperless wife back to the carriage. General Miles had evidently expected to be the piece de resistance of the feast and that they should have gone on as far as roasts without him curdled his appetite. The affair was discussed to tatters in society and military circles and the General's retreat was pronounced contrary to all tactics.

His Arizona Triumph

General Miles is especially disliked in Arizona where he was sent just at the close of the Indian wars. General Crook, best beloved of Indian fighters, had all but put the finishing touches to the redskins, and on the eve of his triumph he was ordered East, and Miles was put in command. It was a clear case of official wire pulling, but if Miles was given official credit for subduing the Indians, every one in Arizona knew that Crook had done the work. When the last pipe of peace was smoked with the Indians, Prescott, at that time capital of Arizona, gave a fiesta in honor of General Miles. General Miles was a notable figure in the parade, his gold-besplashed uniform making even the gayly dressed Mexicans look tame. When the procession halted in front of the plaza, Governor Tritle, of Comstock mine fame, presented General Miles with a sword sheathed in a handsome case. General Miles drew out the sword and to the surprise of no one but himself and the Governor a shiny tin sword scintillated in the sun. The people had objected to the fiesta as planned by the government officials and when they heard that Miles was to be presented with a sword in their name they determined that it should be one that betokened their opinion of the soldier. So the real sword was stolen just before the exercises and the tin one substituted by a man chosen at the secret mass meeting of the townspeople. It placed Governor Tritle in a very uncomfortable position and his southern instincts suggested but one remedy—a duel. However Miles refused to take satisfaction in that manner and furiously rode back to Fort Whipple. He had his revenge on Prescott as soon as he came into command of the army. He at once ordered Fort Whipple, which is a mile from the town, abandoned. This meant a serious loss to the merchants who had furnished supplies to the army and for a long while business was crippled. President Roosevelt has evidently heard the tin sword story for he has ordered several companies sent to Fort Whipple and it will be reinforced later. This fact makes General Miles' retirement even harder to bear.

Isn't It Blackmail?

Mrs. Craven has accepted fifty thousand dollars from the Fair heirs and retired into obscurity. From the stories in the dailies it appears that several of her attorneys accepted fees out of the money which the bold widow was paid by way of inducement to quit. What a splendid topic this denouement in the Craven conspiracy affords for discussion by the eminent gentlemen of the Bar Association. The attorneys for the Fair heirs have declared that they paid the money to Mrs. Craven not because they believed she had a just claim but in order to hasten the end of the litigation. They estimated that it would cost about fifty thousand dollars to litigate the claim, and therefore they advised their clients to part with the money. Evidently Mrs. Craven had no confidence in her claim, for she was willing to accept a very small fraction of the amount involved, and at the same time to abandon all prospect of vindication. It is generally believed in legal and judicial circles in this city that Mrs. Craven was a bold and shameless blackmailer. Yet she had no difficulty in engaging legal talent to assist in the furtherance of her schemes. Moreover her lawyers did not scruple at pocketing some of the money which was extorted from her victims.

It is only the women with round arms and pretty wrists who dare espouse the new fashion of elbow-sleeves. So the elbow sleeve will never be popular.

Mr. Welch of Hawaii

The horse show at Burlingame was a success notwithstanding the rain and the disappointment of Mrs. Henry T. Scott. Mrs. Scott made a very poor showing. Mr. Andrew Welch, who was referred to by one of the dailies as an "Hawaiian sugar planter," carried off the honors with his road team and his high-steppers. Mr. Welch is the owner of horseflesh that would attract attention even in a New York horse show. Mr. Welch is such a well known resident of this city that I am somewhat curious to know why he should be vaguely designated an "Hawaiian sugar planter." It would be equally accurate to dub Jack Casserly a Chicago butcher because it happens that he derives his income from a slaughter house in the windy city. The only difference is that Mr. Welch is a member of the sugar firm while Casserly has only a marital interest in the butcher business.

The Coming Glad Hand

It appears to be the consensus of opinion among newspaper correspondents that no British statesman is eligible to succeed Lord Pauncefote unless he is the husband of an American woman. Every man mentioned by them as likely to succeed Pauncefote has an American heiress for a wife. Though they appear to be very anxious in England "to cement the ties of kinship," I seriously doubt that they are so ill-advised as to American sentiment as to believe that we are interested in seeing the husbands of our expatriated daughters honored. The successor to Pauncefote will be chosen for his ability as a diplomatist, and not for tact in acquiring an American fortune. But it happens that several of the leading lights in the British dplomatic service have annexed American wives. The Washington mission has grown in importance of late years. When Lord Pauncefote was sent to Washington thirteen years ago, the post was inferior in prestige to those of Paris, Berlin and St. Petersburg. To-day, so far as Great Britain is concerned, it is of vastly more importance. Through the war with Spain we became a world-power, and our commerce has grown so enormously that the nations of Europe now regard us quite seriously. Just now they are doing a lot of squabbling among themselves for precedence in our affections. They are presenting us with statues, and sending over the best blood of their royal families to convince us that they are friendly. Under the circumstances Great Britain may be depended upon to send us over the most expert glad-hand in the service.

The Vaudeville Widow

Mrs. Hugh Tevis has bought a beautiful home in Denver and intends to wipe the San Francisco smart world from her map. Pretty Mrs. Hugh doesn't think much of us and she doesn't care who knows it. Society has christened her the "vaudeville widow" and the sobriquet has reached her ears and roused her ire. "Popinjays!" Mrs Tevis is reported to have said, "they should remember that clothes must be seen and not heard." This slap smarts some fashionables who wear loud clothes at all hours, but they retort that they have never combined diamonds and widow's weeds as Mrs. Tevis has done. Mrs. Tevis evidently found it too hard a wrench to let her rings hibernate and she has worn them independent of mourning precedent. Her crepe has really been most becoming with its frill of white softening the veil, and a full soft bow tied pertly under the chin. Down Monterey way, whenever the carriage of a distinguished New Yorker was drawn up before the Tevis hacienda they sang:

> "Tying her bonnet-strings under her chin,
> She tied a young man's heart within."

However it was not alone her bonnet strings but the bunch of saucy scarlet jacqueminots which the charming widow always carries that gave the wags their final cue, and "vaudeville widow" she will probably be called to the end of the chapter. The house which she has bought is a model one for entertaining on a large scale and when she needs wear the weeds no longer its doors will swing wide.

For over half a century "Jesse Moore" Whisky has held its supremacy as the best, purest and most palatable.

John is in Good Health

John Breckenridge, I have heard, shocked some of the friends of the Tevis family by appearing at the theatre four days after the death of Mrs. Tevis. But then John, it was reported, was afflicted with melancholia, and the theatre was perhaps prescribed by his physician. But since his return it has been said that if ever he had the holdrums they surely have been routed. He has full heritage of the Breckenridge good looks, and also a certain diablerie of manner that makes a hit with femininity. Now that Mrs. Grundy has seen, with her own eyes, that John is not in need of a keeper, she has begun to think that perhaps Florence Breckenridge has emerged from the slough of despond.

Mary McLean of Butte

The local book-sellers have not yet received that strange volume in which Miss Mary MacLean of Butte, Montana, known as "the Marie Bashkirtseff of the West," sets forth certain salacious details about herself, but one of them told me the other day that advance orders were coming in very fast. The authoress has been exploited in a way that has advertised the book, and it will no doubt have a large sale. I have received an advance copy, and do not hesitate to assure my readers that it is trash designed to quicken the prurient fancy. Somebody has discovered that this vicious virgin of Butte is only a sublimated concentration of Henry James' Daisy Miller, and there is much in the book to remind one of the sizzling sensuality of Amelie Rives, but it is commonplace and feeble compared with the panting passionateness of that feverish female. I am inclined to believe that Mary MacLean is a fake; that the book was written by a man who hopes to attract the attention of the morbid seekers after glimpses of the naked female soul. Mary MacLean tells you that there are nine cambric handkerchiefs cunningly distributed in the front of her shirtwaist, and she explains that while she has a pretty figure it is not well developed. Wouldn't that jar you? "Likewise," she says, "by an ingenious arrangement of my striped moreen petticoat I contrive to display a more evident pair of hips than nature seems to have intended for me at this stage." And it is this sort of tommyrot which a respectable publishing house has put upon the market. If a newspaper dealt in that sort of trash to the extent that Mary hands it out, it would be excluded from the mails.

Her Litany

Mary MacLean, or whoever the perpetrator of the fake is, also sets forth a litany which is not so bad and which runs something like this: "From women and men who dispense odors of musk; from little boys with long curls; from the kind of people who call a woman's figure her 'shape'—kind devil, deliver me. From all sweet girls; from 'gentlemen,' from feminine men—kind devil, deliver me. From lisle-thread stockings; from round, tight garters; from brilliant, brass belts—kind devil, deliver me. From insipid sweet wine; from men who wear moustaches; from the sort of people who call legs 'limbs'; from bedraggled white petticoats—kind devil, deliver me. Kind devil, if you are not to fetch me happiness, then slip off from your great steel key-ring a bright little key to the door of the glittering, gleaming bad things, and give it me, and show me the way, and wish me joy.

"I would like to live about seven years of judicious badness, and then death, if you will. Nineteen years of damnable nothingness, seven years of judicious badness—and then death. A noble ambition! But might it not be worse? If not that, then nineteen years of damnable nothingness, and then death."

Louis Sloss

When Louis Sloss passed away last Wednesday night, San Francisco lost one of her most public-spirited and best beloved citizens. There is so much perfunctory praise for the departed these days that even the most sincere and deserving seems hardly worth while, for eulogies are so indiscriminately bestowed that they are almost as much a matter of course as the undertaker's sadness of countenance. As to Louis Sloss, however, his deeds have so often proclaimed his worth that eulogy would be superfluous. No resident of San Francisco ever enjoyed the universal respect which Louis Sloss so well earned. The name of Sloss has long been a household word in San Francisco. It will long be remembered as that of a man of sterling character, a genial, big-hearted, kind, self-sacrificing mortal, whose cardinal virtue was modesty, and whose sympathy for the unfortunates was evidenced by a bountiful generosity.

Men as Maids

Smart women, I am told, are substituting valets for maids, especially in traveling. The argument is that the man can do all the woman can, and a great deal more. He is a better packer, uses more common sense and so often acts independent of specific instruction. He is not so likely to be sick on train or boat, and is more reliable as escort or in making arrangements. In a word, he is maid and man combined. Smart women are but doing in this what they have been doing for years in their gowns—copying the women of the stage. They had Johnstone Bennett with her valet as a mentor. But what a roar went up in San Francisco a few seasons back when it was learned that Mrs. Neville Castle had a man dresser! But when women criticise the most they are the more likely to do, later on, the thing they criticise.

The Engagement of the Week

Until Wednesday, when Harry Scott gave the secret wings, only suspicion pointed to the engagement that is now stamped as a fact. Before that there were rumors dripping over the teacups that Pearl Landers and Harry Scott were engaged, but the rumors were not loud enough for the papers to get hold of them. Mrs. Henry Scott asseverates her entire approval of the match, though Harry Scott is just of age, and it was expected that his elder brother, Prescott, would marry first. Young Scott's attentions to Miss Landers were active and began with her entrance into society last fall. But as the season ripened and no engagement was announced society's interest in their affair died out and was only reawakened by the present announcement. It is hinted that Pearl Landers will be only too glad to change her name for she has always been confounded by strangers with Pearl Landers, the little actress who made her debut with the Frawleys. The gossips say that Mr. Landers paid the pretty ingenue a plump sum to program herself Lillian Pearl Landers instead of plain Pearl.

Poor Mrs. Henry Scott! With all her high English aspirations, she must feel dreadfully cut up over the inroads the Irish are making into her royal family. But it was an Irishman who gave the Scotts an opportunity to shine financially.

Another Rumored Flitting from Blingum

And now They say that the Charley Baldwins will be the next to follow the Hobarts' example and shake the dust of Blingum from their feet. Charley Baldwin is credited with a desire to sell his ranch, and there will likely be a buyer for it as soon as it is formally put on the market. Several reasons are given for the rumored sale. For one thing, Mrs. Baldwin's health, though it has been somewhat benefited by her several stays at Colorado Springs, is by no means robust. The climate of the ranch is not the right one to bring back the roses to her pale cheeks, and a higher altitude is deemed necessary by her physicians. Another alleged reason is that with her brother and sister no longer near neighbors, Mrs. Baldwin is not happy in her present home. But the real reason, I am told, of this desire to move is that Charley Baldwin has never recovered from his resentment at the Blingumites' treatment of his sister. When Mrs. Deacon was visiting him not a Blingumite outside of the family extended a welcome to her. Memory is still fresh of the pointed snub of the Burlingame Club members on a certain occasion. Now that the Duchess of Marlborough has made a protege of Gladys Deacon, and is introducing her to the smartest of smart London society, perhaps the Blingum Anglomaniacs may regret the cold looks they gave the young girl's mother when she was in their midst.

Walter and Peter at Home

The Walter Martins arrived on Wednesday night, much to the surprise of the uninitiated who expected them to stay in London over the Coronation. But their intimates have known for some time that that thoughtless bird, the stork, has been flapping his wings over their chimneys, so their jaunt in Europe had to be parted in the middle. Though the busy bird may be responsible for the homecoming of the Walter Martins it is not so easy to account for the unexpected return of Peter. I had supposed that arrangements for Peter's marriage were completed, but since his return the gossips are saying that there has been a hitch. No betrothal of recent years has excited one-half the speculation and comment that have been indulged anent the Oelrichs-Martin engagement. It was first reported that the Oelrichs' clan objected to Peter Martin because of his wild, Western ways. Then came the story of a lover's quarrel, and finally I gave the facts concerning Mrs. Martin's refusal to put up the dot. The repeated postponements of the marriage began to read like a serial story when finally the news came out that everything was fixed, Peter was furnishing a Newport cottage, and the goose was at the proper elevation. But Peter is with us once more and the wedding is still hanging fire.

The Hawaiian Doles

There is considerable mystery enshrouding the domestic affairs of the Doles of Honolulu. The marriage of Miss Gallagher, a school teacher of this city, and E. P. Dole, Attorney-General and brother of the Governor of Hawaii, took place last September, and a few months later the bride returned to this city. With her came rumors of a separation. These were indignantly denied by Mrs. Dole. She returned to Honolulu, and last Monday she came back to this city, and once again came the report of marital differences in the Dole family. A second time a denail was made in behalf of the wife. Yet all the newspapers in this city have received letters purporting to have been sent by Dole's attorney, warning the press against publishing the statements of Mrs. Dole concerning her trouble with her husband. From these letters it appears that Mrs. Dole is intent upon airing her grievances in the San Francisco papers, but that lady maintains a dignified silence while her mother declares that there has been no trouble.

Denials by the Gallaghers

Immediately after Mrs. Dole's arrival the reporters rushed out to interview her. She was too ill to be seen, but Mrs. Gallagher, and the five Misses Gallagher, were interviewed and they flouted the story of a separation. "Eleanor at outs with dear Edmund! Utter foolishness. Why when she came away from Honolulu a few days ago her husband and his relatives escorted her to the steamer, covered her with leis, the Government band played 'I'd leave my happy home,' and 'Come back to Erin.' Why, there was a great crowd to see her go, and Edmund wept." Which is all verity. The band was there, the wreaths were bestowed, and the Attorney-General of Hawaii did wet his cheeks. He also wet his whistle immediately afterward. The parting scene was all in keeping with the time-honored traditions of the Missionaries, and even Governor Dole—he of the bifurcated whiskers—could not have exceeded his cousin Edmund in his attempt to observe the proprieties.

Letters from Dunne

But the fact is that Dole and his attorney anticipated Mrs. Dole. Mr. Dole's attorney is J. J. Dunne, formerly of this city. He is a prolific letter-writer. I have received three letters from him, all on the subject of the Dole case. He informs me that Mrs. Dole openly declared her intention to use the press of San Francisco as a means of annoying "a very worthy and high-minded gentleman." He says that it is unfortunate that the Doles, though married only a short time, have developed a case of "incompatibility of temper, to express it mildly." And he continues as follows: "It is not, of course, for me as counsel for Mr. Dole to recite the series of events which led to this unfortunate marriage, but now that the end has come, it is, I think, my duty to seek to protect Mr. Dole, so far as my personal influence can do so, against guerrilla attacks." It is evident that Mr. Dole believes that his wife has some very sensational stories to tell, for his attorney, Mr. Dunne, who, by the way, is a very good press agent, anticipates damaging statements by representing his client to be a man of such exalted character as to be entitled to the presumption of innocence no matter what may be said against him.

Dole Apotheosized

This is a sample of Mr. Dunne's work in the role of apotheosist: "I beg of you to believe, and I say this quite without the spur of partisanship, that Mr. Dole's antecedents and personality will bear comparison with those of any other man in the country. For a long time past his family has been one of prominence in different parts of the country, notably in New England, and it has contributed to the various professions men who have become distinguished by unusual excellence in the law, in literature and in the church. In this Territory the name of Dole stands as high as it is possible for anyone to stand. His relatives have always held high positions, and have been invested with grave trusts. The present Governor of this Territory is but an illustration of what I am trying to say about the characteristics of the Dole family, and thus you see that an antecedent probability arises tending to support the theory that Mr. E. P. Dole, as a member of this distinguished family, is scarcely the man to origniate serious difficulty or disagreeable quarrels with a woman whom he thought enough of to make his wife." But the facts are that Mrs. Dole isn't saying a word, and that her distinguished husband is tooting his own horn vociferously and in a way calculated to cause the inference that his wife is unworthy of him, and incidentally unworthy of belief.

A Sinister Smash

I have not quoted all of Mr. Dunne's letter. His laudation of Mr. Dole is so extravagant that I have begun to suspect that the Attorney-General is working me for a little free advertising for political purposes. The Doles are accomplished politicians. Mr. Dunne has assured me that the Attorney-General has a character without stain, and that in all the relations of life he has lived "as a clean, pure-minded and highly-bred gentleman." The foregoing was no doubt intended to silence the stories about the little Kanaka Doles said to be in the islands. Mr. Dunne adds, magnanimously, that he has no desire to make "any statements concerning the antecedents of the lady whom Mr. Dole married," and he naively declares that "she has lived too long in San Francisco to render such a course necessary." In conclusion he says that the lady will be somewhat indiscriminate in her criticisms of Mr. Dole's friends, and suggests that if she should include Judge Estee and his wife and the Hon. W. L. Stanley, I may take the circumstance as a standard by which to measure the reliability of her statements concerning other people. Surely the high-minded Mr. Dole has some strange ideas about the rules of conduct that should govern a well-bred gentleman.

The Real Dole

Another version of the story that comes from Honolulu is to the effect that trouble has been brewing in the Dole family almost in from the beginning of the honeymoon. There has been considerable gossip about the Doles in Honolulu, but it never got into print. Edmund Dole wooed the handsome and ravishing Eleanor Gallagher amid the palms of the Royal Hawaiian hotel and in the waves at Waikiki. He is fat, fifty and bald. He can give Billy Barnes and Colonel Kowalsky lessons in snoozing in an office chair; he has a hurdle in his speech, and he is the prosiest talker I know. He has no wealth, gets only a living salary, and is not a brilliant lawyer. But he is a Dole, the cousin of the former President and present Governor of Hawaii, and in the islands he has social prestige. He lived at the leading hostelry, where at night on the broad, embowered verandas the dusky-blonde natives make passionate music, and the soft breezes sigh through the monkeypod trees; where the gin-fizz has seductions never dreamed of in a temperate zone, and the very surf sings of love all the days and nights. Such was the scene of their trysts. Though he has naught of the Romeo in his outward appearance, Dole is a poetaster and a novelist. He has written and published "Hiwa, a Tale of Old Hawaii," and other tales, some of which make plain that Cupid shares with Bacchus in the holding of his heartstrings.

Why Honolulu is Agog

While one son of Millionaire Alexander Young of Honolulu was being divorced by his wife this week another son was making ready for a matrimonial leap. The divorced Young is Alexander, Jr., the oldest son of his father, to whom the latter gave a hundred thousand dollars as a wedding present. The wife charged him with "mental cruelty," and averred that he outraged her refined sense of decency and courtesy by his coarse actions and brutal language. The son about to be married in Honolulu is Archibald Young. If his bride is of the same delicate and sensitive nature as that of the divorcee she may have a rude awakening, too. Archie Young is no hot-house plant. He is red-haired and freckled-fisted, and he has never done any nimble capering in boudoirs and drawing-rooms. But he is a good fellow and the son of a multi-millionaire, and he has spent some time studying the role of the society dawdler under the tutelage of Robert Shingle, a young stock-broker of Honolulu. Shingle made money in sugar after finding himself a failure as a newspaper reporter, and now he leads cotillions and bathing parties. He has pointed out to Young the trifles that distinguish the haut ton from the polloi, and now Young is to marry Miss Maud Gilett. Honolulu is agog over the affair, and they are laying even money that the groom will walk up the aisle without a train collision. Shingle will be best man.

There is no doubt whatever that the stork is expected at the home of the Rudolph Spreckels', and his advent will be made the occasion of general rejoicing in the family. Since the death of her son, little Rudolph, Mrs. Spreckels has never seemed like her old happy self and this new arrival is expected to bring back some of the lost content to the young mother's heart.

Blessedness of Giving by Proxy

The very reverend rector of St. Luke's gave his fashionable congregation something to think about last Sunday. But the thoughts his remarks impelled were not complimentary to the rector. His text was: "It is more blessed to give than to receive." He cited by way of illustration the case of a young missionary of the Episcopal church, whose field of work is in Southern California. The missionary has to travel from place to place on his circuit, holding services in school-houses, barns or wherever practicable. As the distances are great he cannot always tramp so, said the rector of St. Luke's, he makes use of a bicycle. But as the roads are bad and the dust almost intolerable in some places the missionary's travels are necessarily difficult. "If my young friend had a horse and buggy," said the rector, "he could cover the distances easily and pursue his duties with greater speed," and after the sermon it was suggested by some of the people in the congregation that the reverend gentleman should not lose such a splendid opportunity to achieve a blessing. He receives a big salary, they said, and could well afford to help his less fortunate brother. St. Luke's is the smartest Episcopal congregation in San Francisco, but it includes many knockers, and its rectors have ever been the subject of criticism. St. Luke's is wholly out of debt, and it has a fat treasury.

"Lovely woman in the game of life always calls hearts trumps," said the young lover.

"Bosh! Diamonds are what most women deal," said the blase clubman.

"Wait until you've had my experience," said the old married man, "you'll find clubs trumps."

BEST ON EARTH

Mrs. Atherton on London

Though Gertrude Atherton has not had occasion to complain of ennui since her return to her old home, she has no desire to prolong her stay. She has enjoyed being lionized by our cultured and our smart folks but she longs to be back in "deah old Lunnon." It was in London that her genius was first authoritatively proclaimed, and she can no longer content herself in the provincial atmosphere of an American city. Speaking of London the other day she said she preferred it as a place of residence to any other city on the globe. She likes the people of London because of their freedom from sham and hypocrisy. "They know," she said, "that the world is not perfect, and they don't get shocked when they hear about the shortcomings of people. They are not eager to visit the penalty of social ostracism upon those who are so unfortunate to have been found out. There is no affectation of superior virtue among them. Consequently they are never blackmailed by their servants. They know they need not fear being condemned on the revelations made by their help." Mrs. Atherton also states that though it is cheaper to live in London than in New York the temptation to spend money is greater across the water. Luxuries are so accessible that you cannot ignore them. "I always ride in a hansom in London," she said, "and I never get into a street car in New York without execrating Thomas Jefferson."

A Coming Mirror

Apropos of Mrs. Atherton's views of the indifference of the British to exposure of their peccadilloes, it is that very indifference which has made them impervious to criticism, and made immorality easy. In this connection it may be interesting to know that the social life of London finds a mirror in Mr. Pinero's "The Gay Lord Quex," which Mr. Miller is to produce at the Columbia. It is a play which illustrates the exquisite development of the intellectual faculties of the British, and of the atrophy of their morals. It is a new message from England on the eternal sexual problem, written by the most brilliant of British playwrights. You should go to see it because it foreshadows the sort of plays which will be written by our dramatists long before the Nation has become as old, as vicious, as sensual and as unscrupulous as England is in Pinero's hour.

A Leaf from Her Past

Many people who have met Mrs. Atherton for the first time since her return to San Francisco are surprised to learn that her favorite topics of conversation deal with economic questions and that she takes a deep interest in trusts. Being somewhat familiar with the fervid sentences that burn like coals of fire in the chaste pages of "Hermia Suydam," they expected to find her quite a different sort of a woman from what she is. The fact is that Mrs. Atherton has grown more grave than gay. But there was a time when her temperament was as romantic as her novels. Years ago I heard a story which will serve to illustrate the unconvential character of this brilliant woman. It was the story of her epistolary relationship with Julian Hawthorne, the novelist. It started shortly after the publication of her novel "What Dreams May Come." They had never met, but for Hawthorne's writings Mrs. Atherton had an impassioned interest. He lived in New York, and the new aspirant for literary honors in San Francisco. They struck up a correspondence. It began in a cool, matter-of-fact way but gradually, as correspondence usually does, grew warmer and more personal. Each confided in the other thoughts of a deep and impassioned nature.

The Meeting was Indefinitely Postponed

This went on for many months. Then, after her husband's death, Mrs. Atherton went to New York. Of course one of her first ideas was to look up Julian Hawthorne, and she forthwith despatched a note to his club inviting him to call upon her at her hotel. Julian at that time lived out of town, and his mail was therefore forwarded from the club. Hawthorne was out in the fields when Mrs. Atherton's missive came, and his wife opened the letter. She did not like it, and without consulting her husband she answered it. And I do not believe the two novelists ever met.

Joe Ward, Author

Joseph M. Ward, who was city editor of the Examiner in the eighties, and who has been doing newspaper work in Denver ever since he left this city, has written a book entitled "Come With Me Into Babylon." Professor Sayce of Oxford commends it highly for its accurate Assyriology Ward was a harum-scarum fellow at the wind-up of his local career, but he was always an extremely popular newspaper man. After going to Denver he mended his ways, and of late he has done some brilliant newspaper work.

John Graham, author of "The Great God Success," is really David Graham Phillips, a New York newspaper man. His second novel, "Her Serene Highness," is published under his own full name, and he has a third about ready. Mr. Phillips ought to be remembered as the man who secured the "beat" some years ago, when the Victoria was rammed and sunk by the Camperdown on the northern coast of Africa.

Family History in which Cupid Figures

The death of John Rosenfeld recalls the many vaudeville episodes that punctuated his career. The virus of speculation was thick in his blood and his deals were always spectacular. But the pranks that Cupid played with the Rosenfeld family were even more sensational than the head of the clan's wheat coups. Virginia City still remembers a sensation of the Comstock days of which "Johnny" Rosenfeld's sister was the heroine. She married a man named Armer, and their divorce suit was sparkling in its charges and counter-charges. Before the smoke cleared away, Mrs. Armer went to Europe. She never returned here. All of Mr. Rosenfeld's three daughters made unhappy marriages and are divorcees. They are estimable women, but somehow fate has been unkind to them in the matter of matrimony. Mrs. Mackay officiated as matchmaker for one of them, but even she could not mascot it on the road to happiness. A frequent visitor at the Mackay chateau near Paris, where Miss Rosenfeld was a guest was a Mr. Rosener, one of the brothers Rosener of Virginia City, old friends of the Mackays. In course of time Miss Rosenfeld and Mr. Rosener were married, in Mrs. Mackay's house, and the future stretched rose-colored. It was not long, however, before their marriage bonds were broken in court.

John Rosenfeld himself once held the centre of the stage in a tangled affair of the heart with Miss Block, the buxom secretary of the Park Commissioners, as leading lady. Though Rosenfeld was a widower supposed to be immune to feminine charms, Miss Block asserted that she was his fiancee. The old gentleman denied the allegation, and there was some lively comment in the papers at the time. It was all forgotten, though, until John Rosenfeld Jr. and his wife, Agnes Smedburg that was, stepped into the divorce court the other day. Then people began to reminiscence about the hard luck of the Rosenfelds in deals with Cupid and Hymen.

Rosenfeld's Coup

It was in the famous wheat deal in the days when the "big four" manipulated the markets, that Rosenfeld first became prominent. He drew on the Nevada bank to the amount of fifteen million dollars and plunged in wheat. When the bottom fell out of things Flood announced that the cashier had advanced the money without his knowledge, and for a day or so the bank affairs looked panicky. Men could not credit that such an amount of money could be advanced over Flood's head. Mackay and Fair rushed out from New York and helped the bank settle up. Rosenfeld sold his beautiful home and furniture to add his drop to the bucket.

Another Sensational Theory

Since writing the paragraphs which appear on a preceding page, on the subject of the political feud in which Governor Gage is playing a star part, I have learned of another theory that is being promulgated by the Governor's friends. It relates to the alleged frauds at San Quentin which threaten to develop interesting libel suits, and it imparts to the ramifications of this most sensational feud another of the glowing tints of the stirring melodrama in which the plot is constantly thickening. This theory has an act all to itself. It introduces in his own propria persona that distinguished crook "Happy Jack Chretien," the erstwhile clubman and bon vivant, who perforce, comes on in a striped suit, for Jack is doing time. He is discovered as the curtain goes up in the Commissary Department of the penitentiary. It was there, according to the theorists, that a certain voucher was falsified, for that there was one falsified there is no doubt, and that is what the Call has charged against the management. According to the Governor's theorists, who of course are intent upon exculpating the Warden who is the Governor's friend, that voucher was falsified by one of the convicts employed in the Commissary Department.

The Why and Wherefore

"Which one,' is the question, which proceeds on the assumption, of course, that the Warden is innocent; that he did not order the falsification of the records. And it was the presence of Jack Chretien that suggested the sensational solution of the problem. Jack is a politician. He was sent to the penitentiary for being implicated in a plot to rob an estate. What more likely, say the theorists, than that Jack put up the job to implicate the Governor in a manner calculated to render him politically impossible. If you ask the motive, the theorists will tell you that there are several motives that might have actuated him. They wink knowingly while refreshing your memory concerning certain politicians who were threatened with being implicated in the robbery of the estate. The whole argument of the theorists is fraught with sensational suppositions, and if they were not intelligent men you would pronounce them wild and incoherent dreamers. But it all goes to show that the politicians believe one another capable of furthering the most damnable conspiracies to attain their ends. However, if the Governor insists upon prosecuting libel suits the truth will probably come out. Neither Mr. Spreckels nor General Otis has betrayed any evidence of fear. They appear to be well fortified with facts.

A Leader of Long Ago

The return of Mrs. John McMullin after a long absence will no doubt be followed by a series of entertainments in honor of that popular lady. Mrs. McMullin was a Miss Morgan of Kentucky, where she was a prominent belle away back in the early fifties. It was during a visit here she met John McMullin, who had the reputation of being the most accomplished horseman in the United States, and became his wife. Mrs. McMullin's residence in California street was the scene of many gay functions, the Southern element largely predominating among her guests. Her four pretty daughters were always the centre of an admiring circle of beaux. The eldest, Lilo, married Dr. Perrine. The second, Susie, was Tom Williams' first wife. Later she married a Kentucky gentleman and died soon after. The third of the McMullin girls is the wife of John C. Hays, son of the noted Texan Ranger, and the youngest, Becky, married William Wayne Belvin, from whom she was divorced. She is now known as Mc-Mullin-Belvin

The Rockefellers are doing a lot of moralizing these days. Until they follow the example of Andrew Carnegie by making liberal contributions to a Conscience Fund, I shall believe them insincere. It was Bacon who discovered, some centuries ago, that a certain lack of scruple was the most valuable of all qualities to him who was resolved to become rich. The founder of the Rockefeller fortune wants us to believe that he acquired his ridiculous fortune through an abundance of scruple. He protests too much.

Is Mrs. Pullmann Affianced?

The gossips at Blingum are saying that Mrs. Frank Carolan's latest trip to the East was superinduced by the report that her mother was threatening to enter the married state again. When I last heard of Pullman mere she was in very poor health, and efforts were being made to induce her to enter a sanitarium. Old Californians remember Mrs. Pullman as a woman of strong will. They knew her as Miss Hattie Sanger of Sacramento. She was the only daughter of Col. James Sanger, a railroad man, and was at one time supposed to be engaged to Edgar Mills but that gentleman transferred his attentions to Miss Swift, whom he subsequently married, and Miss Hattie soon after became the bride of Geo. M. Pullman, the wealthy car-builder.

One of the prettiest brides of the past two years who belongs to the Burlingame set is expecting a visit from the ciconia alba, and her friends say that she is not pleased.

The Last Chapter

I have authentic information that May Hoffman and the Reverend J. Le Baron Johnson are married and are making their home in Italy. They passed several months in England, where the wedding took place. Now Mr. Johnson is studying dramatic art, and within a few years he will make his debut on the stage. This is a very proper ending to what was one of the biggest sensations that ever startled San Francisco society. But it is no doubt the ending that both May Hoffman and the clergyman had in view when they took the step by which they forfeited everything for love. Some thought the elopement was premeditated when Miss Hoffman first went East to enter the New York hospital as nurse. Others thought it was only an impulse of two people passionately in love. I was the first to chronicle the news of their sojourn in Italy after the mad rush over Europe in search of a place where no one knew them. May Hoffman that was was such an amiable, big-hearted woman that her escapade aroused nothing but sympathy among those that knew her.

What a merry old world that of the New York swim must be when they get up parrot funerals by way of diversion!

Of the Swearingen Fold

The engagement of Miss Violet Whitney to Lieutenant Purcell, U. S. A., adds another to the list of California girls who, during the past few years, have married into the Army. Miss Whitney, who was born and raised in Oakland, was a frequent visitor to Washington during the life of her Aunt Sue, who was the wife of Justice S. J. Field. Miss Whitney's mother was the second of the Swearingen sisters who flourished here in the late fifties. The third sister, Sallie, married Mr. Condit-Smith of Washington, D. C., to whose several grown daughters she seemed more like a sister than a stepmother. Belle Swearingen, now Mrs. McCreery, who recently paid us a visit, was the youngest of the quartet and the one who made the wealthiest marriage.

If seventeen is too young to love, and thirty-five too old, pray tell me what is the proper poise in Cupid's tilting court?

The pretty young widow, Mrs. Philip Lansdale, who as Miss Helen Smith was such a favorite among the girls in our social world, bids fair to be equally so as a young matron, for she never seems happier than when devising some means of enjoyment for the young people.

They'll Miss the Doctor

The girls are all pouting over the prospective departure of Dr. C. C. Collins, U. S. The gallant medico has been ordered to the Philippines, and one more black mark against that "beastly place" is registered by our belles. The dance at the Presidio on Monday night was in the form of good-bye to the Doctor, and his many city friends took advantage of it for a "last waltz."

Edward's Troubles

My London correspondent writes me that King Edward is doing a lot of worrying these days by reason of the pressure being brought to bear by some of his old flames to induce him to bestow honors upon them during Coronation week. "One or two complaisant husbands of titled ladies are being urged for Dukedoms," says my correspondent, "and the King has decided to stop short at Marquisates. He explains that he wishes the ducal caste to remain as exclusive as possible, because he has one Duke for a son-in-law and another for a brother-in-law. The most interesting bit of news that I have heard is that Miss Jeanne Langtry will be one of the pretty debutantes at the next Court. She is the daughter of the 'only' Lily, who as everybody knows was the pet of Albert Edward for several years. The gossip of the clubs is that Edward VII has decided to placate the insistent Langtry by admitting her daughter to the Court. What do you think of that? There has been so much disagreeable gossip that Edward has suddenly become more attentive than ever to his Queen. Their Majesties attended the opening performance of the opera season at Covent Garden, and also the two following performances. It was the first time in many years that the Sovereign of the Realm was seen at the opera. 'Lohengrin' was the work chosen for the opening with Madame Nordica as the star. A new tenor made his appearance in the person of Herr Pennarini, and he was well received. The second performance was Gounod's "Romeo et Juliette.' The King and Queen saw Suzanne Adams as the ill-starred heroine. M. Saleza and M. Plancon were also in the cast. 'Tannhauser' came next with Frau Lohse as Elizabeth, and Herr Kraemer-Helm as the latest exponent of the titular role. He is a good actor but there is room for improvement in his singing."

Must be Exclusive

The paper chases at San Rafael this year will be under the supervision of Judge Ward McAllister. It is generally believed that paper chases to be a success must be very exclusive, and they were always that in the Baron's time in San Rafael. Anything that is exclusive is always sure to go, and in the old days to be in the paper chases in San Rafael was equivalent to being in the swim.

To Purify the Swim

Society people are much amused at the recently announced determination of Mrs. Monroe Salisbury to purify the San Rafael swim—eliminate "nobodies," and organize a sort of Friday Fortnightly daylight clique. Whatever her plans are it is certain that her advent into the little village will be followed by the formation of a definite set of fashionables whose duty it will be to frown down ambitious outsiders. With the backing of the Boardmans, Kips, Allens and Mendells, she will have a strong position from the outset.

She Knows the Label

My remarks about the impossibility of a Crocker salon aroused the indignation of a San Mateo correspondent, who declares that Mrs. Will Crocker is eminently qualified to preside over such an institution. "She speaks correct English," says my correspondent, "and she has a keen appreciation of literary genius." I am willing to concede that she has even greater qualifications than a knowledge of English and an appreciation of genius, and yet I do not believe that she could make a success of a salon. She lacks the temperament. Mrs. Crocker does not believe there are any bright people here, but she recognizes genius when it come properly labeled and accredited—Gelett Burgess, for-instance. He has been vouchsafed the privilege of breaking bread at her table, but he has been stamped in foreign parts. Moreover, he is quite tame. No one has entertained Mrs. Atherton more than Mrs. Crocker. M. Le Roux was also entertained by the Crockers while here, and so were M. and Madame de Regnier. However, Mrs. Crocker does not care to go into Bohemia. She prefers Bohemia Blingumized. Even the Prince and Princess Poniatowski, after bringing out the de Regniers, declined to mix with the polloi at Berkeley. They were billed to receive the guests at the de Regnier reception, but the Princess sent word at the last moment that she couldn't leave the babies. Later on the de Regniers went to Blingum.

Entertaining Celebrities

Last week I suggested Mrs. De Young as a woman qualified to establish a salon, and I learn that she is now doing the role of peripatetic salon leader in Europe. Scarcely a week passes without the De Youngs entertaining some of the top-notchers of the Continental swim or of the political and art worlds. In the Paris edition of the Herald of May nineteenth is an account of a dinner given by the De Youngs at the Carlton restaurant, London. Among their guests was M. Santos-Dumont, who has temporarily usurped the place of Marconi in the glare of the calcium. There were also present Mrs. Ronalds, one of the most distinguished of British social leaders, Lady Parker, Mrs. John W. Mackay, Mrs. Parkinson Sharp, Mr. Morton Mitchell, Count Cini and Mr. William Gibson. I know that some of our provincial society snobs have sneered at my suggestion. Mrs. De Young is not of Blingum, and Blingum is very exclusive, you know. So exclusive are some of its residents that its confines circumscribe their social sphere. They couldn't move outside of it. but they revel in a sort of social self-ostracism and flatter themselves that they have attained the Mecca of the Elite. The temperament of the cosmopolite which nas always marked the salon-leader is not to be found at Blingum. Mrs. De Young possesses it in a high degree. Its absence is prima facie evidence of provincialism.

The Bulletin having called attention to the fact that the Blingumites are the arch and artful tax-dodgers of the State, the San Mateo Times inaugurated a campaign to force Burlingame into the corporate limits of the town. And now there is consternation among the landed gentry of our exclusive suburban resort. The thought of being classed with the citizens of San Mateo—the butcher, the saloonkeeper and the rest—is harrowing. The Times is confident that it will win its fight.

Colonel Egan of embalmed beef fame is back in town as snug and debonair as before his Spanish-American commissary records had to be deodorized. A story is going the rounds anent the pronunciation of Egan as mouthed by himself. The other day Colonel Egan—accent on the last syllable, please—and some friends were sampling the work of a Market-street mixerologist who had known Egan when he was a vealy lieutenant in Montana.

"Here's to your health, Colonel Egan," proposed one of the group, giving the name the proper French twist.

"Egan is it now?" said the barkeeper; "shure and its 'Aigen' his grandam was called back in Cork!"

Thanks the Press and the Public

I, the undersigned, beg leave to heartily thank the press and my customers in this city and vicinity for the confidence and moral support given me during the annoyance and irritation forced upon me by the so-called "Mayerle & Co.," who unscrupulously opened an office next door and covered its front with signs almost identical to mine, and also by the use of false statements and specious arguments endeavored thus to deceive. With the assistance of the Press and the public their dishonest practices have been exposed, which, reacting upon themselves, have compelled them to close their doors and depart. The people of San Francisco have once again evidenced the fact that they will not stand for underhand dealings, but are always ready to support an institution that has honesty and thoroughness for its motto.

I have been a resident of San Francisco for many years, and upon the reputation I have built must rest my future success. To all my old patrons and prospective customers I beg to assure the same honest and straightforward treatment that has characterized my past professional conduct. Respectfully,

Love of the Mountains an Inheritance

The Tom Williams' intend to spend part of the summer at their lodge on the McCloud river. Mrs. Williams is as fond of sports as her husband, and intends to be an adept at the rod before she is many moons older. She inherits her love of out-door life from her father, the late E. L. G. Steele, who was as fond of the gun and rod as any of William Black's heroes. Mr. Steele owned a place up in the Sierras which was an ideal spot for sportsmen. Every year he used to invite a party of Bohemian Club friends to spend a month or so at his little nest in the mountains. It was furnished with every luxury, and an ideal time was enjoyed by the guests. Mr. Steele was immensely rich, and possessed generosity and hospitality in keeping with his wealth. Mrs. Williams takes after him in more than her love for country life and sports.

They're Not Broke

When the Post changed hands a short time ago there was much regret over what was regarded as the financial collapse of Hugh Hume. It was thought that he would have to go to work again as a reporter. Expressions of sympathy were heard as late as last Saturday when the Humes sold their furinture. Mrs. Hume is a sister of De Forest Brush, one of the world's great artists, and she has artistic talent and a rare taste for antiques. The work of collecting her household effects occupied her for years. But she didn't have to sell them. The Humes are not in dire distress. Mrs. Hume owns some valuable mining property in Trinity county, and the Humes are going up there to spend the summer. Later on they are going abroad for two years, and they contemplate building a house boat on the Erie canal when they return.

The engagement was recently announced of Miss Mabel Lichtenstein and Mr. A. L. Gump, vice-president of the S. & G. Gump Co. Miss Lichtenstein is very well known in Jewish society in San Rafael and this city. She is the daughter of the B. H. Lichtensteins.

From a Club Philosopher

A club philosopher evolved these the other day and assures me they are bright:

Without experience one is apt to be fearless. With the former come modesty and humility.

God made man and the tailor makes his clothes, but he is more often judged by his tailor's work than by that of his Maker.

Good blood isn't everything. Cain and Absalom were of good family.

When a man makes a failure in public life it is often because he was too honorable to succeed.

Those who seek don't always get what they want; witness, William Waldorf Astor's peerage still in the air.

THE EYE WITH A CROWN

Mr. George Mayerle, the distinguished German optician, at last finds himself relieved of an annoyance. He is again sole monarch of the field where he has been eatablished for nearly five years. Some time since his brother set up a rival optician store next door and attempted to mislead the patrons of Mr. George Mayerle. But those who had long known the merits of Mr. George Mayerle's glasses were not deceived. The opposition attempted in vain to successfully rival their distinguished neighbor. They have now gone out of business and Mr. George Mayerle at 1071 Market street is without a rival.

On the Same Hearth

I.

Card received by Mr. Lancelot Duane.

To meet Miss Mildred Curtis.

MRS. REGINALD COURTNEY BROWNE.

AT HOME
SATURDAY, JANUARY SIXTH,
THREE TO SIX. THE HEIGHTS.

II.

Letter from Miss Curtis to Mr. Duane.

My dear Mr. Duane.

It was such a pleasure to see you at Mrs. Browne's last Saturday. You have not changed a bit since the last time I saw you—three years ago, was it not? I would have liked to have had more opportunity to talk over old times. Come and see us some evening, will you not? Auntie and I are at home always on Thursday evenings.

Very sincerely yours,

Mildred Curtis.

III.

Letter from the same to the same.

Dear Mr. Duane,

Wasn't it a shame that those horrid Smith boys and that Greene girl should have called on Thursday, the very evening I had hoped we could enjoy our chat undisturbed? But perhaps it would be more agreeable to all if you would call next time on a less formal occasion. The best thing, to ensure a quiet evening, would be for you to 'phone Auntie—any morning that is convenient to you—and then we'll see to it that there are no other callers. Very cordially yours,

Mildred Curtis.

IV.

From the same to the same.

My dear Lancelot,

Auntie thinks you are the nicest man we know, and begs that you will dine with us en famille on Sunday. Wasn't that a nice little talk we had the other night? I can just fancy the three years past were all a dream and we had never said "good-bye forever." Oh, Lance, didn't we enjoy that little experience of ours—now, didn't we? I wouldn't wish it hadn't happened. Would you? Don't forget Sunday.

Your old friend, Mildred C.

V.

Wire from Mr. Duane to Mrs. Curtis.

Regret can't come to dinner to-morrow. Called to country. Business.

VI.

Letter from Mr. Duane to Miss Curtis, written but destroyed by the writer.

It was a matter of precaution, my dear Mildred, that made me leave town so suddenly. I shall stay away while you are there, for if you can feel unmoved when you are talking about old times, I cannot. Why, Mildred, you women don't know the turmoil that goes on in a man's mind when he knows that he ought to be doing one thing, and is doing the other. It's simply impossible for me to be friends with you. There it is. So I must go back to "Miss Curtis" and forget you ever asked me to call you "Mildred" again. Lancelot.

VII.

From Miss Curtis to Mr. Duane.

What in the world do you mean, my dear Lance, by this long silence? I hope you are not ill. Why, I would fly to you did I know you were. Do you remember what you said to me as you left me at the theatre door, that last night before you went away? I was just about to join Auntie, and you said something about "forget"—I didn't quite understand it. What in the world did you mean, Lance, dear? I have never forgotten and never wish to forget. Why, as sweet on my lips as when you first showed me the meaning of love are your kisses. When that misunderstanding arose, and you were so cold and cruel, and I went away to Europe, and you never answered my letters explaining, I tried to forget. I thought I had forgotten—until I met you at Mrs. Browne's tea. Oh, why did you come? Why did you look so kind and handsome and altogether dear if you didn't mean that we were to be l—friends again? Good-bye, dear, if you say so—good-bye.

Millie.

P. S.—But I don't mean this to be good-bye. When you return to town, I must see you, just once.

VIII.

Comment of Mr. Duane on receiving same.

She made a fool of me once—she shan't do it again. But dash it! what am I to do?

IX.

Telephone from Miss Curtis to Mr. Duane.

Green, 6982. Is that you, Lance? This is Millie. What? Oh, I must see you today. Very important. What? No, Auntie is out of town. Dinner? Oh, yes, if you like. Yes, call for me at seven. Good-bye.

X.

Miss Curtis and Mr. Duane at dinner, Room nine at Pierre's.

Miss C.: This cocktail is delicious, reminds me of those we used to make in Paris.

Mr. D.: Oh, so you enjoyed cocktails in Paris.

Miss C.: Oh, yes, of course.

Miss C.: Anything suits me.
Mr. D.: Champagne?
Miss C.: Oh, of course—how sweet of you. We never used to have champagne, did we?
Mr. D.: We're older now.
Miss C.: And richer?
Mr. D.: In money, perhaps.
Miss C.: And experience.
Mr. D.: But less happy.
Miss C.: I'm not. I'm awfully happy tonight.

Hor d'oeuvre, entree, piece de resistance.

Miss C.: How changed you are, Lance.
Mr. D.: Older, Miss Curtis.
Miss C.: Miss Curtis! I am Millie tonight.
Mr. D.: It's no use. You can't get a blaze from ashes in which no life remains.
Miss C.: You are so changed I'd never know you. What did you mean by leaving town so suddenly without a word to me, and never answering my letters?

Champagne, more champagne, dessert, fruit, cafe noir, cheese, Curacoa.

Miss C.: Ah, now you're something like the old darling Lance!
Mr. D.: Oh, those three long years!

XI.

In the cab, en route home.

Miss C.: So you can't get a blaze from ashes—three years dead!
Mr. D.: No, dear, but there's such a thing as lighting a new fire with fresh kindling!

THE DINNER.

By One Who Has Sampled All Kinds.

There are dinners and dinners.

There is the society dinner, given by a hostess who aims to pay off her dinner debts, at which the guests include the unsophisticated bud, the clubman who is expected to tell stories with the point very plain, the dull middle-aged woman and her bored husband, the seasoned belle who is expected to contribute her wealth of repartee to the feast of reason and rally the bores from their wine stupidity, a menu not out of the ordinary and wine whose pedigree rests in mystery like the host's cigars.

There is the political dinner with a dessert composed of long-winded speeches and guests who are looking for political preferment.

There is the public dinner to a visiting great man, with a dessert just one degree removed from the dulness of the political dinner.

There is the round-table bohemian dinner, where wit sparkles and humor gleams and dull care is forgotten in the wine cup.

There is the dinner a famille, where paterfamilias growls and materfamilias chides her obstreperous olive branches to the detriment of harmony and digestion.

There is the dinner a l'hotc, where the new boarder ogles the pretty daughter of the hostess, and steals sly glances at the young married woman across the table and tries to forget in the contemplation of such beauty the paucity of the fare offered his palate.

There is the dinner at his friend's house, where the host tells stupid stories and the hostess yawns and looks at the clock.

There is the dinner one takes with one's stenographer, where the feeling of pleasure inspired by the perfect menu and her happiness is spoiled by obtruding thoughts of what one's wife will think when she discovers what one is doing in her absence.

And, above all, there is the dinner a deux, where both love or one hopes to be loved, where one takes less delight in the meat than in the wine, and less delight in the wine than in the kisses that punctuate each course, and with one eye out for the garcon's entrance one feasts the other on the charms of one's vis-avis, hoping the while that the dessert may come up to expectations.

—The Gourmet.

THE GRANDEST THING.

When hope was young and my blood ran rife,
When homage sweetened the cup of life
And pride was a flame well fed,
They asked me what was the grandest thing
That life could hold or a fortune bring;
As quick as flashes a swallow's wing,
"To conquer men," I said.

But now the pale of the after-glow
Reflects experienced years of woe
And sorrow bows my head;
"Come, tell us now, for we ask again
The grandest, holiest task of men."
Submission answered where pride had been—
"To conquer self," I said.

Southern Pacific Finances

The Southern Pacific Company's finances are especially interesting as we look upon it as a home concern, though as a matter of fact it is controlled entirely from New York, and is a leading factor in the New York stock market. The Company has just made public its statement for the period of July 1, 1901 to March 31, 1902. It shows that the gross earnings were $63,435,970, an increase of $6.255,148 over the same period of the year before. Operating expenses and taxes were $41,887,559, an increase of $4,531,851. The net earnings amounted to $21,548,411, an increase of $1,723,297. The total net income was $22,407,144. Now deduct from this sum, $12,154,770 of fixed charges and $8,033.389 of betterments, and we have left a surplus of $2,218,984. An immense sum has been put into improvements under the Harriman regime, and I look for the credit of the Southern Pacific to improve immensely in the next few months. Certainly Wall street is fast acquiring confidence in the new management, and what with the economies in operation, extensive betterments, and the marvelously-increased travel westward over the old Huntington line, there is a vast revivification of S. P., and a prophesy of better things to come. The Southern Pacific and its proprietary companies have a total indebtedness outstanding of $353,062,029 on which the annual interest charges are $15,991,754.

The Gray Gander after Geese

The Gray Gander Oil Company announced some days ago that some of its stock had been sold for twenty dollars a share. A morning paper made the same astonishing statement. A broker who was mentioned as having made the wonderful sale corroborated the story. If the sale was a legitimate one, the stock of the Gray Gander Oil Company is the most valuable stock in the local market , and it should cause a sensation in the financial world. The Gray Gander owns a piece of land in the northwestern part of the Kern River field but has raised no excitement there. A well drilled by the Gander went to water and not to oil. Gander sold the water and took in some money, but not enough by a long sight to encourage any one to pay more than a few cents for the stock. I understand that some agents of the Gander have been selling the stock in the small towns of California and nearby States for several dollars a share. This is highway robbery for there is a broker here who would be delighted to dispose of a thousand or two shares at ten or eleven cents a share. This is but another example of the methods which have given California oil stocks a black eye in the East and which have made it impossible for legitimate oil companies to sell stock. The rash and impossible promises of the ganders and "gold bonds" concerns have killed the goose of honest investors, and created distrust of even solid corporations.

King of the Oil Crowd

President C. F. King of the King-Crowther corporation is extolled in an Eastern magazine, and in it he makes the statement that his company possesses a newly-discovered field of oil in Southern Texas, covering an area of 142 square miles. Mr. King also asseverates in cold type, "at so much a line," that his company "has caused to spring into being within six months a corporation of enormous wealth and responsibility, the brilliant prospects of which dazzle and bewilder even old-time men of finance." The Mining and Engineering Review says: "Now that just goes to prove that a man is not always what he seems to be, for when C. F. King was in San Francisco at the head of a syndicate of grafters who were supposed to represent Eastern newspapers, we thought he was a dead failure. In fact he might have been compelled to make a mathematical calculation of the ties between San Francisco and his home town were it not for a local mining man's generosity. And now!—we wonder what the King-Crowther corporation 'ground floor' stock is worth?"

The Mercantile and Trust Company will open subscriptions on the fourteenth of this month, for $3,500,000 worth of bonds of the North Shore Railroad Company. This includes expenditures for betterments aggregating $1,375,000 and $1,500,000 to refund

Frank E. Young, one of the proprietors of the Russ House, San Francisco's pioneer hostelry, and Lieutenant of Co. "K," National Guard, State of California, was married recently. The bride was Miss Blanche Flowers, one of the belles of Helena, Montana society circles. Mr. and Mrs. Young have just returned from their wedding trip to the southern part of the State.

the North Pacific Coast Railroad Company bond issue maturing in 1912. The issue bears interest at the rate of five per cent, payable semi-annually, the principal payable May 1, 1942. The contemplated improvements include a new ferryboat, already contracted for; twenty-five miles of new track, a large steam electric generating station, and the building of a two and a half mile cut-off.

Ceneral Stocks Steady

Rather a stronger tone developed on the Stock and Bond Exchange during the past week, and prices were slightly firmer although sales were rather moderate. With the return of the officials of the Alaska Packers' Association from their annual inspection trip to the northern canneries values hardened a trifle and sales were recorded as high as $160.50, but the stock generally ruled steady at $160 bid. A report of one of the returning officers is to the effect that conditions tend towards a better opening in all respects this year than last. More fish was packed last year by 2,000,000 cases than was ever known. Four new canneries are being built by the association. Three hatcheries are maintained by the association in Alaska, and each year more young fish are liberated than the number of salmon packed. Labor, with the exception of Chinese, is plentiful. The 102nd consecutive monthly dividend of the company is payable on the 12th instant. Gas shares generally have ruled steady at the firmness noted during the preceding week. The present strength is attributed to further rumors of a consolidation of the leading companies in the bay counties. Several sales of San Francisco Gas and Electric shares were recorded at from $44.50 to $45, and Pacific Lighting securities were firm at about $49. In the budget for the coming year just passed by the Board of Supervisors, $275,000 is appropriated for public lighting against $257,000 last year. The city street lights will be lighted 341 nights in the coming year against 305 nights during the current fiscal year. The lighting is practically all done by the San Francisco Gas & Electric Company, which corporation will naturally receive the greater portion of the increased appropriation. Bank shares came in for some little attention, and 50 London, Paris and American Bank sold at $168, the last sale was made at $166 in April. A block of 105 shares of the Mutual Savings Bank changed hands at $80. Bank of California shares were strong, $430 being bid for five shares but bringing out no stock. Giant Powder securities were traded in rather sparingly and values showed slight fluctuations between $69.50 and $70.50. Water shares were easier, Spring Valley declining to $89.75 with more offers to sell than there were buyers. Sales of bonds were of moderate proportions but values generally were well sustained. San Francisco & San Joaquin Valley 5 per cents became suddenly popular and several thousand dollars' worth were sold at from $122.50 and $122.75, a sharp advance. Bay Counties Power Company's 5s were also a favored security and sold fairly well at $108.50.

Spring Valley Affairs

The last of the Spring Valley Water Company's third mortgage bonds, amounting to $300,000, have been issued, making the total bonded indebtedness of the corporation $13,975,000. Of this amount $4,975,000 is in first mortgage 6 per cent bonds, due September 1, 1906, $5,000,000 second mortgage 4 per cents, due May 1, 1917, but subject to call at par on September 1, 1906, and $4,000,000 third mortgage 4 per cents due September 1, 1906. No more bonds can be issued under these mortgages and as the first and third mortgages fall due in 1906, and the second can be called at par at the same time, it is probable that before that time a bond issue will be made for a sufficient amount to refund existing mortgages, and leave an ample amount unissued to provide all necessary capital to complete improvements now contemplated. The authorized capital stock amounts to $16,000,000 in 160,000 shares. Of these only 140,000 have been issued, so the company can at any time issue the remaining 20,000 shares which at the present prices ruling on the Stock and Bond Exchange would realize somewhere in the neighborhood of $1,800,000.

Hawaiian Sugar Stocks

My Honolulu correspondent writes me that confidence in Hawaiian sugar stocks is growing there. The chief bugaboo is assessments. He says: "One of the most significant features has been the buying of Olaa paid-up stock. There was a total of 400 shares sold, and there is demand for more at $13. While this is the market price, there lies behind the transactions something more. The buyer was a tourist who had not a single dollar in Hawaiian securities, one who came here on a pleasure trip, and simply looked about him and bought what seemed a fair investment. The sales recorded are 400 Olaa paid-up, 50 Olaa assessable,, 100 Kihei, 53 Oahu, 45 McBryde and 160 Ewa. The sale of McBride was at $6, which shows an advance of a half over the previous selling price. The stock is not strong, though the street is of opinion that the immediate result of the issuance of the bonds as authorized will be to place the stock on a better plane. The sales of Oahu, Kihei and Ewa were at the old prices, and the shares show little demand except Ewa, which can find a ready sale at the price, $24.

"Outside the selling stocks there were prices made which show the better feeling in the market. For instance there can be no Kahuku brought out by the most persistent offers of $23.50. The last sales of this stock were at $24, which was some time ago. The plantation is now in the hands of Alexander & Baldwin, and the prospect is understood to be for a crop of 8,000 tons next year. The plantation under Willow Baldwin and Andrew Adams has been coming out well and with its small capital, a half million, is looked upon as a sure one per cent stock in the near future. Some of this stock has been exchanged for Ewa on even terms. The most promising feature, however, was the offer of $75 for Waialua. This stock was sold down to $53.50 and then gradually forced up to the present bid, which found no takers."

HER ARTIFICE.

Benedict (just returned from honeymoon trip and settled in new apartment): There's our phone, dear. (Kisses his bride.) Wait till I answer it. (Later, returning with feigned annoyance on his face) Isn't it a pity? The 'phone was from Tom, at the club. I must go down immediately (gets hat and raglan and kisses bride). Now dont wait for me, dear, I may be late.

Mrs. Benedict (not exactly a novice for she has three married sisters and knows the ways of men): All right, dear. Of course I'll be lonely, but will try and console myself. I guess I'll go to see "Fiddle Dee Dee." They say it's fine.

Mr. B. (pausing in hall on way to door): Better wait until tomorrow and I'll take you myself. I prefer you not to go alone.

Mrs. B. (going to telephone): Oh, I don't intend to. I fancy one of my sisters will be only too glad to get out (takes down receiver). Hello, Carrie. Not Carrie? Oh, Mr. Benson, how lovely. I wanted Carrie to go to the theatre with me. You? Why, yes, if you like. I'll be ready in fifteen minutes. Oh, no, he won't care!

Mr. B.: Who is that?

Mrs. B.: Charley Benson, don't you know? I was engaged to him when I was sixteen. Have known him for years.

Mr. B.: Well, I don't think it proper for my wife to go out with another man.

Mrs. B.: But Charley Benson is just like a brother. He lives at Carrie's, you know.

Mr. B. (taking off hat and raglan): I guess I won't go to the club.

Mrs. B.: Well, what will you do while I'm away?

Mr. B. gives her a kiss.

Mrs. B. (going to 'phone): Well, I think I'll stay at home, too. I'll just have time to catch Charley before he leaves. We'll go another night instead.

Made jests upon his name,
His clothes, his walk, his feet, his speech—

And before she knew he went his way—
Yet she loved him all the same.

Many people who might be enjoying a PIANOLA will not investigate because they believe the PIANOLA, being the best piano player, is too expensive. . . . This is wrong, for although we have sold PIANOLAS to many of the wealthiest San Franciscans, more than half have gone to the homes of music lovers in moderate circumstances. PIANOLAS can be bought on easy payments.

YOU can't afford to buy any other piano player when the PIANOLA, the best, can be had for a mite more, and when none but PIANOLA owners can get twelve new pieces of music every two weeks for $20.00 per year by joining the circulating library of PIANOLA music.

STAGE

Broadhurst's Latest

"The Red Knight" is a curious conceit and is worked out with a naivete that is refreshing in these days of problem plays, bedstead dramas and decollete social studies. It is odd enough to be mistaken for rare art, and though we have seen it under unpropitious circumstances it has all the earmarks of a successful drama. When Mr. James Neill is able to sustain the interest of an audience in a play on its premier presentation there must be merit in it. Mr. Neill is at his best when he is imitating an actor of genius. He lacks the creative talent. In his interpretation of the role of the Red Knight it is evident that the subtleties of the character are beyond his conception. Mr. Broadhurst's new play is in the nature of a satire on the romantic drama. He did not intend Robert, the Crown Prince of Morantea, to be taken seriously. That rollicking chap is inspired by a desire to josh the heroes of fiction. At times Mr. Neill appears to catch the idea, and at others he lapses into the seriousness of the romantic hero. It is not wise to play an unconventional hero with all the little tricks of the conventional stage. But Mr. Neill's acting is of less importance to this review than the play, for we are familiar with the actor's shortcomings. The play is a novelty and the frank simplicity of the author's method, and the adroitness with which he adorns an elemental theatrical tale, are amazingly charming. It is a strange sort of a play with which to amuse the patrons of modish theatres in these degenerate days, but there is wit in it, and satire and sarcasm, too, and more human nature than many masters contrive to put into their profound problem plays. The coach-halting episode is a very clever conceit. The idea of a Prince, disguising himself as a real highwayman, stopping a coach, and then fighting a duel with the genuine knight of the road for the privilege of robbing the passengers, is daring and unique. And there is humor in the incident of the coachman being compelled to cover his master whom he had declared he was willing to risk his life for, in order to render that gentleman harmless. The scene has a comic opera flavor but it is funny, though perhaps attenuated. Indeed that is the main fault of the play. There is too much dialogue, but the story is not lacking in substance and therefore it may be easily improved. New action should suggest itself. I am quite confident that Mr. Broadhurst is capable of strengthening his play. No playwright is ever satisfied with his play when he first sees it. A feature of the performance was the work of Gertrude Keller of Los Angeles. It was the second play in which she ever appeared, and in an ingenue role she showed unusual cleverness.

Syle's Ponderous Style Mars "Francillon"

If by some odd perversity of fate one occasionally sees a good actor in a good play, at the present stage in our dramatic affairs one is profoundly grateful. We get any number of good plays—produced after a fashion by the change-of-bill-every-week stock companies—but they are not always well acted. The star with a repertory is a rare thing nowadays. Henry Miller is one in a hundred, and he only plays repertory, I believe, when he comes West in the summer. In the enterprise, therefore, that moves her to add to her repertory,Kathryn Kidder is greatly to be commended. I regret that there are not more able actresses with her ambition even if, as in "The Country Girl," it is sometimes misplaced. In the part of Francine, which she essays this week in the adaptation from Dumas' "Francillon," she has a role widely removed from that of Peggy, which she gave us last week. The role is one that we saw Cora Potter in years ago, in an adaptation called "In Society." Miss Kidder has none of the seductive charm of Mrs. Potter, none of that slow, witching grace and convincing passion that made the latter's impersonation so lifelike. But her interpretation is a well thought out one. She misses no points and represents from her point of view a strong picture of the young wife torn by humiliating jealousy who uses diplomacy and deception to regain her rights. This version of "Francillon," while it brings out the story very plainly and has a certain power in some of the scenes that impresses the auditor, lacks brilliancy. Professor Syle, in translating, has failed to grasp the light and airy cynicism of the Frenchman. He has made a strong play but not a clever one, and in these days we are so used to bright dialogue that when we get heavy sentences instead we can't stand for it. The company shows to much better advantage in "Francillon" than in "The Country Girl. If wanting in the indigenous characteristics of the Dumas types shown they are nevertheless careful and intelligent in their protrayals. But for "Francillon" as a whole I think the perfect adaptation of it is yet to come. The original dialogue has a nimble diablerie that requires a translator not only familiar with classical French, as is Professor Syle, but with idomatic everyday Parisian. It is a play that lacks hackneyed features and a perfect presentment of it in English would mean an enduring popularity.

When you ask for Jesse Moore Whiskey be sure you get it. Don't let anyone tell you they have something just as good.

The "Youngest" Leading Lady

Maude Fealy, the new star playing at the Grand, is said to have held the record of "youngest" leading lady on the American stage longer thanany others that enjoyed the distinction. The inference is that Miss Fealy is no longer young. But she is. She may be in her twenties but she has not been in them long enough to have forgotten her 'teens. She is a talented young woman and is destined to attain great prominence in her profession. The other day Richard Mansfield dismissed his leading lady, Isabel Irving, and there was some talk of Maude Fealy becoming her successor. She has had some experience with Mansfield, and it is therefore surprising that she did not learn to pronounce such words as "world" and "work." She gives them the sound which

A Suggestion

When the new Tivoli matures I think it would be an excellent plan for the management of the opera house to hold a revival of old comic operas. While it has been very pleasant to see the more modern works so well presented, I am sure there are many in our population who would enjoy a revival of the old. The company is now, with the exception of the lack of a prima donna soprano, as strong as it ever was in its palmiest days. I can fancy its giving remarkable productions of "Erminie," "La Mascotte," "Olivette," "Dorothy," "Nanon," "La Fille de Madame Angot," "Girofle-Girofla" and some of the old German comic operas such as "Die Fledermaus," etc., with perhaps some of the Gilbert and Sullivan operas. Then there are the light operas, "La Fille du Regiment," "The Bohemian Girl," "Martha," "Lurline" etc., that would be acceptable. In years past, the Tivoli used to give us these things, and there is no reason why we should not have them again. But of course the management knows its own business best.

During the summer season at the Alcazar Sunday matinees will be discontinued. The Alcazar lobby and the front of the building have been redecorated and re-painted, and everything will be spick and span for the opening of the Florence Roberts season on Monday night. White Whittlesey will receive as warm a welcome as the star, and Georgie Woodthrope will also get the glad hand. Among the new ones to appear in Miss Roberts' support will be Mr. Charles Wyngate, late of the Lafayette stock theatre in Washington, D. C.

For the special accommodation of the public the Columbia box office during the Miller-Anglin season will be open Sunday between ten A. M. and two P. M.. There will be no Sunday night performances. Matinees are to be given on Wednesdays and Saturdays.

Annie Meyers, as the doll and the daughter in "The Toy Maker," is as clever as ever, and Hartman in the title role repeats his remembered success. He is singing Francis Wilson's topical song of "The Toreador," "He Ought to Have a Tablet in the Hall of Fame."

For the better telephone service of patrons the Orpheum management has had a private exchange installed, and now it is only necessary to ask Central for "Orpheum" when communication with the theatre is desired.

The support given Miss Fealy by the Grand stock company is worthy of special mention. Herschel Mayall and Gardner Crane have done exceptionally good work, and Miss Benrimo scored a positive hit as Felice in "The Little Minister."

Murphy and Slater are by all odds the most original and clever colored comedians the Orpheum has ever presented to us.

Prices are not to be raised to the New York standard for the Miller season at the Columbia. One-fifty will be the highest.

At the Show Next Week

COLUMBIA—Henry Miller, Margaret Anglin and company, Pinero's "Trelawney of the Wells," the hit of the New York season of '98-'99. Quaint costumes, a charming atmosphere and delightful comedy are its features.

GRAND OPERA HOUSE—Maude Fealy in Jerome H. Jerome's comedy "Miss Hobbs." This was one of Annie Russell's greatest successes, and is a comedy of fine texture, full of sentiment, wit and philosophy.

ALCAZAR—Florence Roberts in "Zaza." The house is practically sold out for the first week, such is Miss Roberts' wonderful popularity here.

TIVOLI—"The Toy Maker," which has repeated its former success and is drawing larger houses than ever.

FISCHER'S—"Fiddle Dee Dee," still flourishing like a green bay tree and opening on its tenth week.

ORPHEUM—The Motogirl, the latest Eastern and European mystery; Sadie Cushman, Sam Curtis and Herbert Holcombe in "Swells at Sea," a new nautical comedy; Barton and Ashley, in a new and amusing specialty; the twin Nices, versatile singers and dancers; Irene Franklin, Murphy and Slater, Hill and Whitaker; Le Roy and Clayton and the biograph. —The Playgoer.

A BEER THAT SATISFIES.

In the summer everybody drinks beer. Physicians recommend it, and popular usage endorses it. However the man who makes beer his beverage should be sure it is pure. All sorts of adulterations are used in the making of beer and only in a standard brand may one be sure of getting an absolutely pure beer. Such a beer is Wieland's, the most popular beer in this part of the world. Wieland's is a home product and as such deserves patronage. It is a positively pure beer, and splendid for the system.

The Dow Pupil Recital

A very interesting song recital was given last Saturday afternoon by the pupils of Mr. Percy A. R. Dow at his studio, 1511 Larkin street, when the following was the program: Prologue (Aus Field und Fiord), Grieg, Night-Thoughts, Cornelius, Epilogue, Grieg, Andrew Y. Wood; An Orchard Cradle Song, Denza, Naught to My Heart, Dvorak, Gather Ye Rosebuds, Rogers, Miss Grace Hipkins; Pur Dicesti, Lotti, The Bird's Noel, Chaminade, In the Woods, MacDowell, Mrs. Richard H. Robb; Lasciali Dir, Tosti, At Parting, Rogers, Love Me if I Live, Foote, Miss Wilhelmine Koenig; A Lover and His Lass, Morley, Autumn Sadness, Nevin, Thou Brilliant Bird, David, Mrs. Margaret G. Best; Feldeinsamkeit, Brahms, Roccoco Standchen, Meyer Helmund, Mr. Wood; Confidence, MacDowell, The Princess, Grieg, Journeyman's Song, (Danish), At Twilight, Nevin, Nymphs and Shepherds, Purcell, Miss Corinne Gyle; Winds in the Trees, Goring-Thomas, Oh! Thou Cruel Sea, Delibes, Miss Hipkins; Villanelle, Dell' Acqua, Mrs. Robb. Miss Julia Levinson and Miss Ethel Marrack were at the piano. Last evening a choral recital was given in Sherman-Clay hall by Mr. Dow's pupils, too late to be reviewed here.

Miss Goodsell's Recital

A song recital was given recently by the pupils of Miss Dorothy Goodsell in Assembly hall at Redwood City when those taking part in the program were Mrs. Hanson, Dr. Meek, Mrs. Rugg, Miss Cook, Mrs. Maar, Miss Beeger, Miss Goodsell and a choral of twelve voices. Mr. Walker acted as accompanist. The Redwood Democrat speaks very highly of the affair and of Miss Goodsell herself writes, among other things: "Her good work is noticeable in the clear enunciation of her pupils, which was noted and commented upon by all who were at the concert." There was a very large audience present on the occasion. Miss Goodsell, by the way, is meeting with much success. Mr. Charles Young, one of her pupils, is bass soloist at Plymouth Congregational church.

A New Two Step

Mrs. W. P. McDermott (Leila France) has written a new two-step, which she calls "El Salero." It was played at the german given by the new dancing club at the Mission last Saturday night. The club's name is El Salero, and it is composed of the juvenile smart set of the Mission, very much what La Jeunesse is to the Pacific Heights clique.

Mrs. F. E. Willson will spend the summer in San Francisco, and will be the guest of her mother, Mrs. Philip Heuer, 2117 Taylor street.

Mrs. Marriner Campbell and Miss Mary Elizabeth Widney left on Sunday en route to Europe.

Miss Esther Mundell will spend her vacation at Shasta Springs. —The Music Critic

Illy Directed Criticism

To judge by the sneering manner in which a writer in Black and White (London) refers to Mrs. Catherwood's "Lazarre," it would appear that his impression is that she is a precocious school girl egged on by the injudicious flattery of admiring friends and relatives. It is not improbable that Mrs. Catherwood's name is unknown in England, since her romances deal with topics not apt to be attractive to Londoners. She has found her inspiration in Colonial history, that of French Canada, and she has dealt sparingly with the loves of kings and lesser royalties. "Lazarre" appeals to a wider interest than most of the other and shorter tales, but while the "average reader" is devoting himself to Colonial romances, it would pay to read some of the old ones as well as the new. "The Romance of Dollard," to mention only one of Mrs. Catherwood's, is well worth while hunting up. It is an old book, as books go in these days, when the popular favorite of last week is forgotten next, but it is not a fac simile of ten thousand others, written to "make the market." Mrs. Catherwood began to write young, but she has not turned out two books a year, as much like each other and like others of their grade as sticks of cordwood. The writer in Black and White may prefer an English theme in his fiction, but that is no reason why he should decry the author of a book he has evidently not read.

A Mudie Idea

The Mercantile Library has made a new departure which will be for the benefit of its patrons who contemplate leaving town for the summer. Those who are planning an absence from the city for a period extending over four weeks can take with them a sufficient number of books to carry them over until their return. This, of course, does not include the new and popular books which are on the special or registration lists. These can be had in the usual way and returned by mail, express or private messenger. A payment of fifty cents in addition to the regular quarterly dues will enable a member to take ten books at one time, to be returned altogether at one time, from May first to October first.

Another Evans Novel

Augusta Evans (Mrs. Wilson), whose novels were the favorites of school girls and women with school girls' minds in the seventies, has just completed another, after a literary silence of sixteen years. "The Speckled Bird" is apt to meet with something of a warm reception, since the generation who wept salt tears over "St. Elmo," "Infelice," "Vashti," and others of the old list, has not yet outgrown novel reading, and even if we leave out of account those who still insist that these were the books of their day and will be overjoyed to find a new one from the pen of the same author, there are others who will be curious to note not only how Augusta Evans fits in with these later times, but what effect her books will have upon them personally. Novel reading thirty years ago was not recognized as a legitimate occupation, and girls who smuggled their "St. Elmo" into the house, or read it under cover of some text book in school are sometimes not yet quite certain whether it was the story which enthralled them, or the delightful risk of doing some thing which was forbidden. At all events, all that was preached by "those in authority over us" against Miss Braddon, Mrs. Southworth, Mrs. Henry Wood, Mary Jane Holmes and Augusta Evans and their sensationalism was as ineffectual as the present day tirades against Marie Corelli and Hall Caine. Girls seemed to take the disease at a certain age and the epidemic ran its course as certainly as the measles, the mumps or the whooping cough. Augusta Evans had a way of cramming her pages with obscure and learned references which often led under educated parents to imagine that her stories represented sound learning, though no reader was ever known to look up a single name or allusion. It was a fashion not confined to Miss Evans by any means, and was in all likelihood a deep laid plan to win recognition, or at least ward off objections from parents and teachers, just as the moral platitudes of the juvenile story books are intended to do. But it is a very conscientious youth of either sex which does not quickly learn the art of skipping, and all the goody-goodiness goes to waste while they rush through the exciting incidents.

Good Proof Readers Needed

Daily the complaints grow more frequent of the number of careless and ignorant errors which find their way into books, and daily the offenses accumulate. It is rarely now that a book comes through the press without at least one aggravating blunder, and the question, Why is it? exercises the patience of older readers who remember better things. The causes are many, but chiefly the lack of attention to rudimentary branches in school. Orthography is relegated to the background in order to make time for other things, and neither the ordinary proof-readers nor the average compositor can tell at sight whether a word is correctly spelled or not. Accuracy and thoroughness have gone by the board, and the tendency to trust to luck and take chances that "if it isn't all right nobody will notice" grows daily. The National Educational Association, which sets itself at the head of affairs in its line, is an open advocate of go-as-you-please orthography, and is doing its level best to reform backward. Men, in addition, every writer on historical or geographical or biographical topics seems to feel called upon to exercise his originality on the spelling of names. It is enough for him that some one else has followed a method or that it has hitherto been in common if not universal use, that he shall exercise his ingenuity in providing something original, so that at times appearance is no guide to what a name is meant to stand for. Add to this machine composition, where a whole line must be discarded in order to correct the most trifling error, and it will be readily seen that the same care applied now which prevailed when type was set by hand would frequently double the cost of composition. Errors in orthography are irritating to the generation who were taught that bad spelling was a disgrace, and grammatical blunders will jar those who, brought up in the age of parsing and analysis, still transpose their sentences and mentally note the cases of their pronouns and the moods of their verbs, but that will die out with the generation, and the younger readers, who have been left to "hurry up" and skim over surfaces in the quickest way and without thinking of anything deeper than words, will not be finding flaws in their printed books. Proof-reading will join the list of lost arts and forgotten industries ere long.

That best of all book-lovers' periodicals, the Book Lover, which removed its publication office from San Francisco to New York a few months ago, has absorbed the Home magazine. Originally the Book Lover was a quarterly, but it is now issued bi-monthly, and its table of contents in each issue is a veritable feast of good things. It is not endeavoring to cater to what is known as "popular taste," but for those who are genuine book lovers, whether their taste runs to handsome bindings, rare editions, good books, or information concerning books and the makers of them, the Book Lover is far and away the best literary publication extant.

A Glossary

The nonsense verses entitled "Jaberwocky," written by the late Louis Carroll, which were sung at the last Loring Club concert, are amusing enough as pure nonsense; still a little interest may be added by applying to their elucidation a glossary which was found amongst some boyhood papers of the author.

Bryllig (derived from the verb to bryl or broil), the time of broiling dinner, i. e., the close of the afternoon.

Slythy (compounded of slimy and lythe), smooth and active.

Tove, a species of badger. They had smooth white hair, long hind legs and short horns like a stag; lived chiefly on cheese.

Gyre, verb (derived from gyaour or giaour, a dog) to scratch like a dog.

Gymble (whence gimblet), to screw out holes in anything.

Wabe (derived from the verb to swab or soak), the side of a hill (from its being soaked by the rain).

Mimsy (whence mimserable and miserable), unhappy.

Borogrove, an extinct kind of parrot. They had no wings, beaks turned up and made their nests under sun dials; lived on veal.

Mome (hence solemome, solemone and solemn), grave.

Rath, a species of land turtle. Head erect; mouth like a shark; the fore legs curved out so that the animal walked on his knees; smooth green body; lived on swallows and oysters.

Outgrabe, past tense of the verb to outgribe. (It is connected with the old verb to grike or shrike, from which are derived shriek and creak.) Squeaked.

Mr. Collingswood, the biographer of Louis Carroll, thus translates the first verse of "Jaberwocky," which reads thus:

"'Twas brillig and the slithy toves
Did gyre and gimble in the wabe;
All mimsy were the borogroves
And the mome raths outgrabe—"

"It was evening, and the smooth, active badgers were scratching and boring holes in the hillside; all unhappy were the parrots, and the green turtles squeaked out."

Josephine Dodge Daskam's "Fables for the Fair" have caught the fancy of English readers, who, however, do not appreciate the style in which the book is gotten out so much as they do the subject matter. They object to the profusion of capitals, and that fashion, by the way, is apt to injure the sale of books of any but the most ephemeral character. It does once in a way, as a novelty, but the book buying world has no permanent use for freaks.

Dorothy Dix has collected her "Fables for the Elite," and they will be issued in a volume with illustrations by Swinnerton from one of the Eastern publishing houses.

YELLOWSTONE NATIONAL PARK.

One of the most delightful spots on the American continent, and more easily reached via Union Pacific than via any other line, is the Yellowstone National Park. The stage ride from Monida by the palatial Concord Coaches of the Monida & Yellowstone Stage Company is through scenery hardly inferior to the Park itself.

Side trip from Ogden, Utah, or Pocatello, Idaho, via Monida & Yellowstone Stage Co., in both directions, will be furnished holders of all tickets (one way first and second-class, regular tourist, or special round-trip excursion tickets), sold at Denver, Cheyenne and points east, passing through Ogden or Pocatello to points in the states of California, Nevada, Oregon, Washington and that part of British Columbia lying north of the state of Washington, upon application to O. S. L. agents at either Ogden or Pocatello, at the very low rate of $49.50.

This rate will include rail and stage fare covering seven and one-half days' trip, including all meals and lodging beyond Monida.

most of us be? Fancy the number of men who would be going through life without any fun! Fancy the number of women who would be spinsters and old maids and, even with men marrying them—sometimes one man marrying two or three—they keep overcrowding the population! Yes, we can say: 'Not quite the same as I loved her,' and yet be happy. And between you and me, it is just the same, only a man likes to make a pretense of having some constancy. * * * "When does love come? At what age? It is not love between boy and girl; not always between young man and maid; seldom between the man of thirty or even forty, and the woman who is passing out of the twenties. Age does not always seek youth. Women think they are old at thirty. And yet the women who have won the greatest men, wielded the greatest influence, commanded the most lasting love, have been most of them over the third decade and —some of them far over. I doubt if a woman can love till she is thirty. I am not speaking of that excitation we all call love when we are young or the world is yet before us. But I wonder how many people have found their real first love at middle age and have never known before what feeling could be—between men and women! More than you think. More than most people would believe. Ah! We keep finding out things—until we reach the limit of years—and we die, wondering how much there was in life we never knew at all!"

"The sins of the fathers (and the mothers) may be visited on the children to the third and forth generation, but their clevernesses seldom are."—The "Meddler," in Oakland Tribune.

"It looks like a waste of life, that mowing down of our best years by a relentless passion which itself falls dead on the top of them. But it is not so. Every year I live I am more convinced that the waste of life lies in the love we have not given, the powers we have not used, the selfish prudence which will risk nothing, and which shirking pain misses happiness as well."—Hester, in "Red Pottage."

OUR OPINION

National Legislation

Some very important business is being transacted in Washington these days, and there is more to come. The Philippine bill being disposed of, the isthmian canal question came up for consideration, and it promises to promote some very warm debates before Congress determines which route should be selected. In connection with Philippine affairs, which are always of great interest to this coast, it was interesting to note that the Secretary of War ordered the reduction of the strength of the army to the extent of eleven thousand men. This is proof positive of the improved condition of affairs in the islands. The order cuts down the army from its present strength of seventy-seven thousand two hundred and eighty-seven men to sixty-six thousand four hundred and ninety-seven. The present strength of the army in the Philippines is about thirty-one thousand seven hundred men. The changes made by the order will reduce it to about twenty-five thousand, or more than one-third of the entire army. In December, 1900, when the Volunteer regiments were serving in the islands, our forces reached the maximum, about seventy-five thousand three hundred men. The Philippine bill, which passed the Senate the other day, is a sensible measure which establishes civil government and provides for the development of the islands with safeguards calculated to prevent sordid exploitation. The commission established by Congress and answerable to Congress only will now proceed to organize a popular representative government. The bill contains some good clauses regulating franchises. The friar lands are to be purchased, not confiscated, as some bigots demanded. The trade of the islands will now grow by leaps and bounds.

Judge Cook's Latest

Judicial scandals are becoming quite common in San Francisco. If we were to give ear to one-half the gossip of the bar concerning the doings of the judiciary it would be hard to avoid the conviction that the Bench is rotten to the core. Town Talk has frequently discussed the affairs of the legal profession, and pointed out the looseness of its morals, the elasticity of its conscience and the flabbiness of its ethics, and we have predicted that some day would occur a scandal so revolting as to evoke an earnest and imperative popular demand for the purging of both the Bench and Bar of this city. But the evil is not one to be easily uprooted. The most eminent and successful members of the profession are its biggest crooks, and they are hard to reach. The reform crusade should be started in the profession, but the conscientious and upright lawyers are not always the most learned and powerful. They are in the minority, and their influence is weak. It is only when such a man as Garret McEnerney finds that one of his clients is about to be made a victim of one of the jobs that are so common in up-to-date legal practice, that there appears to be some likelihood of a purifying upheaval. Mr. McEnerney's position at the bar is unique. He is the premier lawyer of the Pacific Coast, but he is as distinguished for his fine scruples and integrity as for his great ability His record is untarnished. He has soared so far beyond the reach of envy that nobody ever heard even an adversary hint at "sharp practice" on his part. He is that unusual lawyer who tries cases on their merits, and no other way. There are lawyers who would not "fix" a jury but who would not make strenuous objection if an associate did so. Of Mr. McEnerney it has been said that he would not argue a case before a jury if he believed that one man in the box had been improperly influenced in the interests of his client. And this is the gentleman who withdrew from the Board of Health case the other day because Judge Cook insisted against his objection upon presiding at the trial. The reasons advanced as to the impropriety of Judge Cook's sitting in the case should appear somewhat cogent to the most unsophisticated layman. To any person familiar with recent political and judicial history, and with the tricks of the pot-house politicians who are interested in the case, Judge Cook's attitude is remarkable. His courage is surely greater than his discretion. So much has been said against the members of the Board of Health whom Mayor Schmitz is trying to oust, that, perhaps, he thinks the people will stand for everything providing the job is accomplished. He knows that the Examiner is behind Schmitz. He is mistaken, however, if he thinks that the Examiner is also behind Abe Ruef and Abe Ruef's methods.

About Trade Schools

Since Ella Wheeler Wilcox has taken to oiling the wheels of the universe she is ready with a prescription for every ailment, and though her theories are often sound enough, it is just as well that she is not accountable for the practical working out of them. One of Ella's latest fads is trade schools, in which the children of the public schools are to be taught to make a livelihood. Theoretically, children can be taught trades in connection with their regular schooling, so that by the time they leave school mentally equipped with a garment made up of the shreds and patches of all human knowledge, they will also be accomplished housekeepers, seamstresses, milliners, carpenters and metal-workers. According to Ella it is merely necessary to add the new fad to the course of study, and there you are. Well, now, let us have a look at the practical workings of the machine. Ignoring the kindergarten, which often adds two or three years to the length of school life, the average child enters upon his education at the age of six, and with good fortune in the way of perfect health and no interruptions, he leaves the grammar school at fifteen or sixteen. From the first day that he enters a schoolroom he is given instructions in writing, reading and numbers. Whatever other faults may be found with teachers, there is no question about their capacity in the way of acquired scholarship, and the least that can be expected of our grammar-school graduate is that he will be able to write legibly, read intelligently, express himself correctly and perform operations in mathematics, yet it is the exceptional one who can stand the test. Meanwhile, there have been added unto him bits and scraps of all arts, sciences, and one might add diseases. Does he know a single intelligible fact concerning them beyond the names of the books he has been obliged to look into? He has heard of botany, chemistry, philosophy, astronomy, physiology and all the rest, but they mean only one more book to buy, or one more blank book to fill with unintelligible notes. They begin nowhere and end at a blank wall, and instead of inspiring him to go on and investigate things for himself in later years, the mention of the name of a science is enough to turn him from it with disgust. Ordinary school teachers are not inspired oracles. They do the best they can with the material they have to work on, and if they fail to make a chemist of the boy naturally destined to be a carpenter, or to turn a teamster into a botanist, the cause should not be charged against the method of teaching. When we come to add mechanical trades to the ordinary course of study, is there any reason to believe that there will be greater success? In order to be of any value, instruction must be practical and not theoretical. Boys who were taking a course in carpentry would, if Ella's ideas were carried out, learn to make jig-sawed gimcracks and fancy ornaments, but not to hang a gate or put up a shelf. The embryo blacksmiths would learn in theory, but in all likelihood their instructor would object to scorching his fingers, and find that the clang of hammer and steel gave him a headache. The English board schools make a great specialty of sewing for their girls, but as one visitor expressed it, so far as any value in the instruction went, they might as well have been put in the treadmill. It is all mechanical and unpractical. Instead of teaching the girls to cut and fit common garments, and do such sewing as falls to the lot of every housewife, they are set to work making microscopic stitches and darning rents in bits of rag, and such other tasks as never come into the busy lives of ordinary women. The only way in which a trade can be properly learned is with a view to mastering it so as to earn a livelihood by it. Nothing yet has taken the place of the old-fashioned apprenticeship in which parents or guardians paid a premium to a master mechanic and youths of both sexes were regularly indentured. There were evils in connection with the system, but the advantages outweighed them.

The Hooligan Girl

When one looks back over the fiction and drama of the last half-century one of the points that impresses itself is the disappearance of the hoyden and the entrance of the Hooligan girl. Long ago we had the unconventional romp who shocked the dowagers and was the despair of the "prunes and prisms" spinsters, but she was lovable, warm-hearted and unspoiled. She was adored by the children, and when she settled down she made as proper a matron as one could wish for. Now, instead of the hoyden, we have the Hooligan, the glorified tough, who cares for no one and nothing but her own good time. She has a tongue like a fishwife, and though the bravest of our realistic fictionists has not dared to allow her to swear often in the course of a novel, we all know well enough that the damsel who drinks and smokes and stays out till it suits her to come home is not satisfied with merely "strengthy slang." We all know the damsel in real life, but the change from one type to the other has come so gradually, that no one could rightly say when it began, and it is only when we are brought face to face with a comparison that we realize how the Hooligan girl has dominated us. There is a great difference between unconventionality, the result of ignorance of conventions, or innocence of their need, and defiance which is the outcome of a desire to "look fast" whether or not there is real evil at the root of it. It is rarely now that a heroine is such that her own grandmother could have any pleasure in meeting her. Indeed, for that matter, pretty manners are out of date in society, and parents are either wilfully blind to the faults of their children or else so dominated by the young masters and misses that they dare not suggest improvements with any expectation of their being adopted. We all know the noisy, loud-tongued, pushing, squabbling, and generally unpleasant children that we meet in trains and on cars, and at whatever form of public entertainment they attend. We know the imperious young damsel who escorts her nominal escort and demands and takes for granted every service, not in a gracious, matter of course, ladylike manner, but in an aggressive and domineering style which suggests to the onlooker her own doubts of her deserts. On the occasion of some public function when both the Empress Eugenie and Queen Victoria were present, an observant onlooker made note that when about to seat themselves, Queen Victoria did so without preliminary, while the Empress glanced behind her to make sure that the seat was provided. It may have been entirely automatic and involuntary, but it brought out the subtle difference between the two—the one who was regnant by birth and knew that all her rights were there as a matter of course; the other exalted to rank and uncertain that she might not be overlooked. As long as we have children brought up without training in manners, and young girls educated to Hooliganism, we must expect to find them in our books. As long as women make demands in a bold and aggressive fashion, they will find them granted grudgingly and gracelessly. That the female Hooligan is abroad in the land is patent to every one who walks a block in the street or enters a street car. Indeed, the Hooligan monopolizes the platform, so that entrance is denied unless at the expense of a mild tussle with her ladyship. She is a type whom we could comfortably dispense with, both in life, in literature and on the stage.

A Presbyterian Protest

When one recalls the hysterical excitement of some of our good religious citizens a few years ago lest "Rome's red hand" should seize upon the government and all pertaining to it, and the loud outcries for non-sectarianism, it is interesting to see the Presbyterian Women's Board of Home Missions attempting to dictate to Congress. The good ladies are very much excited lest Congress, in its ignorance of conditions in Arizona, and New Mexico, should make the mistake of granting statehood while so large a proportion of their inhabitants are as yet unconverted. The Home Board takes it upon itself to deplore the ignorance, degradation, and general worthlessness of the communities, but offers no evidence as to facts. It is simply the usual "holier than thou" attitude of the churchly body, which in spite of its verbal expressions of humility believes itself to be the one genuine brand of Christianity, and all others imitations. One of the counts against the territories is that few of the inhabitants in proportion to the whole population are sufficiently intelligent to exercise the duties of citizenship, and yet, one would like to understand how the Presbyterian Women's Board of Home Missions is qualified to instruct them. Upon what do they base the complaint? Small membership in Presbyterian churches? Small donations to missionary funds, or have the good ladies been reading too many of the Wolfville variety of stories, to the neglect of their Bibles? It is true that both Arizona and New Mexico have a large proportion of Indians, but reservation Indians are not citizens. They cannot become citizens, and they can exercise none of the rights of citizens. The other inhabitants are drawn from all sections of the union, and they are as good citizens in their adopted community as they were at home. They have courts and schools and churches as well conducted and as well attended as are to be found in any other part of the country, and it is not improbable that if the antecedents of their "bad men" were inquired into, it might be found, as in the early days of California, that many of them were offshoots of pious New England deacons. It is not to be expected that the Missionary Board will recognize the impertinence of its meddling in this matter. Indeed, religious bodies in general seem to imagine that Congress is only a sort of committee to take joint action with themselves, and though their petitions and protests are politely ignored year after year, they will continue to importune and dictate as long as the sun continues to shine.

The Saunterer

The Mayor's Attorney

Immediately after the election of Mayor Schmitz, a letter was published in the dailies which had been addressed by that gentleman to Mr. Abe Ruef. Its tone was of such amazing frankness that practical politicians declared that it could have been written by none but an unsophisticated man. In their opinion Mayor Schmitz was so unskilled in the arts of the politician, and so inexperienced that he was incapable of realizing that the letter was susceptible of interpretation far from flattering to the author. But there were certain pessimistic chaps who winked the other eye, and remarked that it was evident that we were to have an administration for revenue. It was a most indiscreet letter, for it appeared to have been written for publication, and for the purpose of acquainting those whom it concerned with the fact that if they had any business to transact with the Administration it would be wise and expedient to employ Mr. Abe Ruef's legal services. Indeed, so strongly did Mayor Schmitz express his unbounded confidence in Mr. Ruef and his readiness to show his appreciation of services rendered that there appeared to be no escape from the inference which some people adduced. In newspaper offices where Mr. Ruef is well known the letter provoked considerable merriment. It was suggested to him by one newspaperman that he wrote the letter himself, and he did not resent the mild impeachment.

He is a Handy Man

But whatever was the purpose of that much-discussed letter it is evident that people were not slow in taking the hint which they believed it contained. Mr. Abe Ruef's legal practice has grown considerably since Mr. Schmitz became Mayor. Whenever a police officer is caught sleeping on his beat he hires Mr. Ruef to prove that he was wide awake. When a school teacher finds her job in jeopardy she suddenly discovers that the legal ability of Mr. Ruef is pre-eminent. If the Police Commissioners determine that a certain saloon-keeper should not have his license renewed, the talented attorney, Mr. Ruef, is retained in his behalf. Mr. Ruef appears before the Supervisors for petitioners, and that he still retains the confidence of Mayor Schmitz is a fact that is given emphasis by his appearance as counsel for the Mayor when the latter has instituted proceedings to remove somebody from office.

Why It is Unfortunate

So it is apparent that Abe Ruef's friendship for Mayor Schmitz is a remunerative investment. And considered in the abstract, there is nothing immoral in the relationship. Being a member in good standing at the bar the presumption is that Mr. Ruef depends solely on his legal ability when exerting himself in behalf of a client. It may be that his past—politically and professionally— has not been above suspicion at all times, but he is still entitled to the confidence of his clients. What I wish to submit is that it is unfortunate that his friendship for Mayor Schmitz, not to speak of his high sense of honor, and the good taste which, according to Mrs. Astor, is to be presumed to be the possession of a university graduate, should not repress the professional zeal which has rendered him so active in the interests of people who have business with the present Administration. It were vain and absurd to affect the belief that members of municipal commissions are not more or less influenced by the circumstance of Mr. Ruef's intimacy with Mayor Schmitz.. If they are not they are exceptional men. If they are their official acts should be severely criticised. That there are many people who believe that that intimacy is one of Mr. Ruef's valuable assets is evident from the character of Mr. Ruef's clientele.

THE STANDARD FOR CHAMPAGNE QUALITY IS

THE WORLD OVER

A Guardian Needed

If Mr. Ruef has nothing more than his legal ability—great as his talents may be—to recommend him in cases before municipal commissions, then I am of the opinion that many of his clients are being deceived, for the supposition of many of them is that he has "a pull with the Mayor," and that that "pull" extends throughout the city government. In view of the Schmitz letter their supposition is not unwarranted. Certainly if Mayor Schmitz were an attorney, he would not accept a fee to defend a police officer before the Police Commission. And yet his attorney, his acknowledged political mentor, the man who is training him for the gubernatorial job, the manager to whom he is deeply grateful, does not hesitate to deal extensively in municipal business. Unquestionably, Mayor Schmitz, in whose honesty I have absolute confidence, sees no wrong in Mr. Ruef's attending to his business, but I hope it shall not be taken amiss if I suggest that if the Mayor seriously expects to become Governor of this State he should have a guardian as well as an attorney. I do not believe that even Mr. Ruef pretends that his new clients are paying him fees because of their great confidence in his legal ability. Nor am I lacking in appreciation of his talents. Mr. Ruef was in some big cases even before Schmitz was elected Mayor, notably the Fair case. With Martin Kelly he warmly espoused the cause of Mrs. Craven.

A "Countess" with a Past

About a year ago the son of a well-known San Francisco family went to Europe to study medicine. Six months later his delighted mother informed her friends that her boy had married a French Countess. The photograph of the beautiful Countess was proudly displayed, and the many connections of the family were almost as jubilant as the parents themselves. The young man came into a snug fortune when he was twenty-one, and is in line for several large legacies. His father doubled his allowance so that he might keep his Countess in style, and his mother began to take French Before Breakfast that she might read her titled daughter-in-law's scented missives. Last April the parents decided to go to France and surprise their "dear children." They found them living in an ideal chateau in the suburbs, and the Countess, though a bit older than they had fancied her, was very charming. They were growing very fond of her, but one day the gossip of the San Francisco coterie in Paris reached their ears, and they were shocked.

The essence of the gossip was that the Countess had been a stage divinity and had a past; that she was not a real Countess, but assumed the title while enjoying the patronage of a gay old Count. Though she was accepted by the smart bohemian element of Paris, and was making her young husband an exemplary wife, his parents were dissatisfied and urged him to divorce her, but he refused. His father cut off his allowance and went to Italy to spend the summer. The surgeons of the hospitals in which the young man is studying say that he is very clever. Not long ago he wrote to a prominent society physician here saying that after making the rounds of the London hospitals he will come to this city with his wife to settle down and practice. As his family and relatives have always ranked with the conservatives here their attitude toward the "Countess" will be watched with interest.

Gossip from Stockton

Stockton is on the alert to learn when the beautiful Miss Wilhoit, whose engagement to Sidney Hodgkins was recently announced, will become a bride. Even her most intimate friends don't seem at all sure of the date, though orange-blossom luncheons and other bridey functions have been given in her honor. As a drowning man catches at straws the gossips catch at the remark of Dr. Hodgkins that he will return to England in October after the marriage of his brother. But then that's pleasantly indefinite.

Maybe it is because men have more sense than sentiment that they do unconventional things which a woman wouldn't dare do. Stockton would hold up its hands if a widow of less than two months' growth of "weeds" should appear at the theatre, but it only gasped the least little bit when J. Jerome Smith, a widower of most recent bereavement, walked in alone the other evening to forget his loneliness in a play. Nobody said "How heartless!" and it has never been charged that the gentleman who used to be plain "Jimmie" Smith was ever anything but most kind and affectionate to the well-to-do widow who took his name, after it had been revised, and endowed him with nearly all her worldly goods. I heard a young Stockton widow in heavy black weeds say that the widower's way is the right way. "Why should it be considered better form to stay at home and nurse this particular kind of sorrow when in all other trouble the palm is given to the one who successfully puts it behind him or her?" asks the widow.

The British Way

The stage is held responsible for many sins. Among them is that of instilling a fondness for the London accent and the British idiom. I hear that since Louise Drew went to Blingum "English as she is spoke" across the pond has become more popular than ever, and that the efforts of some of our Anglomaniacs at imitation are highly amusing. Some of the Blingumites are likely to give the impression that their British ideals were found in the provinces. It may be well for them to know that the words "nasty" and "beastly" are not so common among cultured English people as some imagine. To be strictly English in his speech the Anglomaniac must call his father "The guv-nor," he must always be "ill," never "sick" unless troubled with nausea, must order his "man" to bring him a "jug," never a pitcher, of water, and must say "coals" for coal and "railway" for railroad. And he must never speak of riding on horseback. Riding always means on a horse's back to the Briton born and bred. When he drives he drives, but when he rides he rides on a horse.

What They Say

You never talk of taking a bath down Blingum way—you "have a tub." The cars are "the train," baggage is "luggage" and the depot is never anything but the "station." They haven't reached the point of calling the conductor the "guard," but they may get to that later on. It doesn't make a Blingumite "mad" when he meets with failure at polo or golf but he is sometimes "angry." He is "fit" when he is well, "seedy" or "knocked up" when his health is not up to the mark. When confronted with a difficulty he is "up a tree" or else he finds it "hard lines." Whisky is always "spirits" and to be properly British he fills his glass to the brim with water. As Pomona's Jone said, in Frank R. Stockton's account of that interesting pair's travels in England, the English people take their climate as they do their spirits—climate and water, with a good deal more of the latter. And, another thing to remember, the educated Englishmen do not drop their h's, except when h follows w in which, where, when, white, whether, what and whisky. His r's must never be sounded in finals. That is left to the Frenchman and Irishman.

Rings for Lily

The real reason of the latest postponement of the marriage of Peter Martin and Lily Oelrichs is that the Oelrichs family was plunged into mourning when the uncle of Peter's fiancee died. Peter is no longer tossed on the waves of uncertainty. He has a plethoric purse and is sure of his conquest. The other day he was in a local jewelry store buying costly presents for his bride-to-be. I have received an inventory of his purchases. From it I should judge that Miss Oelrichs is very fond of pearls. He bought one ring with a black pearl set between two diamonds and another with a white pearl similiarly set.

Magi's Influence on George White

Death brought to Cattle King George White the surcease of domestic agony that "Magi" was never able to give him. "Magi," speaking through Medium Whitney, gave White advice about his private business as well as about his spiritual wives. When "Magi" began to take an interest in the cattle king the latter was evidently finding life dull. At any rate he was willing to spend several hundred thousand dollars to liven up matters. "Magi," through Mrs. Whitney, introduced the old man to his first spirit bride and after that to others, White cheerfully paying for the introductions. It was about seven years ago that White's first worldly wife brought suit for divorce against him. That was the time such a how-de-do was made about the cattle king's property. Mrs. White wanted to ascertain its exact amount, but Magi persuaded him to conceal it. The lawyers finally rooted out a part of it, in a safe deposit box to which only Magi and White had access.

His Second Worldly Marriage

Mrs. White No. 2 was wedded to the cattle king in rather a romantic manner. She met the old fellow through a matrimonial bureau. She was about twenty and he was fifty but he fell desperately in love with her and nothing would satisfy him but an immediate marriage. He was very generous to her and also to her relatives, all of whom hail from the other side of Market street. The only one that objected to the match was Magi, who hated to let so much money go out of the spirit family.

Evolution of the Duster

Linen dusters are in again and the smart man and woman are adding them to their summer wardrobe. It is the same old duster our fathers and mothers used to wear thirty years ago but they don't call it a duster any more. It is a linen raglan now, or a linen newmarket. We used to think them ugly garments in the days agone, but their necessity was conceded when traveling over dusty roads. Now their necessity comes from another reason—they are a la mode. I remember two rich old pioneers who were distinguished for their wearing of linen dusters long after

Opposed to His Own Camp

Governor Gage is having some of the experience that filled his predecessor with woe. The ingratitude of job-chasers is harrowing his vitals. When Budd was Governor he distributed the loaves according to his best judgment but toward the end of his administration he found that many who had received favors at his hands were his bitterest enemies. They did not get the jobs they wanted, though they accepted what was given them, and then proceeded to "knock." Governor Gage appointed Charley Spear a Port Warden, but Spear wanted to be a Harbor Commissioner, so he is against the man who provided him with a fat salary. Lew Brown, who is a member of the Board of Equalization by the grace of Governor Gage, is not allied with the opposition forces, but he does not hesitate to tell about the strong opposition of the interior to the administration. That is the "whispering" process of doing up an enemy in the game of politics. It is very effective.

Budd Retaliates

Though Budd was hammered strenuously during his term by sore-head politicians he is having lots of fun these days retaliating. John Gaffey of Los Angeles had the velvet off his hammer when Budd was Governor, and last week Gaffey came to town with brother-in-law Hicks of San Jose to make a fight in the Democratic State Central Committee for Santa Cruz, which sought the honor of entertaining the delegates to the State convention. Budd was inclined to be for Santa Cruz because it is the home of his friend William T. Jeter, but when he learned that Gaffey was leading the forces for the city by the sea, and expected to swell himself by achieving a great victory, he joined the element that was for Sacramento and won out for the capital. Budd is making no pretensions to leadership, but he is a dangerous foe in a fight of any kind.

The Cause

Budd's antipathy for the man from Los Angeles developed shortly after he became Governor of the State. He learned that a newspaper which Gaffey was managing during the campaign had not published any of the campaign literature which had been distributed to the interior press. Upon inquiry as to the reason he learned that Gaffey had devoted the columns of the paper to the interest of a candidate for Congress. Gaffey frankly explained that he thought there was not the slightest prospect of Budd's election. Hence the failure of Budd to give him recognition when the loaves were being distributed.

Cupid in Naval Uniform

Within a short time the United States battleship Philadelphia is expected to reach this port. Before the vessel arrives there will probably be an interesting engagement announced. The fiancee in the case is Miss Viola Kleineberg, daughter of Dr. C. Kleineberg, whose family belongs to the smart German-American set of this city. The fiance is Ensign Charles Huff of the Philadelphia, and a very gallant officer. Miss Kleineberg and Ensign Huff have been engaged for a year past, but no formal announcement has yet been made. Some of the Ensign's friends among the Army and Navy set will be surprised, perhaps, to learn of his betrothal as his name was more than once coupled with those of two society girls who expressed a preference for his company. Ensign Boyd of the same vessel is also said to have lost his heart to a San Francisco girl.

Rumor says the stork is hovering over the pretty flat of the Harleys. Mrs. Harley was Florence Deming, and her marriage was one of the events of last fall.

The Aftermath

There has been an aftermath of regrets to the Burlingame Horse Show. The friends of Mrs. Gus Taylor were dissatisfied with the award of first prize to Mrs. Laurance Scott. They declare that Mrs. Henry Scott rooted for her daughter-in-law with the aggressiveness that begets blue ribbons and silver cups. Neither Mrs. Taylor nor Mrs. Scott is in a hair-pulling mood over the decision, but their friends have organized rival anvil choruses. The friends of Mrs. Taylor declare that when she was driving Mrs. Joe Tobin's high-steppers she was a sight for old Kentucky. With her distinguished air she surely captured the eye of the onlookers if not the votes of the judges. By way of reflection on Mrs. Scott's slenderness it was stated that she carried rocks in her pockets to keep from blowing off the seat, but I think she drove with superb dash and spirit. Caro Crockett Scott has a genius for winning prizes. The experts declare she is not the best golf player in the swim, and yet she has carried off all the best trophies. The fact is, that she has the best nerve, and that is a quality which counts more than skill in contests. There are two women who lead her in practice games, but they go to pieces in a formal test. Mrs. Scott now refuses to play in the matches with those she has beaten.

The "Inseparables"

Now that Mary Scott Martin is home and Harry Scott is going to marry Pearl Landers, the "Inseparables" will probably be divided into two distinct coteries. Before the chiming of their wedding bells the Hopkins girls, Caro Crockett and Mary Scott were as intimate as sisters. They are still friends, but the old-time heart-to-heart chummyness has evaporated. It is said to have been affected by the report that one of the three carelessly remarked one day that it was Croesus and not Cupid who played one of the leading roles in the marriages of her bosom friends. Whatever the cause, the Inseparables are no longer invited. It will now be the Martin-Scott-Landers contingent, and the Hopkins-Taylor-McNear set.

When you ask for Jesse Moore Whiskey be sure you get it. Don't let anyone tell you they have something just as good.

SHEA, BOCQUERAZ & CO, Agts., S. F.

A Mistake in Brothers

It was Prescott, not Harry Scott, whose attentions to Miss Barber, the martyred President's niece, made the local matchmakers fidgety. Simmered down, those talked-of civilities would not make sauce for Cupid. Prescott Scott has a habit of rushing girls in a torrid fashion and then cooling off below zero. The fact of turning Her room into a bower of roses would not convict Prescott of serious intentions. Harry's marriage will probably take place after he is a happy uncle. Not coming on the heels of a President's visit the public will be saved the columns of print that were lavished on the Scott-Martin marriage. The Henry Scotts profess to abhor newspaper notoriety, and Mr. Scott delights in being rude to newspaper representatives except when he is looking for favors.

Harry Scott is scarcely known socially. When he was quite a little fellow he met with an accident on a railway train going East, and it was not thought that he would live. Since then he has not been especially robust. Pearl Landers has been visiting her mamma-in-law elect at Blingum for a fortnight. Mrs. Scott is said to look kindly on the union, and Mrs. Fred Tallant is delighted at her little sister's good fortune. As the social manager of the family she is happy at the pleasing ending of Pearl's first society year.

Young Johnston of Los Angeles

John Griffin Johnston, the fiance of Bernice Landers, is said to be a nice eligible fellow even if he hasn't a bank account. And perhaps he isn't so poor as reported. General Albert Sidney Johnston, his grandfather, was not absolutely impoverished when he died. He left his widow and children a piece of real estate that should have increased in value. When the family went to Los Angeles to live, it was well known that they owned valuable land in Texas. The old General had located on six hundred and forty acres of land near the head of the Brazos river. This land had on it a valuable coal mine. Mrs. Johnston had many opportunities to sell the land but she always refused, as she knew of the mine which, thirty-five years ago, was valued at one hundred thousand dollars.

Just a Little Friction

Writing of General Johnston I am reminded that the most blissful harmony does not prevail among the local Daughters of the Confederacy. Mrs. Van Wyck, who is a very ardent Southerner, intent upon keeping alive memories of the days befo' the wah, withdrew from the Albert Sidney Johnston chapter a short time ago and organized a chapter named in honor of that distinguished rebel, Jefferson Davis. Mrs. Van Dyck is a born leader and if she isn't permitted to rule the roost she won't play. So now she is the head and front of the Jefferson Davis chapter and the members thereof are priding themselves on its exclusiveness.

Now for Bernie and Sam

Now that Danforth Boardman is engaged the gossips are busy marrying off his brother, Sam, who is a great chum of Laurance Scott. He is one of the most desirable young men in society. I have been told that shortly after the June season his engagement with Miss Bernie Drown will be announced. Both are prominent socially, and the match will be regarded as eminently satisfactory all around. Mr. Boardman always expected Sam to make a big match and marry at least a million, but Mrs. Boardman preferred social advancement, though she is well hedged in socially. Miss Drown is interested in work at the Children's hospital and in church charities. She is tall, svelte, with high color and fine brown eyes and hair, and she dresses in perfect taste. Her father is a well-to-do, eminently respectable attorney, more renowned for his integrity than for his brilliancy. Sam Boardman is with Balfour, Guthrie & Co., and is regarded as one of the rising young men of that big firm.

Actor McAllister

I am not surprised that young Hall McAllister quit the bar for the stage. As a lawyer he was expected to live up to the reputation of his father, and that was more than he could do. He inherited many of the fine traits of character that distinguished his eminent parent, but the latter's genius was not the heritage of the son. Yet young Hall McAllister is by no means lacking in ability, and he may develop into a very fine actor. If he is able to play the gentleman on the stage with that same felicity which has always marked his deportment in real life he should be a great success in society drama. But there are many actors that do the gentlemanly stunt well on the stage, whose conduct off is a tribute to their mimetic ability.

His Social Pull

Cutler McAllister was referred to by the dailies as the first circuit judge in these parts. They no doubt meant Judge M. H. McAllister. His son Cutler was the clerk of the court. He was the uncle of the young actor. The latter's mother, by the way, was one of the trio of beautiful daughters of Sam Herman. She was a native of New Orleans. One of her daughters, Marion, was married to E. E. Wise, and later to Dr. Henry Wagner. Another daughter, Edith, is the wife of Congressman Frank Newlands. The present Mrs. Chauncey Depew is the daughter of Mrs. McAllister's sister, Alice, who married Henry Palmer of Paris. So it is evident that Hall McAllister has considerable social influence to give impetus to his rise in the theatrical profession.

A Royal Contretemps

The press despatches failed to mention an amusing contretemps of the ceremonies incidental to the "swearing in" of King Alfonso. The story comes to me from London, it having been told there by the Duke of Connaught, brother of King Edward, who attended the Spanish ceremonies as the representative of Great Britain. He was deputed by King Edward to invest Alfonso with the insignia of "the most noble Order of the Garter," and he did so. But after investing the stripling King with the collar, the ribbon, the star and the other decorations, he stooped to fasten the garter to the young sovereign's leg. To his amazement he found that Alfonso was in a cadet uniform with long trousers. The situation was embarrassing and the court officials stood aghast. The ceremony had to be interrupted while Alfonso retired hastily and substituted knee breeches after which the garter was adjusted. It is needless to predict that there will be no such contretemps at King Edward's coronation. There are many noblemen that are expecting the garter and they will go prepared. It is a curious fact that the proudest dignitaries of Europe are eager to be decorated with the insignia of an order which had its origin in an accident that befell a certain gay and unconventional woman. It was at a function at the court of Edward III when the Countess of Salisbury dropped an article of her attire which is not usually on exhibition. Some of the nobles winked significantly, whereupon the king picked up the garter and by way of rebuke to his nobles made the remark which is now the motto of the Order—Honi soit qui mal y pense.

Apropos of the Duke of Connaught's mission, it was perhaps somewhat strange that Edward should have thought of investing him with the insignia of the Garter order, for it is an ancient courtly theory that the Spanish monarch has no legs. I presume though that it applies only to the female members of the most jealously guarded of thrones.

Edward in the Altogether

My London correspondent has written to me the additional information that they are saying in the clubs that King Edward has decided to go to the Abbey to be crowned in an extremely light-weight costume. Edward abhors heat. Being extremely stout he perspires easily; and a perspiring fat King is not the most impressive spectacle in the world. He must wear a heavy robe and various trappings into the Abbey, but it is said that if the robe should fall off the King would cause a stampede. He has probably been thinking of the case of George IV who became fatigued from the heat during his coronation ceremony. During the sermon he retired into a private apartment. He remained away so long that several court officials went to look for him. They found his anointed Majesty fanning himself in the altogether, and he swore like a trooper because he had to don the heavy robes again.

To Publish His Lectures

H. Weinstock of Sacramento, whose lectures on "Jesus the Jew" attracted considerable attention some months ago, has put them into book form. The volume is on the presses of a New York publishing house and will appear some time this month. Mr. Weinstock discusses the relations of the Jews to the Gentile world. While writing from the standpoint of the Jew, he advocates the newer and more liberal views by which the middle wall of partition that has kept the Jew isolated from the rest of mankind may, he thinks, be removed. He prophesies that even Russia will soon cease from its anti-Semitic intolerance. He disapproves altogether of the Zionist movement.

"He must have a remarkable memory; he appears to know something about everybody."

"It isn't his memory that's remarkable. He's been through all the chairs in the Grand Lodge of the Order of Infamous Liars."

Miss Phelan's Innovation

An innovation in "feeds" was instituted by Miss Mollie Phelan at her tea last week. Instead of the usual light refreshments Miss Phelan provided a repast equal to the usual luncheon. I question whether the change was noted with pleasure by the smart dames among the guests. The afternoon tea has usually been considered among our society women as a cheap way of disposing of social obligations. Tea and chocolate, ices and cakes, with perhaps punch and sandwiches, are considered the proper menu among tea-givers. Last winter Mrs. Eleanor Martin introduced egg-nog and Charlotte Ellinwood and others of the reception givers followed suit. But Miss Phelan, whose tea marked her reappearance as an entertainer, belongs to the old style of hostess. She believes in giving her guests substantial fare. Therefore only a few of her old friends were invited to the function, but these were treated royally. Miss Phelan is the sister of our ex-Mayor and she is one of the richest heiresses in this part of the world. She recently spent a large part of her income in remodeling her old home in Valencia street.

At the Resorts

The contingent of pretty young girls at the Hotel Vendome this year is a large one. I should advise young men looking for buds with dots to spend the early summer in San Jose. But there are also dots and buds to be found in San Mateo. The Mateo is sheltering more guests this year than has been the case since the hotel was built.

"Mrs. Gayley is looking very much depressed."

Mrs. Bradbury in the Calcium's Glare Again

On dits in Los Angeles are to the effect that Mrs. John Bradbury intends to divorce her husband. Young John has fallen upon hard lines. Not being able to support his wife, she has been living with her mother for some time past. The gossips say it will be another McKeown affair, for John Bradbury calls on his wife and they seem to be fairly good friends. But she is packing her trunk preparatory to a trip to Paris with her mother. The latter is in funds once more, the Bannings being on financial velvet just now. If Mrs. Bradbury sues her husband for divorce she will be less kind to him than he was to her some years ago. When his wife ran away with the Englishman, Warde, John Bradbury forgave her everything. He took her back to his heart and home and during their subsequent sojourn in Mexico he treated her as well as if she had never left him.

Fathered By Billy Florence

It is a remarkable fact that comparatively few of the Mystic Shriners know anything about the origin of the order. Moreover, very few people are aware of the fact that it was introduced in America by Billy Florence, the actor, who was a great favorite in this city for many years. He was initiated into the order in Algiers, and he was received into the inner temple under the domain of the crescent. He collected a great deal of the Oriental history of the order and the manuscript of memorial ceremonials. He received authority to introduce the order in America. The order was instituted by a son-in-law of the prophet Mahommed at Mecca, as a Vigilance Committee to dispense justice and inflict punishment upon criminals who escaped justice through the tardiness of the courts. In the Orient it is more exclusive than in America, its membership being limited to the cultured classes. The ritual now in use is a translation from the original Arabic found in the archives of the Order at Aleppo, Syria.

Notable Incidents

One of the most hospitable of the local Shriners greeted his visiting brethren at the Ferry and handed out his business cards. He is in the restaurant business. The fraternal feeling is strong in some people. There were many amusing incidents of Shriners' week. One of them was supplied by Adam F. Gunn of the American Book company when he tried to ride in the night parade. He thought he could ride but his horse didn't agree with him, and after making an amusing spectacle of himself he discreetly dismounted and retired.

When Max Became Courageous

When last heard from Max Popper was talking to the redwoods in the Santa Cruz mountains, and the trees were drooping. Max still takes himself seriously. He fears that the Budd boom is growing so rapidly, despite the ex-Governor's protestations, that the next convention will insist on nominating him. Therefore Max has gone into the interior to harangue against Budd. If Max had a keen sense of humor he would enjoy himself hugely.

"When did Popper get out against you?" Budd was asked the other day.

"When I was Governor," was the reply. "Just as soon as he discovered that the Statute of Limitations had begun to run, and that there was no longer any fear of his being put to the necessity of invoking the pardoning power of the Executive he got out his hammer."

To Marry a Major

From an occasional correspondent I learn that Miss R. M. Isaacs, a foster sister of Father W. D. McKinnon, of this city, has arrived in Manila, and that she is there to become the bride of Major Fraser of the Medical Department of the army. She was accompanied to Manila by Father McKinnon, from Yokohama, whither he went to meet her. The newspapers of Manila have dubbed Father McKinnon "the Guardian Angel of the Boys in Blue."

In Cultured Chicago

The aesthetic pretensions of Chicago are attracting attention all over the world. The city famous for its greed, dirt and slaughter-houses is not content with the laurels of acknowledged supremacy. A few weeks ago it was gloating over a judicial decision that Samuel Eberly Gross, a real estate dealer, originated and is therefore the owner of the dramatic possibilities of "Cyrano de Bergerac," and the other day a Chicago jury decided that the purchaser of a "set of Balzac" need not pay for the books because the fiction of the great Frenchman is unfit for unrestricted reading in a respectable home. It appears that the book-agent represented that Balzac was "just the stuff for children." And it was in cultured Chicago that he found a man to believe him. Paris hasn't heard about the condemnation of Balzac, but it has discussed the case of Cyrano. According to the Journal des Debats, a copy of which I have received, Rostand has been convicted in Chicago of the crime of plagiarizing a nose, and it should be a warning to theatrical men who might be disposed to put upon the boards some personage with a prominent nose. "Americans," says the writer in the French paper, "have been reproached for not showing proper respect for literary rights, but evidently they have mended their ways, since they have extended literary property to the nose."

Back from Germany

Mrs. Lilly Layman has returned from Germany on a visit to her mother. She is accompanied by two of her children. Mrs. Layman was Miss Tompkins, a companion to the late Mrs. William Sharon, wife of the millionaire, before her marriage to Fred Oppenheim, who will be remembered as quite a society beau during the middle of the seventy decade. After her marriage they went to Hamburg to reside, and not fancying the name of Oppenheim her husband was induced to change his name to Layman. He died soon afterward and left his wife a comfortable income. She has many friends who will welcome her to her old home.

A Nasal Incident

The characters in up-to-date fiction accomplish some remarkable feats. I find this in a review by Mr. Carl Hovey in the Bookman:

"The gentleman of Craford melts like wax. He pressed her nose to his mouth, crushing it, breathing in its scent, trying to possess himself of the touch her mouth had left upon it."

The young woman who can touch her nose with her mouth is somewhat rare, and I cannot fancy her being prepossessing enough for the role of heroine in a popular novel. Neither can I admire the taste of the young man who imprints his kisses on such a nose as the one possessed by the heroine.

The Jaw-Fighters of Oakland

If blood were shed every time a man is called a liar and a thief in Oakland, it would soon be possible to float a ferryboat up Seventh street. But nobody ever thinks of resenting an insult in Oakland. Frank Moffitt gets mad once in a while and hits somebody, but having established a reputation for himself it is now difficult for him to provoke a row. He called Editor Daniels a thief the other day, and offered him five hundred dollars to institute libel proceedings so that he could get an opportunity to prove the charge, but Daniels was too foxy to get caught in that sort of a trap. Some years ago Warren English, who is one of the most ferocious men in Oakland, threatened to shed the blood of John P. Irish, but he was compelled to suffer a disappointment. He halted Irish in the street, and flourishing a cane menacingly demanded to know the journalist's authority for a statement that he had made. Irish agreed to reveal his authority if English would lower the cane. Warren complied, and Irish said that his authority was the late Creed Haymond.

"Damn you," said English, "you have to go to the grave for your authority," and there the incident ended. The "Ole Bills" have been camping on Irish's trail for years, but whenever Irish looks over his shoulder they all rush to cover.

The Debutante Didn't Debut

San Francisco girls are so uniformly successful in the theatrical profession that it is to be regretted that one of them who recently contemplated making her debut lacked the courage to achieve her ambition. I refer to one of the stunning Hadenfeldt sisters, who was on the point of becoming a member of the Neill company. As the tale comes to me she made preparations for her debut, rehearsed with the company, had some smart gowns made, and then changed her mind. Mr. Neill was no doubt greatly disappointed, for Miss Hadenfeldt would have been a great card. She is a beautiful girl with a figure for a sculptor's model, and I hear that in rehearsal she showed considerable talent.

A Professional Proxy

This is surely an unconventional era. The rules of etiquette have curiously relaxed of late, but in a way that should command the approval of sensible people. Many of the iron-clad rules of etiquette are in the nature of an affectation, and should therefore be abolished. Society has cringed to no more absurd rule than that which prescribes the dinner-call, and I am pleased to predict its early abolition, for it is now being perfunctorily obeyed in a way that renders it ridiculous. The dinner-call implies that the caller wishes to acknowledge an obligation, but surely no host or hostess feels that a guest owes something for the grub that was supplied. It is a queer hospitality that imposes an obligation. The modern dame should rejoice at the prospect of being released from the wearisome round of calls which, unless entirely oblivious to social prestige, she has been obliged to go through each season with unwavering regularity. Not only a dinner but every grand function demanded by a strict social law, like unto that of the Medes and Persians, a prompt personal call on the hostess. In England, a correspondent informs me, the professional proxy has stepped in to relieve the smart matron of her duties as a caller. The professional proxy is the beginning of the end. The professional proxy goes the round of Lady de Smith's friends and deposits milady's cards at each house. In this country many people have made it a practice to send the footman to the door with the cards, but the professional proxy is a new institution and will undoubtedly bring the obnoxious social rule into ridicule and disrepute.

As to the Bachelor

Of course the modern young man cannot successfully plead the same excuse as the overworked twentieth century matron for his negligence as a caller. But as it has no doubt occurred to him at times that his presence at a function is nothing short of a boon to the hostess who secured his presence, it is rather disagreeable to feel that his acceptance of her hospitality entails the obligation of a formal call. The lapses of the modern bachelor in the matter of the duty call is evidence of his freedom from conventionality, but it is usually attributed to his decadence and lack of good manners. Yet if hostesses knew that by abolishing the rule requiring the call they could more easily entice bachelors to their functions they would gladly wipe it out.

Syle's Job in Jeopardy

Poor Professor Syle! Two weeks ago he awoke to find himself damned by the critics, and now he finds that to hold his job at Berkeley he must exert his Chiv. pull to its fullest extent. When DuPont Syle was a mere professor of literature at Berkeley he drew his salary in peace and nobody bothered about him. True, it was understood that he was retained in the faculty out of respect to George Washington being, as he is, a decendant of a remote relative of the Father of his Country, but he might have prospered in obscurity indefinitely were it not for his o'erleaping ambition. He wished to achieve fame as a dramatic critic, and he found it so easy to roast plays and players for a daily newspaper, that he concluded that it was his duty as a pedagogue to instruct. He proceeded to point the way, and he essayed an adaptation from the French. It was a failure, and now President Wheeler thinks that he should hunt for another job. A man incapable of writing a successful play is, according to Professor Wheeler, incompetent as a teacher of literature in Berkeley.

San Jose Startled

Somnolent San Jose was awakened the other day by a sensational street episode, in which two prominent women figured. It was the sort of an affair that sharpens the edge of curiosity and gives impetus to the tongue of gossip. It was a busy afternoon in First street when two well-dressed women met, glared at each other and then entered upon the favorite feminine mode of warfare. They gave a most exciting hair-pulling exhibition, and by the time Dr. Gus Bennett, a young dentist, interfered in the interest of the peace and dignity of the polite and conservative community, both ladies presented a somewhat disheveled appearance. One of the combatants is a resident of Los Gatos, where she enjoys considerable social prestige. Her husband is a man of prominence. The other is also married. Her husband is a prominent dry goods man of San Jose. The gossips say that it was a case of jealousy. The San Jose lady is spending a little time out of town now, but Madame of Los Gatos struts the streets as though she were quite proud of her achievement.

John Markham, who made a million out of sugar and ice in Honolulu, is rusticating in San Jose. He received a letter last week informing him that Mr. Cunha, principal owner of the Moana hotel at Waikiki, had been stricken with paralysis and was not expected to recover. Cunha has a large fortune. His eldest son graduated from Stanford last year.

Drawing the Line

Apropos of the coachman episode related last week, I recall the sequel of Mary Scott Castle's attempt to reform San Jose society. When Mrs. Salisbury's niece was a bride a new club was being formed in the garden city. At one of the meetings she proposed that all shopkeepers be barred out from the club, and only ladies and gentlemen be permitted to join. The "shopkeepers" were furious, and their wives and daughters begged them to refuse to give Neville Castle any legal practice. The result was that Mrs. Castle was obliged to entertain thereafter on borrowed money and borrowed furniture. At which one man remarked: "Well, I don't mind, so long as they invite me to their dinners, which are very good. But if they borrowed my money and did not invite me, I should draw the line."

Mary Ann's Reply

A member of "The Family" is responsible for this story. He went home at a rather unusual hour of the day last week, and as his wife was not there he said to Mary Ann, the family servant:

"Can you tell me of my wife's whereabouts?"

Mary Ann appeared to be somewhat embarrassed, but after a few moments' hesitation she replied:

"Faith, to tell ye the truth, I really believe they are in the wash."

He Knew Mme. Humbert

Charles Fittock, who was in the British consular service in Paris some years ago, and who is now in this city, tells some interesting stories about the Mme. Humbert who was the head and front of the greatest fraud of the century which was recently brought to light in Paris, and who is now a fugitive from justice. The dailies told about the exposure of the fraud the other day, but the remarkable story of the wonderful career of Mme. Humbert in Paris was but briefly sketched, and contained scarcely any of the glittering details. None but a Frenchwoman could have accomplished half that Mme. Humbert is credited with, and yet the heroine of the strange and almost incredible story is a woman entirely devoid of physical attractions. She is old, unattractive and vulgar, but she became a leader of the fashion and luxury of Paris, and she succeeded in perpetrating the most gigantic swindle of the century, in deceiving and robbing the most cunning and cautious financiers and money-lenders, in toying with the most astute lawyers and statesmen, and in maintaining her lofty social sition for a quarter of a century with nothing but fraud to sustain her.

Her Romantic Story

The story with which Mme. Humbert regaled her victims before fleecing them was a romantic one, and appealed to the vivid French imagination. She told them that she nursed a dying American multi-millionaire, and that out of gratitude he bequeathed her all his property which yielded her an annual income of three hundred thousand dollars a year, until one day his two nephews turned up with another will purporting to be of the same date as the one which she had filed. According to this will he left her only one-third, and divided the remainder between his nephews. But they were rich men, too, and didn't care so much for the money. One of them wanted to marry Madame Humbert's younger sister, and they entered into a formal agreement to put all the deeds and securities into a safe which should be locked and sealed until the girl attained her majority, when the heirs mentioned in both wills should come together and enter upon an amicable settlement. Thus was started the legend of the mysterious safe. The wills were filed, and so was the written agreement, and with those spurious documents and an empty but sealed safe Mme. Humbert started on the longest and most gigantic fraud of the age.

The Tragic Consequences

That safe was supposed to contain many millions of dollars' worth of securities, and it stood sponsor for I O U's by the thousands that the clever swindler distributed over Paris. It enabled her to hold a box at the opera for which she paid five thousand dollars a year. According to Fittock she could always be seen in the box on a great night. She bought valuable real estate with I O U's and sold for cash. Her credit was scrutinized, and the court records and the safe with its fortune in securities swept away doubt. She went down the Rue de la Paix, the street wherein are the stores of the great jewelers and fashionable dressmakers, and she bought most expensive goods. The list of her creditors shows that she swindled Parisians out of more than ten millions of dollars. And her frauds were responsible for many tragedies, for several of her victims finding themselves reduced to beggary through their mad confidence in this woman, blew out their brains. Yet this accomplished confidence operator, the Queen of Crooks, was a poor milliner's daughter with scarcely any education and barren of all the evidences of refinement.

Not the Hardware Business

The officers of the Pacific Coast Hardware and Metal Association disclaim having received a bill from Alexander Hamilton for the cost of entertaining John W. Gates, the steel-wire magnate. The story came to me from what I regarded as an authoritative source. But the information given me was somewhat inaccurate. It was not the Pacific Coast Hardware and Metal Association that delegated Mr. Hamilton to entertain Mr. Gates. Consequently Mr. Hamilton did not present a bill to that association. I have also been told that it was not forty-eight hundred dollars that Mr. Hamilton spent, though he was a royal host.

"I hear that Tom has overdrawn his bank account."
"Well, you heard something untrue."
"I'm glad to hear that, for I like Tom."
"It was his wife's bank account that he overdrew."

A Prospective Frost

One doesn't hear much these days about the Jeffries-Fitzsimmons fight, except occasional scraps of speculation as to whether Jeffreys is "going out" or merely lose on a foul. It actually appears as though a long-suffering public had been duped once too often. Even the dailies appear to have given up hope of arousing public interest, for the sporting editors have been repressed. The fight promoters will soon begin estimating the amount of their probable loss for there does not appear to be any likelihood of their paying expenses. Whatever the arrangements between the big bruisers may be, there should not be the slightest doubt of Fitzsimmons' inability to whip the young Californian giant. Jeffries is undoubtedly the champion of his day, and while he fills the role of champion there cannot be much sentimental interest in the brutal sport, for he is incapable of winning that morbid admiration which is usually vouchsafed the hero of the prize-ring. He is merely a freak whose bulk safeguards him against defeat. He has never had to exhibit courage or powers of endurance. What little skill he possesses is exercised only for defensive purposes.

Mrs. Weller a McMullin

My attention has been drawn to the fact that in mentioning the four daughters of Mrs. John McMullin I omitted reference to a fifth, the fourth in point of age. This is "Bettie," the wife of Attorney Charles Locke Weller. Mrs. Weller is more like her mother than are any of her sisters, but she is less known than they because she has never cared much for society. Mrs. Weller has traveled quite extensively, and if she has any hobby it is a love of art, which she shares with her husband. Their home in Leavenworth street contains many valuable souvenirs of travels abroad. The Wellers own a summer home in the mountains, on the McCloud river.

A Retired Political Magnate

Until Chris Buckley began investing heavily in real estate a few weeks ago few people had ever made an approximate estimate of the extent of his wealth. The defunct blind boss realized about two hundred thousand dollars from the sale of his street railroad stock and he invested it nearly all in business realty. Buckley is possessed of considerably over a quarter of a million dollars' worth of property. Nearly all that wealth came to him when he was acting as the "attorney" for people who were doing business with the city government in the days when he was recognized as the ruler of the Democratic machine. A little over fifteen years ago Chris Buckley was a saloon-keeper, and at the same time he was in the heyday of his career as a boss. When a corporation wanted a franchise Buckley was retained as "attorney" for the company, and he always charged a big fee. He had no license to practice in the courts such as the bosses of the present day possess, but he did just as effective work for his clients. He would probably be doing business yet, at the old stand, if a grand jury hadn't forced him to leave town.

Bosses in Court

While on the subject of a boss in the role of an attorney, I am reminded of the fact that in the Board of Health case before Judge Cook there is an attorney on each side who is also a boss. I refer to Gavin McNab, who is associated with Mr. McEnerney for the old Board, and Mr. Ruef, who is the attorney for the Mayor. Mr. McNab's objection to Judge Cook as the trial judge was based on the ground that the judge is going to seek renomination this Fall at the hands of a convention which may possibly be dominated by Mr. Ruef. Nobody is better able to testify to the weight of advantage which an attorney is likely to have under such circumstances than the same Gavin McNab. He has controlled a convention or two in his time, and like Mr. Ruef he has been employed in cases by people who were wise enough to appreciate the weight of that influence. Indeed I strongly suspect that the members of the Board of Health were not unmindful of the importance of Mr. McNab's prestige as a boss when they hired him. With his prestige and McEnerney's knowledge of the law they were well fortified until they ran up against Cook with the presumption of his appreciation of Mr. Ruef's pres[illegible]

Law and Politics

After encountering such a snag Mr. McNab was eager to go before some disinterested judge, but as Mr. McEnerney remarked, it is pretty tough if litigants are to be deprived of a square deal unless they can get their cases tried before some judge who isn't out for renomination. Mr. McEnerney is an optimistic lawyer with lots of confidence in the integrity of the Bench, but he is not entirely unaware of the fact that there are judges who, while trying cases on the law and the facts sprinkle those factors with a little of the salt of politics. And it is evident that he believes Cook to be one of them.

The Rumor Quashed

I am authorized by a correspondent from Honolulu to deny positively the report of a disagreement in the menage of the Harry Macfarlanes. They were present at a dinner given not long ago by Archie Young in honor of his fiancee, Miss Gillette, and they appeared to be the most congenial couple there. The sight of their bliss, it was suggested by one of those present, was enough to send every bachelor in the company a-wooing. "And," added another, of the guests, "give nerve to our host when his wedding day arrives."

Heroic Quesada

Gonzales de Quesada, the Cuban Minister at Washington, is well known in this city. He is an interesting character. He spent several months in this city as the attorney for Antonio Ezeta, ex-President of San Salvador, who was on trial in the Federal court. His Government was anxious to obtain his head, but he was not delivered over to his people, owing to the efforts of Mr. Quesada. He borrowed ten thousand dollars from Marion Wells, the sculptor, a year or so later, and went on a filibustering expedition which ended in his death. Mr. Quesada will no doubt add to the gaiety of social life in Washington. When here he posed as a single man, though he had a wife and baby in New York. He told the young girls he met in society here that a big revolution was to be pulled off in Cuba and that he believed he would be the first man killed. They begged him not to be too reckless. When the revolution took place Quesada was in New York, and he staid there.

Too Many Queer People

I heard a society bud declare the other day that the Army was no longer what it was "cracked up to be" in a social way. "Army officers," she added, "are a discount since the Spanish war. Sons of politicians now wear the stripes, and there are all sorts of queer people in the army." She attributes the failure of Dr. Collins, U. S. A., to win a rich bride while here to the decadence of the army socially. Dr. Collins sought debutantes with a dot religiously. The Navy has not lost prestige.

Gossip of the Frohman Co.

Walter Allen, of the Miller-Anglin combination, who is so refreshingly obtrusive as the prompter of the Pantheon theatre, was one of the leading comic opera comedians of the country some years ago. He was stage manager and comedian with the Emma Abbott company for a long time. He comes from a theatrical family. Lilian Thurgate is the wife of E. Y. Backus, who plays the butler. Mr. Backus is the stage manager of the company. Mrs. Backus was once upon a time a ballet-dancer in London. The part of Sarah in "Trelawney," played by Grace Elliston, was done in the original American production by Blanche Keller, a Californian girl who, by the way, is a niece of Miss Whiffen. She scored a hit in the part which in the hands of Grace Elliston falls somewhat flat. Margaret Dale, who will appear later on, occupied a loge Monday night at the Columbia.

Cards were received last Saturday, by the friends here of the bride and bridegroom, announcing the marriage of Mrs. Charles Tudor Wing's daughter, Lilian, and Mr. Lawrence York Spear, Naval Constructor, U. Miss Jean Seymour Klink, who has gone to Chicago to take a course in sociology at the university, is one of the most ambitious teachers in the San Francisco public school department. She graduated from the Berkeley university last year, having decided that she was not too old to keep on learning, after several years of teaching in our department. Miss Klink is a sister of George Klink of the Southern Pacific company. Some years ago there was a rumor of her engagement to Dr. Dresbach Smith but it proved to be empty gossip. She belongs to the Mills College alumnae. Miss Klink is an authority on palmistry, though she does not read talms professionally. Her study of Durrant's palm was pronounced remarkable by experts in hand deciphering.

latter days. All over the world one may hear the sing-song of the racquet and ball and the stridulous sound of the tables, to say naught of "love-15" in a dozen tongues. Ping-pong is played in palace, cabin, saloon and tent. Aboard ship it has as many devotees proportionately as ashore. Even the Chinese have succumbed, and in the local Chinatown many champions have arisen who could give three in a set to the average American. The leading hospitals have tables for convalescents; the police stations echo with the shout of the ponger, and now the morgue has gone ping-pong mad. The Coroner challenges the Police Judges, the Deputy Coroners spend all their spare time, bat in hand, and the clang of the dead wagon's gong is the signal for forsaking the strenuous activities of the reigning favorite.

The coronial game is not played on the slabs in the charnal-house, as has been hinted, but on the jury table in the inquest room. One may hear between the count of the game the inquiries of the reporters and undertakers who haunt the morgue:

"Do the cops think it murder or suicide?"
"Deuce!"
"Has the body been brought in?"
"My vantage!"
"What undertaker gets the corpse?"
"You've got me skinned. Set apiece."

Doesn't Read Her Mother

Mrs. Albert Russell appreciates, no doubt, the distinction of being the daughter of such a brilliant woman as Mrs. Gertrude Atherton, but her appreciation is not so keen as it would be were she familiar with her mother's books. She was asked recently what she thought of "The Conqueror."

Hotaling a Preacher

They are saying at the Bohemian Club that Dick Hotaling is seriously thinking of deserting the liquor business, forswearing feminine stunts forever, and taking to the pulpit. Hotaling is the last man in the world to be suspected of harboring designs on the ministry. He has always looked well in skirts when doing his clever female impersonating act, and now his friends say that he thinks that clerical robes would be becoming. According to Bohemian Club gossip Hotaling was seized with religious fervor when he saw a sermon which he recently delivered, in an Eastern paper. The sermon was delivered in a little chapel in Yosemite Valley, whither Hotaling went for an outing a short time ago with Charley Dickman, W. B. Hopkins and several other merry Bohemians. The pulpit in the chapel was vacant and Hotaling was asked to preach. He did so and it is said that his discourse was a most impressive one. Somebody took it down in short-hand and sent it East for publication. And now there is a possibility of Dick Hotaling becoming a revivalist.

Clunie's Retreat

Since the trip of the merry Bohemians to the Yosemite, a new point of interest has been located. It is called "Clunie's Retreat on Wilson's Ridge." Stage drivers now point it out to tourists, and when there are no ladies present they tell the story of how it came to be named after General Tom Clunie, who was a member of the party of Bohemians. The General has had the misfortune to get himself into some very embarrassing positions, but the plight in which he found himself on Wilson's Ridge when he beat his now famous retreat right into the glare of the calcium was a sorry one.

To Andrew Carnegie

I'm informed that you're afraid,
To explore Death's gloomy glade
'Til you've restitution made
Of the pelf
You extracted from the toil
Of the men who sweat and broil,
Keeping nearly all the spoil
For yourself.

You imported hordes of Huns,
And with clubs and gatling guns
Drove our working native sons
From your mills;
While the Congressmen you paid,
On the armor-plate you made
A protective tariff laid
In their bills.

You find balm in the belief
That the most colossal thief
May repent and get relief
For his soul;
But the law of God declares
Eere he climbs the golden stairs
He must pay the rightful heirs
All he stole.

Now the men who earned your gold,
Rapidly are growing old—
Weak from hunger and from cold,
They can't work.
With old age fast creeping on,
With their loved ones starved and gone,
They are waiting for the dawn
At the kirk.

While they beg their daily bread,
With no place to lay their head,
And no hope 'til they are dead,
'Neath the mould,
You are splurging with their means
'Mid attractive foreign scenes,
And you'll buy the Philippines—
If they're sold.

You are building everywhere
Homes for books and pictures rare,
While these men die of despair;
And I'm told
That you hope to write your name
On the world's great roll of fame,
And expect to gild the same
With their gold.

Now, I have a better scheme—
It's no poet's idle dream,
And it would your soul redeem
At the last:
Give your millions to the ones
Whom you drove out for the Huns
At the muzzle of your guns
In the past.

If you'll take my scheme in hand,
Every one in this broad land
Will declare your project grand
And sublime.
Peace of mind you'll then secure;
God will bless you, I am sure,
And your fame it will endure,
For all time.

The Song of the Statue

When Barnaby Jones was a baby,
He stared with his big round eyes,
His sisters and aunties caressed him,
That always silenced his cries.

Chorus:

For oh! he was fond of the ladies,
A glance from one made him her slave,
For only a glance from a lady,
He'd love her from cradle to grave.

When Barnaby Jones was a school-boy,
He never looked at his books,
All day he stared at the maidens,
Who'd throw him smiles for his looks.

When Barnaby Jones left the school-room,
A clerk he became in a shop,
And as he measured off ribbons,
He studied new ways how to "pop."

But Barnaby tired of clerking,
He tired of all kinds of work.
He spent all his time now in flirting,
His loves were like those of a Turk.

To keep Barnaby dressed in fine linen,
Took money, which he could not get.
His mother then took in fine washing,
For Barnaby still was her pet.

Now Barnaby loafs on the corners,
Of all the most frequented streets,
And all that he does to pass away time,
Is to bow to the girls that he meets.

Chorus:

For oh! he is fond of the ladies,
A "masher" he calls himself now.
He thinks he is perfectly killing,
As he takes off his hat for a bow.

—The Boulevardier.

Reflections

We are all foolish, but others are more so.

No woman tells the truth about her husband—she knows him too well.

One temptation resisted is worth more than many virtues.

Woman desires admiration; man approbation.

Curiosity causes more evil than passion.

That which we hope to get we prize the most.

The other side of the road always seems better.

"Virtue" is a matter of temperament.

One may be innocent without being virtuous and virtuous without being innocent.

Sex attraction is too often mistaken for love.

Self-deception is the basis of life.

A Plain, Unvarnished Tale

When Harry Vanstone married May Robinson his people did not like the match. They were newrich, were the Vanstones, and they thought that their sons and daughters should wed blood or at least equal wealth. May Robinson had neither. Her parents were of the "poor and respectable" class. She was pretty and charming and Harry, who lacked the snobbish characteristics of the other members of his family, believed in following the instincts of his heart. Therefore, he married May and was thenceforth ostracized by the Vanstones.

He went to live on a ranch which was all his possession, and for a few years he was as happy as any man can be in this world. His wife bore him a son and the boy was for a time idolized by the father as well as the mother. But Harry was a weak man. His ranch did not pay. He brooded over his family's harshness and, as weak natures so often do, drowned his megrims in drink. From drink he went to dope, and his final ruin was foreshadowed.

On the neighboring ranch lived a young man who was Harry Vanstone's friend. His friendship for Harry was extended to Harry's wife, and from friendship a great admiration for the poor little woman readily ripened. When admiration is joined to sympathy for a pretty woman afflicted with an intemperate and unfortunate husband results are readily forecast. Len Dixon was always at the Vanstone ranch when the Vanstones were not visiting him. By and by the neighbors began to talk. They talked more diligently when, during Len Dixon's various drives to the county town, they noticed he was accompanied by Mrs. Vanstone. Sometimes little Harry went along, too, but oftener Dixon and Mrs. Vanstone were by themselves.

Of course the gossips could not know that it was Harry Vanstone himself who insisted on his wife's accompanying his friend. They could not know that he, in his opium-crazed mind, had conceived the frightful idea of so compromising his wife and his friend that only one course would remain to him.

But so it was. The Vanstones, when they heard of "poor Harry's wife's awful actions," urged their relative to sue for a divorce. Degraded as the young man was he would not do this for a long time. But, egged on by his sisters and brother, confronted with the loss of his ranch and financial ruin, he finally agreed to their demands. He brought suit for divorce and named his friend, Len Dixon, as co-respondent.

It was a terrible blow to the young wife. She had stuck by her husband through thick and thin, had worked like a slave for him, had insisted on his native goodness of heart when others had begged her to leave him—and it was he who turned against her.

She made no response to his charges. Her heart was broken. The wealth and influence of her husband's parents were tremendous and she knew it would be vain to oppose them. They had fortified the husband's case with perjured testimony. But she never thought that they would rob her of her child. They had intimated that if she would not contest the case, they would permit her to take the boy, but that if she opposed the suit they would separate her from the child. She decided that it was better to be branded as a shameless woman than to take chances involving her offspring.

When it was too late she discovered that she had been horribly duped.

The custody of the child was awarded to the father.

The modest home of the Robinsons is within the shadow of the Vanstones' mansion.

From the rear of the Robinsons' home may be seen the spacious lawn of the Vanstones'. Almost every afternoon a sad-faced woman may be seen standing on a porch in the rear of a house in Haight street. Her tear-dimmed eyes are intent upon the lawn across the street that forms right angles with Haight. She watches the gambolings of a little boy upon the lawn. There is no other pleasure for her in life. The little boy is the son of Harry Vanstone. The woman is the child's mother. —The Tragedian.

Southern Pacific Statement

Commenting on the report of the Southern Pacific Company for the period of July 1, 1901, to March 31, 1902, I said last week that there was a prophesy of better things to come in the great betterments being made by President Harriman. I now have the statement of the company for April. It contains significant items and indicates the policy of the company in charging heavy amounts each month to betterments. The gross earnings show a decrease of $26,674, compared with a net gain in March of $82,-431. This is the first loss in many months. Of equal importance is the deficit of $885,916, due in part to heavy betterment charges. The gross earnings in April were $6,810,180, decrease $26,674; operating expenses and taxes $4,923,513, increase $420,695; net earnings $1,886,667, decrease $447,329; other income $105,565; total income $1,992,233; fixed charges and betterments$2,878,150; deficit $885,916.

Despite the deficit and decrease, I have confidence in the earning capacity of the Southern Pacific under the present management. Certainly Harriman believes in the road's future to an unlimited extent, for in the past few days he and his associates have increased their holdings to more than $90,000,000. Harriman represents the Union Pacific Railroad Company. This company bought the Speyer and Huntington Southern Pacific holdings for about $75,000,000. These additional buyings are inspired by Harriman's confidence in his management and by the desire to get an absolutely secure hold on the Central and Southern Pacific. Payment for the recently acquired $15,000,000 of stock is supposed to have been made by the issue of additional 4 per cent convertible bonds of the Union Pacific, completing the authorized issue of $100,000 of these bonds. The aggregate amount of Southern Pacific stock outstanding is now over $197,000,000. I believe it has a bright future.

Dillingham Likes McBryde

Two million dollars in bonds will be issued by the McBryde Sugar Plantation. Of this amount $1,250,000 will be offered for sale to the investing public. Most of this amount will probably be taken by bankers and capitalists. McBryde is one of the newer plantations of Hawaii, and is now on a firm footing. The report of the treasurer made in Honolulu a few days ago showed that there had been expended on the property $3,473,446, of which $2,200,000 had gone to permanent improvements. All the old bonds and every indebtedness of the company will be retired by the new issue. The plantation will be producing 15,000 tons of sugar a year by next January. The bonds will bear interest not to exceed 6 per cent, payable semi-annually, net above all deductions and taxes. B. F. Dillingham, the leading financier of Hawaii, who is heavily interested in McBryde, says. The bonds represent but forty per cent of the value of the plantation and should find ready takers. Dillingham said the future of Hawaiian sugar was absolutely secure, no matter what action was taken by Congress relative to Cuban sugar.

General Hawaiian Stocks

My Honolulu correspondent writes me: There is a belief that there will be a better feeling in the market very soon, when the economies which are promised by the introduction of fuel oil are apparent. The reports now are that the bringing into use of this fuel by the leading estates will be expedited, and there are being made preparations for the universal use of the fuel, once it becomes certain that there will be a constant supply at rates which are low enough to guarantee the shaving of the price now paid for coal. The expression of Mr. W. G. Irwin that the saving will amount to practically one-half the price of the present fuel, has caused some inquiry for the shares of the plantations which are to put the liquid into their mills and pumps, and there is considerable strength in the demands for shares.

It is felt by some of the brokers that not for long will there be offerings of this stock at the present rate. Before leaving, B. F. Dillingham said that only his engagements in other directions prevented his absorbing all the stock offered, and he hoped to be able to get more of it at the rates prevailing. His faith in it, he said, was unbounded. McBryde went off a half to $6, and two hundred shares were placed at that price. The stock is not in the market in large blocks, but is rather closely held. An offering of 20 shares of Kihei developed that the stock was held at the usual rate and the price realized was that of the last previous sale, $10.50. Ewa still holds its own and the sixty shares offered in two blocks found ready purchasers at the standing rate of $24. The prospects of early use of oil and the reports of the good condition of the cane and the excellent state of the labor market have helped to keep the nerves of the holders of the stock steady.

United Railroads

My New York correspondent writes me as follows: As the time for the securities of the United Railroads of San Francisco approaches, quotations on them on the Curb market have risen sharply. Just how much of the preferred and common stock and bonds are on the market is known only to the inside interests. the shorts are hoping that the syndicate will continue to unload blocks of stock for some time to come, while the bull faction argues that the real value of the securities has not been reached. The bonds were sold to the syndicate at 92. The total mortgage indebtedness of the lines is $13,091,000.

Sales on the Oil Exchange during the week have been few in number and dullness has ruled the market. Petroleum Center has generally led in point of demand but with the liberal offerings of the stock and the announcement of the levying of a 5c assessment the selling price dropped to 2c a share. Sterling still claimed some attention and commanded from $1.52 to $3.35. The weakness in this stock is attributed in a great measure to a suit filed in the Superior Court at Fresno, assailing the title of the Home Company to the land. So far as the financial standing of the corporation is concerned there is no ground for uneasiness, as there is money enough on hand to provide for dividends for some time. Peerless, it is claimed, will pay a dividend of 6c a share on July 1st, and will on August 1st pay dividend Number 4, of 6c per share, an increase of 1c per share on that paid June 1st. The company has finished well number eight at 1,132 feet, and produces 300 barrels a day. A new well about 200 feet from number one is to be called number four. The financial showing of the company is claimed to be most satisfactory. The Southern Pacific Company is reported to have purchased a tract of 40 acres near the terminus of the Sunset Railroad, which will be developed for fuel purposes. During May the Kern River Oil field shipped 3,500 cars of oil, or 16 per cent more than for any preceding month in the history of the field. From the McKittrick Oil district 15 cars of oil are being shipped daily.

The June number of the Pacific States Investor, being the third monthly issue of this successful paper, is just out, and consists of forty pages. It is full of information for investors and all desiring pointers on mining, oil and other speculative propositions. Although special attention is given to propositions and new enterprises on the Pacific Coast the Pacific States Investor covers the national field and has articles of great interest on Mexico and Central America, with up-to-date reports from American investors, mining firms and corporations which have embarked in the southern field. The industrial future of the great northwest and the shipbuilding interests of Tacoma come in for special mention.

—The Financier

Annie Meyers has been suffering from throat trouble for several weeks. As a consequence she has had to cut out some of her songs. Nevertheless "The Toy Maker" has been doing quite well. It is a rollicking performance, and Hartman instils considerable vim into it. But I wish he would eliminate some of those stock jokes out of his topical songs. The versesmith of the Tivoli appears to be suffering from brain fag. I hear that Miss Alice Coleman of the Tivoli chorus is to do the prima donna role in the next production which will precede the road trip of the light opera company. Miss Coleman is said to possess a very sweet voice. She is a sister of Lillian Coleman who was at Fischer's a short time ago..

There would have been a very dull summer for the magazines were it not for the volcanic eruption in Martinique and St. Vincent. They have all had "special commissioners on the spot" and those special commissioners have done a lot of fine writing for the July magazines. They are wonderfully enterprising, are our magazine publishers. Their special commissioners are newspaper reporters who rehash for the monthlies matter that has already been published in the dailies, and our cultured American magazine readers flatter themselves that their preference for the rehash is evidence of literary taste.

The production of "Romeo and Juliet" at the Grand next week will be a noteworthy one. Maude Fealy is said to have made one of her greatest successes as Juliet. It will be the first appearance of Edward J. Morgan as Romeo. Herschel Mayall will be Mercutio; Gardner Crane, Tybalt; Fred Butler, Friar Laurence; Margaret Terry, the nurse. There will be no advance in prices for the production.

Eleanor Falk, who comes to the Orpheum next week, brings with her ten pretty girls who sing and dance and change their costumes. Their act is called "The Sunny South" and it ran for sixteen weeks at Hammerstein's Paradise Gardens. Jehan Bedini, a star juggler, created a sensation in the East by catching a turnip, dropped from a three hundred feet high building, on a fork held between his teeth.

Owing to the enormous demand for seats for "Zaza" at the Alcazar, Miss Roberts has consented to give a special matinee next Thursday.

"The Toy Maker," which is still drawing large crowds at the Tivoli, will be followed by "The Idol's Eye" in the course of a few weeks.

STAGE

Schmitz, Miller and Anglin

The occasion was in reality the auspicious opening of Henry Miller and Margaret Anglin as co-stars, but it might have been mistaken for a levee of our distinguished musical Mayor. The actors held the centre when the curtain was up but at other times Mr. Schmitz bared his bosom to the calcium's warm glow. It was a great night for Mayor Schmitz and incidentally for the members of Mr. Frohman's superb company of players. Mr. Schmitz, the workingman's friend, sat in a stage-box of his own just as though he were an ordinary plutocrat, and the going down of the curtain was invariably the cue for the going up of our handsome Mayor. In his immaculate shirt-front and low-cut whiskers he looked like some distinguished Zulu King in cog doing the boxes. He did them well—just like some society butterfly condescendingly swapping small talk with the buds. The Mayor glad-handed his way through the boxes, making a vote at every turn , while the ladies in the pit ogled him fondly and hoped the band would strike up the "Yankee Hustler." Our charming Mayor divided attention if not the honors with Mr. Miller and Miss Anglin. He is as conspicuous in an audience as was the late Judge Campbell. "Trelawny of the Wells" is a charming little play, replete with character studies, shy on plot and not half so affecting as were Mr. Miller and Miss Anglin when, after responding to repeated curtain-calls, one wiped the tears from her eyes while the other choked himself with those in his voice. It was the most realistic bit of acting in the whole performance. In the play Mr. Miller does nothing but emphasize his modesty by skilful repression of the Miller personality. If you didn't know he was the star you would conclude that he was perhaps the smallest salaried actor in the company. Fortunately he explained in his curtain-speech that he introduced his company in "Trelawny of the Wells" just to show its strength. He might just as well have said, "You all know me; you know I'm a great actor, but there are others you do not know so well. I'm exhibiting them tonight." And indeed, they were exhibited to good advantage. Of course we are all familiar with the capabilities of Margaret Anglin. As Rose Trelawney she increases our admiration. Charles Walcot and his wife are also well known to us, and each new character in which you see them serves to heighten your respect for their talents. The character of Sir William Gower as impersonated by Mr. Walcot is exquisitely shaded. There is no actor on the American stage who could give us such a William Gower as that of Charles Walcot. Mr. Walcot possesses that rare knack for sinking his own identity which enables him to make each of his creations separate and distinct. William Courtleigh does a splendid piece of character work as the bad actor. There is nothing more artistic in the whole performance. Ethel Hornick is less effective as Imogen Parrott than was Hilda Spong in the same part, and Lillian Thurgate fails to make Avonia Bunn stand out as she should. Mrs. Whiffen in a small part is as charming and unartificial as ever. The comic interest predominates in the play but there are some effective episodes. The main fault of the play is that, to use a homely expression, it peters out in the last act. One of the most pathetic incidents is the final retirement of the old actress who had played thirteen tragedy queens in her time, and finally had to accept the job of wardrobe mistress. The struggle between pride and necessity in the case of Mr. Telfer, the veteran actor, when he is given a small part in the play, is drawn so humanly that sympathy goes out to him. The poor old players are almost tragic as they stand in the glow of happiness which brings the play to a close. The play, I believe, was founded on incidents in the life of Tom Robertson, a brother of Mrs. Kendal, and Pinero has woven them into a story which presents the members of the theatrical profession of long ago in a most picturesque and pathetic light.

A New Zaza

The opening of the Florence Roberts season at the Alcazar was fully as brilliant as that of the Miller-Anglin company. The theatre was packed, and not with the usual clientele. Clubmen and society women filled the boxes and parquet. At the end of the second act the ushers lined up with their arms filled with flowers for the star, and in response to many calls she faltered, through tears that were by no means feigned, "Thank you, many, many times." The popularity of Florence Roberts in San Francisco is something unusual because it has been so enduring. Other stars make ephemeral hits and meet with frosts later on, but Miss Roberts retains the old patronage and wins new adherents. Perhaps this is because she does not stand still in her art. Her Zaza is by far the greatest thing she has yet done.. Her Sapho was a strong impersonation but her Zaza goes far beyond that. Except in the general idea of following the author's lines, the Roberts conception of David Belasco's heroine is far removed from that of Mrs. Carter. The latter gave a broad, repellant picture of a coarse character. Its passion was wrought to the highest pitch in the fourth act, and throughout it had a rough sort of power that held the attention and can never be forgotten. Miss Roberts merely touches upon the gross side of the part. She brings out more the pathetic side of the woman's character, showing that the immaturity of Zaza's soul was owing to her ignorance. In that great scene in the fourth act she does not use up so much emotion as Mrs. Carter did, with her tempest of sobs and flood of real tears. She does not pant and rant herself into a frenzy. Her passion is never uncontrollable. Miss Roberts, again, does not exaggerate the eating scene; it is less farcical in her hands. White Whittlesey comes out strong in this act. Indeed throughout he lends the role of Bernard Dufresne an interest it did not possess in the Columbia production. Mr. Whittlesey's welcome on Monday night was fully as sincerely cordial as that accorded the star. The company acts well in "Zaza," far better than usual. There must be something inspiring in Miss Roberts' presence. Mr. Wyngate, the new member of the company, promises well for future leading roles. Mr. Osbourne as Cascart, and Miss Woodthorpe as Zaza's old aunt, are especially good. A good bit of work is that of Miss Blanchard as Alice Morel.

Not Worth Dramatizing

On the strength of the success of "Madame Butterfly" on the stage, John Luther Long has already received six propositions to dramatize "Naughty Nan." As a story, there is nothing to it but the author's name. Naughty Nan is a flirtatious girl betrothed to her Cousin Cawdor, who is studying for the ministry. The aunt under whose guardinanship Nan finds herself proposes to make Cawdor her heir when he and Nan are safely married, and another cousin, Jock Merrival, supposed to be settled and staid enough for the purpose, is deputized by the aunt to take charge of the damsel and keep other suitors at a distance while she is absent. It needs no guessing to surmise what happens. Though the others are admonished continually to "Remember Cawdor," no one happens to remember that Cawdor may need reminding. He makes his own choice, Jock and Nan pair off in course of time, and the aunt herself makes another trial of matrimony. The between spaces are filled in with listening behind portieres and talking nonsense to a lap-dog, nothing beyond the capacity of any tyro, and nothing at all to dramatize. The only surprising thing about it is in finding it given to the world with John Luther Long as author.

VARNEY W. GASKILL, Special Agent
With HILBERT BROS., Importers

The Costumes for Ade's Opera

George Ade is said to be heartily tired of writing "Fables in Slang," but the public continues to demand them. His comic opera, "Ki-Ram, Sultan of Sulu," now in its third month in Chicago, entirely avoids slang. It seems to be as funny as anything ever evolved by Gilbert and Sullivan, but all the time there is a basis of reality underlying it. One could hardly imagine anything more far-fetched than that a slave-holding Mohammedan ruler of an island in the far East should become a citizen of the United States. Having found the situation it almost elaborates itself. John T. McCutcheon, who designed the costumes, has been a chum of Ade ever since their boyhood in Indiana. McCutcheon made his first hit with pictures illustrating Ade's column of "Stories of the Street and Town." He illustrated Ade's first book, and they later made a trip to Europe together, writing and illustrating as they went. McCutcheon had started on a trip around the world, and had obtained the permission of the Government to go on the McCullough to the East, but by the time they reached Hong Kong the Spanish war had broken out, and they were ordered to leave that neutral port. The McCullough tagged after Dewey and McCutcheon saw all there was to see. It was the sketches he took that furnished the costumes for Ade's opera.

On the local Rialto the news has gone forth that Georgie Cooper, the clever soubrette of the Belasco-Thall company, is engaged to M. L. Alsop, the Alcazar's late leading man. Mr. Alsop went East this week but intends returning shortly and then the marriage will occur.

Though "Pousse Cafe" has been in rehearsal for some time it is doubtful when Fischer's will be able to take off "Fiddle Dee Dee," "Hoity Toity" is also to come later on—whenever that may be. And a local newspaper man has written a new burlesque which the management intends to stage when opportunity offers. Fischer's will have one of the handsomest Rathskellers in the country, arrangements having been made to build one in the large basement of the theatre. Fully twenty thousand dollars will be expended and the guests will be entertained with free orchestral music after the performances.

One of the treats to be offered during the Miller-Anglin season is a revival, "The Lady of Lyons." "The Adventure of the Lady Ursula" is also to be revived during the season. "The Gay Lord Quex" follows "Trelawney of the Wells."

Zelie de Lussan, who has been singing in England since her return to Europe last year, will give concerts in the United States next year under Loudon Charlton's management.

Mrs. Lotta Day Coleman, author of the play "When the Heart Was Young," recently produced at the Alcazar, has returned to town after a sojourn at Los Gatos.

ORPHEUM—Eleanor Falk and company in "The Sunny South"; Bedini and Arthur, comedy jugglers; Loris and Altina, marvelous marksmen; Swan and Bambard, eccentric, grotesque, acrobatic comedians; the twin sisters, Pearl and Carrie Meredith, singers and dancers; Cushman, Holcombe and Curtis in "The New Teacher," Barton and Ashley and Howard Chambers.

Gustave Salvini will be Mary Mannering's leading man next season in her new play by Clyde Fitch. Though Manager McKee had engaged Arthur Byron to play leads with Miss Mannering, Fitch claimed the right of choosing the actors to have the important roles. It was he who engaged young Salvini, who was supporting Duse during her late season.

Scene—Drawing-room in Blingum cottage. Time, September morning. Characters, Mr. Lawrence Baldwin, a wealthy San Franciscan; Madge Baldwin, frivolous wife.

She: You horrid man, you make me the most miserable of women.

He: And me the most wretched of men. Have I not told you that I would pay no more of your poker debts? If you will persist in your mad course, will go the pace of the Fool & Folly Club, our exchequer, magnificent as it is, will soon be exhausted. No, no pleadings will move me, I have said it. (Exit.)

Madge: The stingy fellow! A pretty fix this puts me in. I wish I'd never met him. Of all the tyranny a woman must face, marriage is the worst. Oh! if I were out of it—were free, free, free! (sinks wearily into a chair.) Ah! let me read it again—this note—from Harry! (draws note from her pocket). My! but that man loves me! Etta Van Renseller (exultingly) would give her head for just one such note as he sends me almost daily (reads)—"My dearest M——, keep me no longer in suspense. If you love me, say so—name the day, the spot, the hour—I'll meet you. Harry." (Tears it into bits.) I'll meet him—that's what I'll do. The very mood is on me now. I'll write this night. (Advances to table and nervously begins.) "Will meet you—at rear—of golf green tonight. Come at 7. Use caution and muffle your—face—as much as possible. At the hour named I'll be there. Anxiously, Madge." (Rings for her maid.) Take this, Peggy, and be sure you post it at once. (Retires from stage by one wing as her husband enters from another.)

He: Ah, so you are reading your mistress's letter. How dare you, you insolent maid. Here, let me take the task from your shoulders, and—you are disharged. (Exit frightened maid.) Just like a woman to leave her letter unsealed—but whom is she writing to now, I wonder? The propensity of a woman to dash into ink when things don't go her way is something amazing. But Madge is a changed creature since we came to Blingum. In our old Los Angeles home, never was wife so loyal. The world of fashion and folly is turning her head and my—pocketbook inside out. Even with this summer home, the woman is fairly wretched. Wish I had never struck Klondike gold! (Opens letter and reads—with startled eyes, lets it fall, then picks it up and reads again.) "Will meet you—at rear of golf green—tonight (Ah! what does this mean?) at seven. Use caution (worse and worse); muffle your face as much as possible (too awful to be true—) at the hour named. I'll be there! And so will I! (walks hastily out).

II.

Scene—Night, golf green, a deathly stillness; woman seen to emerge from a side wing and peer cautiously about.

She: So he has not yet come (consults her watch), but it is not quite seven. (Soliloquizes.) How thoroughly I detest the man, nobody knows, least of all the man himself. He thinks I adore him. But then I must give vent somehow to the tendency that is in me to rebel against biting home restraint. (Walking back and forth impatiently.) Well if he doesn't hurry himself a bit, I'll go back and play solitaire. ———Ah! he is here. (Advances with a melting smile and hand extended.)

He (voice also muffled): So it is you, my darling!

She: It is. I thought you would never come (fascinatingly).

He: You don't mean it, my darling (tenderly advancing to embrace her).

She: No, no, Harry, not so fast there. You really are quite too fresh, you know. You mustn'e presume because I met you that——

He: That you love me? Why, what other interpretation could I possibly put upon it?

She: You hateful fellow!

He: Have I then been deceived? What does your note mean? Explain yourself, my dear. Madame, do you indeed fancy that a man like me, with all the love and passion of——Hero himself, tearing body and soul asunder, is here to talk society small talk? Bah, woman, what can you mean?

She (hesitatingly): I don't know what I mean. Your note came to me in a propitious hour—in a propitious hour I answered it. Seeking escape from the exactions of a tyrannical husband, I determined to meet you. I really did'nt think of all it meant—I—I'm sorry I wrote it and——

He: So he's exacting, is he—the miserable scamp?

She: Yes and no. Don't call him names, please.

He: I thought to please you.

She: You don't.

He: How can I then?

She: By never mentioning his name to me again. (Begins to cry.)

He: What? Then you still love him? The undeserving fellow!

She: Of course I do. I love him with all the fervor I felt when first I met him—that love that comes to a woman—but once.

He (throwing off disguise): Madge—Madge, my darling!

She: Lawrence! (swoons in his arms; suddenly raising her head, says in startled voice.) Oh! but this is horrible. I can never hold my head erect again.

He: Why, Madge, why?

She: The disclosure is too awful. They'll not believe it—the Fool & Folly Club. Do not let them hear of it, I beg of you. I shall be expelled from membership if you do. Oh! they couldn't believe it—'tis past belief——

He: What, my darling—my own?

She: That a society woman should love——her husband!

The Dow Choral Recital

At the choral recital by the pupils of Mr. Percy A. R. Dow last Friday evening the program began with a Rubinstein trio: piano, Mr. J. B. Warburton, violin, Mr. S. Savannah, cello, Mr. William Wertsch. The vocal work began with two numbers by the chorus—Cowen's bridal chorus (from "Rose Maiden") and Fanning's "Moonlight." The chorus was not too large in point of numbers, and the male and female voices were unusually well balanced. The result was a delicacy of shading especially noticeable in the second number mentioned. Miss Wilhelmine Koenig was heard in four contralto songs. This young woman possesses a rich voice with much emotional capability in it. This was well demonstrated in the rendering of the Tosti and Schumann songs, "Donna Vorrei Morir" and "Ich Grolle Nicht." "The Miller's Wooing" was then beautifully rendered by the chorus, Miss Dorothy Churchman's fresh soprano sustaining the solo part. Three scenes from Grieg's Peer Gynt suite followed. This suite is always a favorite, and was on this occasion so rapturously received by the audience that the third scene, Anitra's Dance, had to be repeated in response to an insistent encore. The piece de resistance of the evening was "Hiawatha's Departure," by S. Coleridge-Taylor, a cantata for soprano, tenor and baritone soli and chorus, the solo parts by Mrs. Margaret Gray Best, Mrs. Richard H. Robb, Miss Corinne Gyle, Arthur C. Lawrence, H. C. S. Kent and Walton C. Webb; at the piano, J. B. Warburton. Mr. Dow announced the illness of Andrew Y. Wood, one of the soloists, whose parts were of necessity omitted. Mr. Coleridge-Taylor's music is sweet and expressive, in some places more of a recitative than a melody, but still giving good opportunities to the vocalists. There is a not too insistent accompaniment, and the vocal parts are separated by most beautiful little interludes. That it was interpreted with all requisite feeling and intelligence by soloists, chorus and pianist may be stated as a matter of course. The work of the soloists was indeed so good in every instance that it is not necessary to comment upon them individually. Still, one cannot forbear giving a special word of praise to Mrs. Best, who is one of Mr. Dow's most conscientious pupils and who puts her whole soul into her work. The hall was crowded at the concert and the large audience listened with attention to the very last note.

Beethoven Club Recital

The annual recital of the Beethoven Club was held last Friday, at the residence of Mrs. Brady in Twenty-fourth street. The large ball-room was filled with the friends of the fifteen young women who form the club. The Beethoven is a musical club which meets monthly at the members' houses, Mrs. W. P. McDermott being its director and manager. The program last Friday was: Liebes Traume, Liszt, May Worthington; Tarantelle, opus 69, Heller, Hattie Game; "Tell Me, Pretty Maiden," from "Florodora," Stuart, Ethel Bailey; Romance Italienne, Chas. Mayer, Frances Fitchen; "The Harp That Once Thro' Tara's Halls," Edna MacNab; Tarantelle, Lomas, Florence Moran; Cavalleria Rusticana, Mascagni, Ruth Stocker; La Souce d'Argent, Bendel, Mary McDermott; Eclipse Patrol, Kolander, Sadie Cole; second valse, Godard, Gertrude Albrecht; Mazurka, Wieniawski, Carrie Bright; Mazurka, opus 6, No. 2, Chopin, Ida De Vecchio.

An organ recital of more than ordinary excellence was given in the Methodist church, Alameda, on Thursday evening of last week. Mr. William B. King was the organist. Some of his San Francisco pupils were among the audience.

Mrs. Fine's Return

A very cordial welcome awaits Beatrice Priest Fine, who is expected to arrive here about the end of the month. Mrs. Fine has been in New York for the past three years, where she has constantly filled engagements in the leading churches, and has been studying under prominent masters. Her voice, so clear and sweet and finely trained, was immensely missed from Oakland's musical circles when she went East to live. She held the position of soprano in Calvary Presbyterian church, this city, for some time. Mrs. Fine will remain in California during the three summer months and will do some teaching while here, also giving recitals in September.

A PERFECT FUEL.

It is absurd to talk about the expense of coal, when genuine Southfield Wellington coal is within the reach of everybody. The price has been reduced to ten dollars a ton. Genuine Southfield Wellington always gives satisfaction. It is generally acknowledged to be the peer of any other coal on the market. Charles R. Allen is the agent.

We hear so much about the "best selling books," and have figures so persistently impressed on us that we are apt to believe that all the best-sellers reach the hundred thousand mark. As a matter of fact, few do. A large number never go above ten or fifteen thousand. A sale of fifteen thousand, especially if the book is one which holds its popularity with a fair degree of steadiness after the first excitement passes off, makes a very comfortable return to both author and publisher.

Since Elizabeth took us behind the walls of her German garden, it would appear that every woman who has a garden is anxious to display hers also, and curious as it may seem, dealers report that garden literature is even better to sell than fiction, outside of the books which happen to be passing through a boom.

It is reported that Maxim Gorky is dying of consumption in the Caucasus, where he has been "exiled." Gorky is reported to be doing so many things that one does not know where to draw the line between facts and advertising fictions.

Mary Wilkins, now Mrs. Freeman, has taken a new departure, and is writing spook stories.

LETTERS

Royal Regard for an Author

Arthur Morrison is one of the authors to profit by the accession of Edward VII. There is no likelihood of his being knighted, and he probably is not concerning himself about that, but the King has openly expressed his appreciation of Mr. Morrison's books, more particularly "Tales of Mean Streets" and "A Child of the Jago," so that for the time being, they will come into favor by reason of the royal regard. They are powerful stories of life in the London slums, and the material for them was gathered while Mr. Morrison was acting as secretary for a charitable society, and so came into contact with the people and conditions which he describes.

A Rich Writer

Carmen Sylva, the Queen of Roumania, is a prolific writer. Whether her writings would receive much recognition, apart from her title, is another matter. At all events she writes so much, and in so many different fields that some one has been curious enough to enquire whether it is all for love, or whether there is other consideration—vulgar money. It seems that the royal lady demands, and of course, receives, the highest rates paid. She does nothing for nothing. Report has it that she devotes the proceeds of her literary labors to the poor of her kingdom. One cannot suppress a degree of admiration for these people of means, who manage to squeeze the wherewithal for their benevolences out of the pockets of those poorer than themselves. It is only another phase of the trick of beating down seamstresses and servants to the lowest notch, and making subscriptions to hospitals and homes for worn-out workers.

Eugenie's Memoirs

It is now said that there is no truth whatever in the oft-repeated report that the ex-Princess Eugenie is engaged in writing her memoirs. The wife of a former Prime Minister of the Second Empire writes: "You may say decidedly that up to the present the Empress has never devoted any time to her Memoirs. Will she do so some day? Or will she have them written by a friend? As one can never tell what a human mind may decide, I can affirm nothing as to the future. However, it is not very likely that the Empress, who does not like to revert to the past, and who is in very poor health, will bring herself to write or dictate anything." Another reason which has appeared from time to time, as casting doubt on any probability of these memoirs being written, and which I repeat for what it is worth, is that Eugenie is so illiterate that the task would be quite beyond her powers. She is said to be even uncertain in such mechanical matters as punctuation, spelling and capitalization, and the letters which captivated Napoleon III during their courtship are reported to have been the productions of Prosper Merimee.

The copyright of "East Lynne" will expire in a short time, and several publishers are preparing to take advantage of the fact, There have been so many pirated editions, and the story is so well known through them, as well as through the various dramatizations, that one cannot predict the outcome of this industry. Over five hundred thousand copies of "East Lynne" were sold in the day of its glory, and those were not the times when books went by wholesale. Had the present methods been in vogue, it is difficult to conjecture how high the sales would have mounted.

The publishers of "The Mississippi Bubble" have struck a new form of advertisement. According to their announcement, "A strikingly beautiful young woman picked up the manuscript of "The Mississippi Bubble" in the studio of Mr. H. Nutt, the illustrator, and became so interested in the story that she offered to pose as the beautiful Catharine." Now it is in order for other publishers to follow the lead, and since the literary fad has struck society we may expect the next development to be an adaptation from the Sunday supps., "illustrations by ———, poses by Miss Society." We might have rival editions in which different ones postured, and the comparative sales might furnish a gauge of popularity. Thrifty damsels might add to their pin money, and ambitious ones "collaborate" with the author. Now that the hint has been given there are endless possibilities in the subject.

Connoisseurs of perfect goods appreciate "Jesse Moore" Whiskey for its purity and delightful flavor. It is without a peer.

BEST ON EARTH

The September Overland is to be made a memorial of Bret Harte, and the contents will be mainly made up of reproductions of his best stories and poems, facsimiles of his manuscripts, and illustrations of scenes familiar in his writings. All available data concerning Harte is being collected for this issue, which will, in a lesser way, be a memorial of all the earlier contributors to the Overland. This is a new departure in the magazine world, and one that in this instance at least, ought to be well received.

Such absurdly amusing typographical errors will make their appearance! Last December it was the Critic which came out with a reproduction of Milton's "Hymn on the Nativity," in which "hand made" lamp was substituted for "handmaid lamp." Now comes the Bookman, not to be outdone by its rival. The June number contains a review of Henry Harland's latest novel, "My Lady Paramount." The critic had occasion to use a quotation from the book, and when the compositors were through with it, "He pressed her nose to his mouth, crushing it, breathing in its scent, trying to possess himself of the touch her mouth had left upon it."

The predestined popular success of Charles Major's novel "Dorothy Vernon of Haddon Hall" is going to bring into the market a cheap book issued by a Chicago firm with a sub-title, "The Adventures of Dorothy Vernon of Haddon Hall." As Dorothy Vernon was a real personage and Haddon Hall a veracious edifice, the names cannot be copyrighted, and the pirate is at liberty to gain whatever advantage he can from their use. The surprising thing about matters of this kind is that publishing firms with any respect for their own reputations will have anything to do with what must appear to them as it does to the rest of the world, a barefaced fraud.

In all the break-neck race after the latest machine-made product of pseudo-historical fiction, it is gratifying to see the best selling book in San Francisco is still "In the Footprints of the Padres." Ellen Glasgow's most excellent story, "The Battleground," is deservedly popular in the South, and that lively little sketch of optimistic poverty, "Mrs. Wiggs of the Cabbage Patch," seems to have caught the fancy in all sections. "Mrs. Wiggs" is not a new book, as new books are reckoned in these days, having been brought out in 1891, but all of a sudden popular attention has been directed to it from all quarters at once.

Bertha Runkle, "the littlest girl," is engaged on a new romance of the same style as "The Helmet of Navarre," but the time is an earlier period. That is all the information vouchsafed us, but it is sufficient to keep her name before the public. The women's journals are still making capital of the story about the young lady keeping pace with her brother's Harvard course at home, when the hard-hearted authorities refused to permit her to attend college. The little fact that Miss Runkle has no brother is not permitted to spoil a good story.

It is announced with great flourish of trumpets that we are to have something entirely new—a magazine exclusively for women. What there is new in the idea it is hard to see, for with the quantity of Lady Books, Households, Housekeepers, Housewives, and that style, to say nothing of Harper's Bazar, The Ladies' Home Journal, Home Companion, Gentlewoman, and a score more, it would seem as if the women in all walks of life were pretty well provided for. It is the well-known Truth which is to be transformed, with the additional sub-title "The Woman's Forum."

Whether or not English is to become the universal language, there is little question but what the Roman alphabet will supplant all others. It has been a theory for many years that the German alphabet is a potent source of defective sight, and it is claimed that the Emperor himself favors the substitution of Roman letters. Quite recently Japan has taken up the subject and is discussing ways and means to discard her national characters and come into conformity with western ideas.

The paper covered novel has been declining in popularity for several years, and this year it is more apparent than ever that its day is done. Not only is there less call for that style of book, but the decline in orders has reached such a pass that several of the best known "libraries" have decided to discontinue their publications.

Some Good Stories

How Hugo Read

Victor Hugo and Turgenieff were apparently good friends, but the latter did not refrain from criticizing the Frenchman severely to his other friends. Turgenieff considered Hugo an arrogant and rather ignorant and narrow-minded egotist. He was speaking with Hugo once about German poetry, a theme which was peculiarly disagreeable to him. Hugo tried dogmatically to stop all further discussion by the jubicial sentence, "Goethe's best work is his 'Wallenstein.'"

"Pardon me Master," replied Turgenieff, "'Wallenstein' is not by Goethe, it is by Schiller."

"Well," said he, "that is all one. I have read neither Goethe nor Schiller," but I know 'Wallenstein' better than anybody who has learned it all by heart."

A Picture Story

It was in a picture dealer's in this city. The errand boy of the establishment was making himself useful. Several ladies had strolled in to look at the pictures, without any intention of buying, which perhaps disgusted the errand boy. A picture of the Magdalen stood on an easel. "Ah," said one of the ladies, going up to it and viewing it critically, "That is Mary Magdalen isn't it?"

"I don't know if it is Mary Magdalen," said the boy.

The proprietor happened to be standing close by.

"Don't you know that is Mary Magdalen?"

"Well, Madgalen's 'nough, ain't it? It don't matter whether it's Susie or Jennie or Imogene Magdalen, does it? How should I know all these women's first names?"

Gave Away a Secret

Arlo Bates was once talking with Mr. J. R. Osgood about the changes which had been made in a popular novel between the time it was first placed in the hands of the house and its appearance in print.

"You seem to know a good deal about it," Mr. Osgood observed, at length; "How did you find all that out?"

"Oh, the author told me herself," he answered.

"And did you go and print it?" he queried. "Print it?" was the rather indignant retort; "of course I did not."

"Then," Mr. Osgood rejoined, with a twinkle in his eye, "then you betrayed her confidence."

Train was the Biggest

George Francis Train offered to bet a considerable sum in the corridor of a big hotel one day that he was the "biggest fool in America," whereupon a thoughtful-looking little man, who evidently did not know him by sight, stepped up and responded:

"Look here, stranger, I'll take that bet, provided you're not George Francis Train."

A Portrait's Past

A curious story is told about one of the paintings by the famous artist David. It bears the title of "Family Portraits," yet only one figure is represented on the canvas, that of an old lady seated in an arm-chair. The chair itself was of a later style than the date of the painting. In spite of these peculiarities M. Van Praet had purchased the work. He then had it cleaned and carefully scraped, in the course of which operation the family "portraits" were successively brought to light. It was afterward ascertained that the old lady, who had sat to David for her portrait, surrounded by all the members of her family, had gradually quarreled with them all in turn, and had their portraits painted over one by one until she alone of the group remained, sitting in that preposterous-looking chair of hers.

His Ready Wit

A comedian in a French theatre once made a great hit out of a painful accident. One day, while indulging in a bit of horse-play on the stage, he hit his head violently, entirely an accident, against one of the pillars of the scene on the stage. On hearing the thud everybody uttered a cry. "No great harm done," said the comedian. "Just hand me a napkin, a glass of water and a salt cellar." These were brought, and he sat down, folded the napkin in the form of a bandage, dipped it in the glass, and emptied the salt cellar on the wet part. Having thus prepared a compress according to prescription, and when every one expected he would apply it to his forehead, he gravely rose and tied it round the pillar. The effect of his action was such that every one set him down as the readiest and wittiest man his profession.

Mrs. A. Murray Smith, daughter of the Dean of Westminister, has just completed a volume entitled "The Roll Call of Westminister Abbey," which is to be brought out immediately by Macmillan. It is evidently going to fill a long-felt want, since it will consist of some four hundred pages of historical lore and chatty gossip and information concerning those to whose memory the monuments are erected. There are to be a number of half-tone reproductions of the more famous memorials, plans, and other illustrations. It would seem to be just such a book as will please both student and globe-trotter.

OUR OPINION

Gage's Queer Choice

Governor Henry T. Gage has selected the little town of San Pedro as the battle-ground upon which to fight for vindication. It is in that little village that Mr. John D. Spreckels and Mr. S. W. Leake, the managing editor of his newspaper, must be tried by a jury of their peers upon the charges of libel preferred against them by the Governor of the State. It was Mr. Gage's privilege to swear out the warrants in any town in the State in which the alleged libelous matter had been circulated, but as he is Governor of this State we did not believe that he would deem it advisable to seek vindication in an obscure village. The supposition is that his reason for doing so is that he lived for many years in San Pedro, and that he is held in high esteem there. No doubt he is personally acquainted with every man, woman and child in San Pedro, and the presumption therefore is that it will be extremely difficult for the defendants to get a jury there that would acquit them. In other words, it is fair to presume that the man who is big enough to be Governor of this great State isn't magnanimous enough to give his enemies a "square deal." We believe that Governor Gage has exhibited weakness in his first step in quest of a vindication. He has left himself open to the suspicion of being anxious to secure what is commonly known as a "cinch." According to the laws of this country a defendant charged with crime is entitled to the presumption of innocence, but it will be almost impossible to find twelve men in San Pedro who are not already convinced of the guilt of Messrs. Spreckels and Leake. Governor Gage may get a vindication at the hands of a San Pedro jury, but it may not be the sort of a vindication that he most needs at this time. He has announced that he aspires to another term in the gubernatorial office. Having started libel proceedings he must disprove the Call's charges to the satisfaction of the people of the whole State. There is such a thing as revenge without vindication. That is what Gage may get.

The Adams Case

The community has not had time to take a long breath since one Rev. Adams, ex-preacher, and present adherent of good old John Barleycorn, saved his neck from the hangman's noose by a plea of insanity which justified him for killing in cold blood the man who interfered in behalf of the ex-Reverend's daughter. Now the gentleman seeks to be restored to the world and has invoked the law, through a petition of habeas corpus, to set him free. The probabilities are that he will be released, and it is as likely as not that he will assume clerical duties in some form. If he cannot again occupy a pulpit of his own denomination, he can become a drawing card as a revivalist or exhorter, or even pose as an "awful example." Rev. Adams should have been hanged. The fact that he was a man of some education, and had had opportunities denied the majority, should have weighed against him. Had he been a tenement house laborer there would have been no such leniency shown him, and the fact that his "insanity" was self-induced would not have helped him out. The besotted and ignorant brute who murders in a drunken frenzy is less of a menace to the community than he who has education and position. His crime is generally committed in the heat of passion, and he suffers the full consequences. There are few niceties and hair-splittings for him. No one considers the effect of his execution on his children or his family. But with men of the Adams type it is another matter. Society and the church must be considered, and the family protected, so the law is strained till it cracks, and the gentleman is held to be not responsible. Year by year our insane asylums are filled and new ones built. A large proportion of those who are tenderly cared for as irresponsible unfortunates are really criminals who should be at hard labor in the penitentiary. Instead of serving out a long and hard sentence, they are coddled and humored for a few months, and then, when their cases are forgotten, they are released. If insane criminals were confined for life, insanity would not appear so often as an excuse for crime. It would effect a decided improvement in public morals if a rule were established that criminals who are insane are either to be confined permanently or executed

Rear Admiral Clark

President Roosevelt's recognition of the services rendered by Captain Clark of the Oregon, as evidenced by his promotion of that gallant officer to the rank of Rear Admiral the other day, is somewhat tardy, but Captain Clark should perhaps be gratified that his country did not wait until after his death to do him honor. Captain Clark was one of the most conspicuous heroes of the Spanish war, but he did not have a pull at Washington and he was therefore overlooked when honors were being distributed. His gallantry, bravery and great executive ability aroused the admiration of all the world beyond the confines of Washington, D. C. Naval authorities in Europe regarded his achievement as the most noteworthy of the war. They declared that his was an exceptional feat, requiring both pluck and rare judgment; that he rendered great service to his country, and proved himself to be a man upon whom it was safe to depend in an emergency. His conduct throughout the hazardous trip of the Oregon, and during the engagement with Cervera's fleet was, in the opinion of foreign critics, more deserving of commendation than that of any other man who was given opportunity to attract attention with the exception of Dewey. His praises have been sung all over the world. The vessel that he commanded has become the most famous warship in the American navy, and yet it was not until last Monday that the gallantry of Captain Clark was given the recognition it so richly deserved. Even the Scotts have managed to extract more glory out of the achievement of Captain Clark than has been vouchsafed that distinguished officer. Tardy indeed is the action of the President, but the modest Captain has never uttered one word of complaint. The glory of the American Navy cannot fade while such men as Clark live to sustain it.

It Is a Sad Case

One of the religious periodicals relates the sad case of a Presbyterian minister who supplies two churches, and is therefore obliged to keep a horse, while his stipend is so small that his family has, per capita, for subsistence, just one-half what the county allows for the support of paupers. One must conclude either that the preacher's family is on the hither side of starvation, or that there is extravagance at the Poor House. Not having other data to go by, it is not just to condemn the community outright, but the chances are that this is one of the many cases where an extra preacher is a burden to the residents. Church extension societies are not noted for their discretion in organizing new congregations, and they are often governed as much by sectarian pride as by community needs. In sections where there are but a few families and those rather scattered, it is much more to the purpose to draw them together in bonds of neighborly unity than to introduce new causes of discord. An undenominational service and Sunday-school in which all can unite is much better than two or three rival meetings, which help to stir up differences and promote hard feeling. One can see no great need for an ordained minister to be supported by contributions, when poverty is the rule and all the others in the community work with their hands and struggle to wrest a living from the soil. It is a curious development of modern Christianity that the church ranks only second to politics as a bone of contention. No sooner is a religious meeting organized when some ambitious member seeks to rule, and failing, withdraws and with his following sets up a rival congregation. A village that can support one minister and maintain one church edifice decently soon finds itself with two, and in the course of time, perhaps four churches, all burdened with debt, all more or less neglected, and all dependent on supplementary aid from their governing body. At the same time, the ill-feeling and bickering engendered by them leaves the community in a worse state than if there were no church at all. The Presbyterian body of course expects aid for the poor minister whose sad case is made the subject of lamentation, but it might be more to the purpose to investigate and see whether there is any need for the two Presbyterian churches in a community so poor and apparently so thinly settled.

Frederick's Statue

Some of the German newspapers are very much grieved over the discussion caused by Emperor William's offer of a statue of Frederick the Great to this country. Once more have some of our newspapers represented us to have assumed a boorish attitude toward a foreign country. As soon as it was announced that the statue had been offered and that the President had accepted the gift, a discussion arose as to whether we should care to have in Washington the statue of a man who was not in sympathy with us during our early struggles for existence. It was an unedifying discussion and should have been discouraged. Frederick the Great was an autocrat, but he was a broad-minded man, and approved the principles that were expressed in our Declaration of Independence. His relations with Great Britain were such as to have influenced him in his attitude toward this country, which was perhaps not of the most friendly character, but we have long since ceased to quarrel with those that did not deem it advisable to aid us in our struggle for independence. We do not treasure up any feelings of resentment. A statue of Frederick the Great should be welcomed as an addition to the "sights" of our nation's capital. But the German papers think that to carry out the plans of the Emperor would cause great embarrassment. And they blame the German Ambassador for not having predicted the consequences which now threaten to result from the gift. They say that it should have been his business to deprecate a present which was not certain to be joyfully accepted by the whole nation. If they have a statesman in Germany so sagacious as to be able to predict just what the feelings of this country will be in reference to any project they should keep him in Berlin. There is always need of a man of such phenomenal sagacity at home close to the helm of State.

The University Atmosphere

"The man with the large bank account is often designated as the successful man, irrespective of how the bank account was gained." Those words are from the baccalaureate sermon of the Rt. Rev. Frederick Burgess, Bishop of Long Island, preached at Columbia University last week. It was an unusual baccalaureate sermon, for the fat bank account is what the undergraduates are urged to strive for these days, and Bishop Burgess contended that it was wrong. The mercantile influence predominates in our colleges and the Captains of Industry are the men whose lives our young men are advised to emulate. John D. Rockefeller has become one of the saints in the litany of the academician, and he is invited to the class room to tell the young men how they may become rich if they will refrain from eating more than one square meal a week, and hoard up the nickels that come their way. But Bishop Burgess

There's a smack of smartness to our

THE HUB

CHAS. KEILUS & CO.

Exclusive High Grade Clothiers 132 Kearny Street

urged the young graduates of Columbia to beware of covetousness, and declared that success was not evidenced by the abundance of things a man possessed. It was therefore an unusual sermon, but it should be published for circulation in our universities. Its sentiments should be inscribed on the walls of every class-room. "The mercenary element must be eliminated from the intellectual side of college life," said Bishop Burgess. It should, but the tendency of university education is toward Mammon worship. Young men are urged to fit themselves for a career, but they are impressed with the notion that the aim of existence is to accumulate riches. "In former times," said Bishop Burgess, "fathers who could afford it, sent their sons to college to browse in the pastures of literature. Their career was not decided upon beforehand. Now they are handed over to the specialists who have substituted for the old liberal education a multitude of technical schools for the cramming of the memory and the killing of the intellect." In other words, the undergraduates of today are taught to shut themselves up in the narrow scepticism of modern science. Even the sons of our plutocrats are trained to follow in the footsteps of their sires so that the mammoth fortunes of our richest families may be increased. And yet our academic philosophers inveigh against the concentration of wealth. What chance is there of developing such men as James Russell Lowell and Charles James Fox when the J. Pierpont Morgans and the John D. Rockefellers are apotheosized to inspire young men with a commercial ambition? According to Bishop Burgess, "We have specialists in Homeric cadence, but where are the men upon whom technique and mathematics do not have a mercantile influence?" The fact is that the mercenary spirit is fostered in the college atmosphere of today. The college graduate who believes that true success is obtained when a man is master of himself though all men be against him, who can see others growing richer without envy and without bitterness, and who is satisfied to go through life without growing influential by tampering with the truth of God, is a rara avis.

The Saunterer

Strenuous Native Daughters

The late Grand Parlor of the Native Daughters was the stormiest session in the history of that organization. My prediction of two weeks ago was fulfilled. Many of the delegates went prepared for an attack on the coiffure of Mrs. Genevieve Baker, and they succeeded in giving that lady the battle of her life. Their criticisms of her official conduct were of a most acidulous nature. They were also somewhat acrid. The atmosphere of the Grand Parlor was extremely torrid throughout the session. Before the Native Daughters convened the friends of Mrs. Baker talked of running her for a second term, and that lady assumed the attitude of Caesar declining the crown, but after hearing what some of the ladies thought of her she concluded that it would be better to retire gracefully. Nevertheless, she permitted the reopening of nominations, so that she could be nominated for a second term and have the pleasure of refusing the honor.

Lunstedt Wouldn't Budge

A somewhat unfortunate contretemps occurred at the Alcazar theatre Wednesday night when the Native Daughters attended the performance of "Zaza." A private box had been reserved for Mrs. Baker, and one of the committees of the Grand Parlor hired a decorator to embellish the box with flowers and bunting. But the committee made a grievous blunder. The box that was decorated had been purchased by strangers. But through the error of an usher they were seated in the adjoining box, which belonged to Mr. Theodore Lunstedt of the Native Sons and a party of ladies. As a consequence the Lunstedt party was put into the decorated box. When Mrs. Baker and her party arrived it was found necessary to seat them on the opposite side of the house. Presently the mistakes were explained to the strangers, but they refused to move. Then Mr. Lunstedt was asked to exchange boxes with Mrs. Baker. He said that he was willing to move into the box which he had purchased, but that he would not move across the house. By this time the entire audience was "rubbering," and the friends of Mrs. Baker were doing considerable frowning upon the Lunstedt party. The ladies in the party were willing to move, but Mr. Lunstedt would not budge. A little later a friend of Mrs. Baker went out and purchased a large floral piece and presented it to her. Then the Native Daughters in the audience applauded vociferously. It was an exciting night.

That Significant Letter

One of my readers questions the accuracy of my statement of last week regarding the letter written by Mayor Schmitz to Mr. Ruef subsequent to the last municipal election. The letter was published in the dailies and I commented on it at the time. If I could spare the space I would publish it for the benefit of my incredulous correspondent. But perhaps a few extracts will suffice. Among other things Mayor Schmitz wrote: "I feel that I owe a great deal of my success in this campaign to you and your friends, and I shall not permit myself to forget it." And he added: "Though you have never asked or even suggested it, I shall with the utmost confidence and with a sentiment of absolute security feel myself privileged at all times to consider you—my friendly counsellor and to call upon you whenever I may require assistance in the solution of any of the perplexing and complicated questions which must necessarily arise in the conduct of so vastly important an office." The Mayor has surely kept his word, and Mr. Ruef's legal practice has consequently grown.

THE STANDARD FOR CHAMPAGNE QUALITY IS

POMMERY & GRENO

THE WORLD OVER

Abe and Eugene

The Republican Municipal Alliance has adopted resolutions calling on the Grand Jury to investigate Abe Ruef's use of municipal patronage to build up his political machine. Last week I called attention to the manner in which Mr. Ruef was building up his legal practice, and I think that it is a matter to which the Grand Jury should devote some attention. That he is incidentally strengthening his political machine I have no doubt, but that is not the phase of the matter with which the Grand Jury should deal. If his intimacy with the Mayor is such that he does not hesitate to hold out inducements to commissioners in the interest of his clients, an effort should be made to call a halt. It is surprising that Mayor Schmitz has not seen the impropriety of Mr. Ruef's activity in behalf of people who have favors to ask in the various departments of the city government. So far he has apparently acquiesced in all that Ruef has done. He has been fortunate in escaping criticism from the dailies, but they have been silent for various reasons. However they are undoubtedly storing up material for future use. They are giving Mayor Schmitz plenty of rope, believing that with encouragement he will compass his own political death. Moreover they are reluctant to do anything which might give the impression that they are opposed to the labor unions whose cause the Mayor has championed. Incidentally it should be stated that those who are opposed to Gage expect Schmitz to co-operate with them in demolishing the Governor's machine. So they have vouchsafed him immunity from criticism.

A Tax on Credulity

But the Schmitz-Ruef combination is not generally approved even by those who are friendly with the Mayor, and who hope for the success of his administration. In the Examiner office, for instance, Ruef is persona non grata. The Examiner stands for Schmitz but not for Ruef, and I predict that if the latter continues to act as the Mayor's mentor, and at the same time negotiate private business with the police and other commissioners with the sanction of his Honor, the Monarch will proceed to smash the Champion of Labor. It is imposing too great a task on credulity in this age of scepticism to ask any one to believe that Mr. Ruef is being paid for his legal talent only when hired to invoke the favorable action of municipal commissioners. Some of our commissioners who would scorn a cash bribe might be willing to consider a proposition if it were represented that the Mayor could be induced to reappoint.

Enter, the Johnny

The Johnny is not indigenous to the soil of California. The stage door habitue is one of the features of metropolitan life on the other side of the Continent and in Europe, but he has not yet become noticeable in this city. We have a few club-men who dote on divinities of the stage but they do not haunt the stage door. They have no penchant for chorus girls, though they do not draw the line at the chorus when anxious for a companion to assist in dissecting a hot bird with the customary cold bot concomitant. The advent of the "Fiddle Dee Dee" company, however, has marked the debut of the Johnny. And this may appear somewhat strange in view of the fact that San Francisco has had a stock chorus for many years, but the girls of the Tivoli have never encouraged young men of the Johnny persuasion. They have always been either too busy or too conservative.

A Stage Storm

It was reserved for the two very fetching dancing girls in "Fiddle Dee Dee" to pioneer the way, as it were, for Johnnies in this neck of the woods. These two young damsels, Flossie Hope and Gertie Emerson, have developed the Johnny species in our midst, and they are receiving a great deal of attention from the young men of society. Among their most ardent admirers is the scion of a wealthy family, who never misses a performance. So much attention have these girls received that they have grown exceedingly independent, and as a consequence they have had more than one tiff with the stage manager. Freda Gallick, the vocalist, insisted some time ago that at the end of her stunt in which she is accompanied by the dancing girls they should make their exit ahead of her. Flossie Hope thought that she should be the last to leave the stage, and the stage manager ruled against her. Hot words ensued, and the stage manager issued an ultimatum to the effect that either the dancing girls should be fired or he would resign. As he is the husband of Maud Amber and his resignation would mean the withdrawal of the prima donna the management found that it had a puzzling problem to solve, but after awhile the storm blew over, as stage storms usually do.

Our Cheap Men

Though the Johnny appears to be with us it is not likely that the San Francisco species will lure many of the bewitching chorus girls from far away Broadway. Those that have been here and who came hither with the notion that this was the land of gold and plenty returned to New York with the report that this was a city of cheap men. The chorus girls of New York are expensive luxuries, and so well recognized is the drawing capacity of some of them that they are more independent than many of the principals. The stories about their automobiles, maids and private carriages and handsomely furnished flats are not fairy tales. There are many chorus girls that have all those luxuries. There is nothing that more eloquently proclaims the prodigality of the Johnnies of New York than the familiar type of chorus girl who drives to the stage door every night in her private carriage accompanied by her maid.

At the Shriners' Ball

There were rather more smart gowns worn at the Shriners' ball than I expected to see at an affair open to all-comers. Two stunning sisters from Sausalito were the most modish women on the floor, and were among the few representatives of Society present. Mrs. A. W. Scott, who led the grand march, was gowned a la Josephine in white, and the Empire style suited her well. Miss Maud Noble looked well in white. She seemed to enjoy dancing just as much as if she were not a young woman with a serious occupation. Miss Noble writes a string of degrees after her name, and is a graduate of Berkeley and the Cooper.

A New Country Club

Ever since I published the story of Mrs. Will Crocker's dissatisfaction with her neighbors in Burlingame there has been talk of a new country club in San Mateo. Several of our aristocrats are of the opinion that the personnel of the Burlingame club is not what it should be. "There are too many pretenders in the club," said a resident of Menlo the other day. "It affects an air of exclusiveness, but it is not exclusive." It is in the Menlo set that the question of the advisability of organizing a new country club is most persistently agitated.

American girls are becoming conspicuous in diplomatic life in Washington. The wife of the new British Ambassador was Miss Wilson of New York, the wife of the Spanish Ambassador is an American, and so is Baroness Hengelmuller.

The Poet of Usland

Joaquin Miller objects to his title of "Poet of the Sierras." He gives two reasons for his protest, the first, that his Sierra poems are not so good, in his estimation, as his Pacific poems. The second is more "Joaquiny." It jars his poetic nerves that the common herd will mispronounce Sierras, and he does not enjoy being known as the "Poet of the Sarahs—Saharas—Sierries—Sorries," and any amount of other transmogrifications of the name. Joaquin is a great juggler with names himself. It is but a short time ago that he was out in what he called a poem, advocating a change of name for the whole nation. "Usland" was his choice, but it remained his. He had better luck with his own cognomen, which, as it stood when first bestowed, was Cincinnatus. I remember seeing an article by his poetship descriptive of the Santa Clara valley, in which he carefully spelled the principal city "San Hosay," explaining that it was necessary in order to guide the tender feet of Eastern visitors, lest they should stumble into "San Josie." He might adopt some similar device for the Sierras. It would amuse Joaquin, and it wouldn't hurt the mountains.

Princeton Breaks Away

The election of Prof. Woodrow Wilson to succeed Dr. Patton in the Presidency of Princeton University is another step in the direction of secularization of collegiate education in this country. Harvard, Yale and Columbia have recently passed from the clerical influence if not domination of their early days, and Princeton was enabled to join them by the resignation the other day of Rev. Dr. Patton. But in California's two big universities, one of which receives State aid, clerical influence is still felt. Every President of Princeton hitherto during the one hundred and fifty years of its existence has been a Presbyterian minister.

An Artist in New York

Alice Chittenden writes to her friends here that though she likes New York and the art atmosphere there she has not decided whether she will locate there. Mrs. Chittenden has gone far afield from her flower paintings during the past two years. It was her roses, particularly her La France roses, that gave her her first foothold on the ladder of fame. But she was never content to base her reputation on flower paintings. She turned to portraiture. One of the first portraits she ever did was one of Eliza Keith, the new grand president of the N. D. G. W. She has improved greatly since that early work, and now ranks with our best portrait painters.

The Hotel Vendome is sheltering any number of well-known people this summer. General John B. Frisbie and Colonel J. S. Curtis of Mexico arrived last week and say they will stay through the season. Sylvia Talbot is a great pet. She is the daughter of the F. C. Talbots and a very pretty little girl.

Back from Japan

Among the arrivals by the steamship Gaelic from Japan last Friday, was Mrs. S. C. Partridge, wife of the Bishop of Kioto, who will be remembered as Miss Agnes Simpson. She is accompanied by her step-daughter Helen, a girl of sixteen who will be placed at school here when Mrs. Partridge returns in the fall to the Orient. Mrs. Partridge is visiting her parents, Consul and Mrs. John Simpson, at their home in Vallejo street, and she will no doubt be the motif for a good deal of entertainment by her many friends during her short stay.

A Club Version

The members of the San Francisco Club with whom John D. Spreckels spends a great deal of his time, do not take the libel suit of Governor Gage seriously. One of the club wits is authority for the story that when Gage decided to start proceedings, he called Mr. Spreckels up on the 'phone and that the following colloquy ensued:

Gage: "Hello, John."

Spreckels: "Hello, Henry."

Gage: "Say, John, I've decided to resent those roasts you've published on me."

Spreckels: "Oh, very well, Henry; what are you thinking of doing?"

Gage: "Well, I thought of starting criminal libel proceedings."

Spreckels: "Oh, very well, Henry."

Gage: "Well, John, I'll have the papers drawn up in a few days. Where do you want me to swear out the warrant?"

Spreckels: "Oh, suit yourself, Henry; I'm not particular."

Gage: "Well, if it's just the same to you, John, I'll go down South."

Spreckels: "All right, Henry. How have you been?"

Gage: "Pretty well. How are you?"

Spreckels: "Tip top. Good-bye, Henry."

Gage: "Good-bye, John."

His Latest Break

The Governor's choice of battle-ground for his libel suits is regarded by many as proof positive that he is no longer being coached by Mr. W. F. Herrin. The supposition is that Mr. Herrin is too wise to have advised the Governor to start proceedings in a remote and obscure village. Even Gage's friends who have been most emphatic in their condemnation of the Call's abusive articles are displeased with him for having made it apparent that he was willing to take an undue advantage. They think that his action will have a tendency to alienate public sympathy, and they are speculating as to whether his latest "break" was made on the advice of Dan Burns or Ed. Conroy.

Just imagine a woman dressed after what men pretend to think they would admire! No corset, big flat-heeled shoes, short shirts, hair plastered plain and screwed into an onion, and a sunbonnet or hat minus trimming. I can see the whole crew flying after the first butterfly that had sense not to heed their counsels.

The American Invasion

A San Franciscan in London for the Coronation writes me: "There's been a lot in the papers about 'The American Invasion.' Americans are being wined and dined as never before. The British are making strenuous efforts to promote brotherly love. Teddy of Washington is being discussed almost as much as Edward of Windsor. The O. L. Smiths are in Paris and the Hilborns of Washington are still on the continent. Mrs. Mackay and Mrs. Leslie have arrived and have been seen at the opera. Mrs. de Young's jewels have made a big sensation. The impecunious swells are talking about her torquoises 'as big as your hat,' and her Worth gowns and smart carriage and pair.

The Queen in Real Life

"We were so much amused to read what Shirley Dare wrote about 'the youth, beauty and preservation' of the Queen. Alexandra certainly has a charming manner but I would not call her well preserved. She wears a wig, has her face enameled just as the wife of a Berkeley professor did years ago, and her throat and brow are all blotched. Of course her gowns are superb. One reason why the courts are held at night is that the feminine royalties may shine to better advantage under subdued and rosy-hued lights.

What Alice is Doing

"Alice Nielsen sang at a grand afternoon concert under the patronage of the Queen, in aid of the restoration of an ancient Yorkshire church, on May thirtieth. One of the managers was Landon Ronald, a brother of Russell Ronald, who is teaching Miss Nielsen to sing, and who is reported as being much interested in her success. He coaches her in French as well as singing. Ronald is very clever, plays beautifully, coaches the grand opera folks, and was conductor of 'The Silver Slipper' company. You'll always find him at Mrs. Ronalds' Sunday afternoons at home. Fritzi Scheff was also on the program of this concert."

The Prophet Abroad

Truly one knoweth not what honors will fall upon one in a foreign country. The Manchester Guardian, commenting on Americans in London, says: "Mr. M. H. de Young is the sole survivor of four brothers who left Ireland and acquired the Chronicle. The three other brothers were all shot by people whose names had appeared in paragraphs in that paper." And the Jersey Evening Post, in copying the item, precedes it with: "Mr. M. H. de Young, the proprietor of the San Francisco Chronicle, who is now on a visit to London, seems to have had plenty of experience of the Western American journalism of which Mark Twain wrote."

Bowie's Ocean Voyage

Since the sudden departure of Allan St. John Bowie for the Orient, there has been no end of chatter over the affairs of that popular club man and society beau. Sensational stories have come to me from various sources anent the journey of Mr. Bowie, but I do not give credence to any of them. Just because a dashing and unconventional young woman happened to take the same steamer the coincidence is regarded by some as significant, and I have heard it suggested that Mr. Bowie may get married in Japan. But I am quite sure he had no such intention when he started, the story about his traveling companion to the contrary notwithstanding. His brother, Gus Bowie, has been expert-ing mines and other things in the Philippines for some time, and I believe they expect to join each other in Japan. Sir Edwin Arnold's admiration for the Geisha girls was never more intense than that of the Bowie brothers. Hyde Bowie loves all things in the Mikado's realm.

Three Talented Women

Juliet Wilbur Tompkins is out here from the East passing a few months in Oakland. She is one of the best known short story writers in the United States and has been one of the editors of Munsey's, for which she used to write a story every month. Miss Tompkins is taking a course of study in Greek and she is fitting herself to be an instructor at Vassar. Her father was a wealthy lawyer who founded a scholarship at Berkeley. When he died it was found he had nothing and so both the Tompkins girls took to literature. One of them has published a book. Juliet Wilbur Tompkins began her career on the Examiner. She is a graduate of Vassar. The Tompkins family of San Anselmo are cousins of hers.

Geraldine Bonner, the author of "Hard Pan" and many short stories, has left for Santa Barbara to pass the summer. She will return in the fall for a few weeks and then leave for New York to remain permanently. She has a great many relatives there who move in the fashionable set.

Gertrude Atherton leaves today for New York. She has been much entertained during the past two weeks by the Macondrays, Selbys and the old Menlo set. Dr. Harry Tevis is an old friend of hers and he has given several small informal luncheons for her. Dr. Tevis may always be relied upon to fete the latest lion or lioness, but the friendship of Mrs. Atherton and Dr. Tevis is of very old standing. During the opera season, by the way, Dr. Tevis pulled off an affair that was not a success. It was a breakfast in honor of Mr. Van Dyke. The guests were there but the tenor was absent. He had a cold.

Platt's Lucrative Pastime

Post prandial speechmaking is a lucrative occupation, but to thrive at it one must be clever. Horace G. Platt has made several hundred thousand dollars in the last few years, and the only capital with which he started was a knack for grinding out epigrams while the nuts are being cracked. He is the most accomplished eulogist of the millionaire that ever spread his legs beneath a plutocrat's mahogany. Some years ago he was dubbed the barnacle of the rich, but it evidently pays to be that sort of barnacle. Platt is not so eloquent as General Barnes nor half so witty. His epigrams that are swallowed with the wine wouldn't stand the test if fired from the platform at an audience that had not been brought under a mellowing influence. Barnes has not found after-dinner speaking a lucrative pastime, because he never eulogizes a man until he is dead.

Another Celebrity in Society

Miss Margaret Dale of the Henry Miller company is being lionized a great deal these days. Her mother travels with her and both have been visiting friends at Burlingame. Miss Dale has big brown eyes and fair hair and resembles Mrs. Robinson Reilly. She is famous for her good taste in dress, and she is always as quiet off the stage as on. Next year, it is said, she will be with John Drew, as his leading lady, for he likes his actresses to have that smart appearance which is Miss Dale's strong point. She is a Jewess, and her name in private life is Rosendale. Her father is a wealthy merchant of Philadelphia.

In the Long Ago

Apropos of the wedding of Mrs. Mace, a grand-daughter of Francis Scott Key, and Lieutenant Parker, U. S. N., it is interesting to recall that the marriage of the bride's aunt, Alice Turner, to Dr. J. M. Browne, U. S. N., was one of the earliest naval weddings on this coast. The navy yard was then in its infancy with Admiral—then Captain —Farragut in command. It was an evening wedding, and Bishop Kip performed the ceremony which was followed by dancing and an old-time Southern supper. Mrs. Mace's mother, who was then Miss Ellen Turner, was maid of honor, and her father, Dr. Messersmith, U. S. N., was best man. The bridesmaids were the late Mrs. E. J. Coleman, who was then Lucy Gwin, and Bessie Thornton.

Wallace Wasn't Willing

The Associated Press wired the news out from Denver the other day that Mrs. Hugh Tevis was not engaged to marry Allan Wallace. The denial was made on the authority of Mrs. Baxter, mother of Mrs. Tevis. Some weeks ago I told of the rumor that Mrs. Tevis was casting alluring glances in the direction of young Wallace, but declared that Cupid's aim had been somewhat inaccurate. Mrs. Tevis and Mr. Wallace met in Monterey, where both were then living, and there was an exchange of courtesies, but nothing occurred to warrant the report of an engagement. The fact is that Mrs. Tevis was very lonely in Mon-

The True Napoleon

Charles Josselyn of the Bohemian Club is receiving some very flattering notices from the Eastern book reviewers. They agree that his "True Napoleon" is worthy of a place in any Napoleonic library. The Commercial of Buffalo thinks it will be more popular than Lord Rosebery's, Watson's and Rose's books on Napoleon. "It is," says the Commercial, "as though the author had gone through some library full of Napoleonic literature, made extensive notes, culled from the best sources what is most entertaining and then printed them for the reader's benefit. The result is a marvelously interesting book."

Bounders in Fiction

One of the characters in "The Spenders," a new novel, is thus described: "Mrs. Akemil was not only like St. Paul, 'all things to all men,' but she had gone a step beyond that excellent theologue. She could be all things to one man." Mrs. Akemil is a specimen of the characters in this novel which are breezy enough in their vulgarity to have come from Blingum. Indeed the story deals with the descendents of a plain westerner who died a multi-millionaire and they are not unfamiliar. As evidence of the lack of finish in some circles it is related that a certain person served champagne with the oysters, soup, fish and entree, and for the remainder of the dinner proffered a claret of 1872 and it was served frappe.

Pictures Out of Holland

Since W. E. Dassonville returned from Europe, he has been busy "working up" the many interesting bits of the Old World that his camera caught for him. Last week some of the results of his efforts were on exhibition at Elder and Shepard's, in Post street, and elicited very high praise from the lovers of the artistic and uncommon in photography. Particularly fine are the studies made in picturesque Holland and in these the rare art of Dassonville is best demonstrated. The pictures have a delicacy of tone that is remarkable and the grouping is excellent. Dassonville is another of the young Californians who are adding to the fame of the West. Eastern critics class his work with that of the greatest in the photographic line and some of his pictures are soon to be shown in New York.

O'Brien for Leader

The job of Democratic Boss is going a-begging these days. Since the departure of Mayor Phelan for Europe there has been chaos in the Democratic ranks. It being generally understood that the party organ will not stand for Gavin McNab, the erstwhile followers of the astute Scot have been on a hunt for a standard bearer to flock to. James H. O'Brien appears to be the most available man for the job. He is one of the old school of politicians, and is in favor of a united party, and he is moreover a natural leader. But he appears to be somewhat reluctant to shoulder the responsibility of reorganizing the party. Some of the most prominent politicians of the interior who think that the party has an easy fight on hand this year are urging O'Brien to start the work of reorganizing. They have promised him their support in the State convention.

King Edward could win the applause of the world by offering a baronetcy to the Poet Laureate to refrain from contributing to the Coronation poetry.

Gossip from Los Angeles

Up from Los Angeles comes an interesting story about an impending scandal in golf club circles. It is said to involve more than one gay matron in the swagger set of the Southern city. My correspondent informs me that the morals of Los Angeles have been corrupted by carpet-baggers from the East. "Los Angeles has become the Mecca of feeble old gentlemen with young wives," writes my correspondent. "The men worked hard for the little fortunes they now have, and in their old age decided to marry and settle down in a healthful climate. They take good care of themselves at home, while their wives seek diversion on the golf links and elsewhere. You can therefore readily understand that the gossips have no difficulty in finding food for chatter. I believe that a great deal of the gossip one hears is entirely unfounded. A young wife with a tottering old husband cannot help accepting some attention. But jealousy is one of the ills that cling to the flesh, be it ever so old."

No Longer Fashionable

The popularity of golf in this section of the State is on the wane. The enthusiasm of a year or two ago has vanished from the links of Burlingame, the Presidio and San Rafael. Lack of interest in the sport is not altogether responsible for the apathy that has come over many of the golfists. In their eagerness to reduce expenses the club managers took in many of the socially ambitious who were undesirable persons. To be a member of a golf club is no longer the hall-mark of exclusiveness, and now only the most rabid golf cranks of the smart set play the game.

Exit Tom Meagher

Thomas Francis Meagher is on his way to the Philippines where he hopes to make a fresh start in life. Fifteen years ago Meagher had some celebrity as a Beau Brummel, and he made somewhat of a splurge on the reputation of his father, for Thomas Francis Meagher Sr. was a distinguished man. He was General Meagher of the Civil War, and he was an Irish exile. He was banished from Ireland for his activity as an insurrectionist, and when he arrived in this country he was given a warm reception by the Irish people. When the war broke out he organized the Irish Brigade which he commanded with distinction. After the war he served for a while as Governor of Montana. The life of Thomas Francis Meagher Jr. has been a long series of failures. His father desired him to follow a military career and sent him to West Point. He failed to graduate, and he has been failing ever since.

Buckley and Kahn

On the reputation of his father he acquired both a social and political pull in this city, and being a courteous well-bred fellow with an inclination to kow-tow to the rich he managed to get along very well until recent years. For a long time he had a position in the Mint but since losing that he has had no regular employment. His friends of former days passed away and with them his "pull" vanished. He was glad to accept odd jobs at the race track and a few years ago he was appointed Distance Judge for running races. A distance flag for a running race is an absurdity, but Meagher needed a job, and that one he accepted without a blush, drawing his salary regularly. But of late he couldn't obtain even that sort of job, and somebody induced General Jim Smith to secure him a billet in the Philippines. How to get over there was a hard problem to solve. For days the son of General Meagher tried to get transportation, but none of his old-time acquaintances would come to his rescue until he enlisted the services of Chris Buckley, the blind boss. Chris demonstrated that he was not a "dead one" by wiring his friend Congressman Kahn. "Glad-hand" Kahn, be it said to his credit, responded quickly, and to him the son of the Irish patriot is indebted for transportation to the Philippines.

The Carter Harrisons

Carter Harrison, who was deposed from leadership of the Chicago Democracy the other day, owes his past success in politics almost entirely to the reputation of his father. People who have been reading about the two Harrisons—father and son—for years, far from the scene of their activities, imagined them to be big men, in the commonplace acceptation of the term. They were not. Harrison pere was a replica in the flesh of that Prince of Fakers, our bewhiskered Judge Campbell. He had the same happy faculty for glad-handing his way through political conventions and into the confidence of voters. But in Chicago he had greater opportunities than Faker Campbell ever had in this city. Chicago has a population of nearly two millions, and nearly half the voters are of foreign birth. They are a very tough lot, too, and the ignorance among them is very dense. There are colonies in Chicago from every nation on the globe, and the senior Harrison succeeded in making the representatives of each believe that the ties of blood bound him to them.

How He Won Votes

In his campaigning he had picked up a few words of almost every language. When he attended a meeting of Scandinavians he would shout a few words of their native tongue at them. He would do the same thing at a meeting of Swedes, and in that way he ingratiated himself into the affections of all foreign born voters. But his popularity was not the only evidence of his success as a politician. It was supposed that he was broke when he became Mayor. He bequeathed a fortune to his heirs. When the younger Harrison ran for Mayor, he received the votes of many foreign born citizens who were ignorant of the fact that his father was dead. His popularity was such that he was occasionally mentioned as an available man for the Presidency. But he is not qualified for high office.

Not the Only One

Herman Tubbs, whose tragic death this week supplied the dailies with a big sensation, was not the only member of the Tubbs family who had a romance. Another son of old Hiram Tubbs was on the point of contracting an alliance some years ago that would have displeased his folks, but he was of a somewhat fickle nature. Moreover the prospect of being made a co-respondent in a divorce suit frightened him, and he decided to withdraw his affections.

Her Romance

Mrs. James Otis, Sr., who met with a serious accident last week at the home of her daughter, Mrs. McAllister in Ross Valley, is one of the oldest residents of this city, and has always been a prominent member of what is now known as "the old set." She is the eldest daughter of Captain F. W. Macondray, founder of the firm of Macondray & Co. Her husband was one of the first Mayors of San Francisco. Their marriage was the culmination of a romance that started at White Sulphur Springs in Napa valley in the days when that place was a fashionable resort. Lucy Macondray and James Otis met at the Springs, and he paid her devoted attention. At the close of the season he proposed and was refused. He returned to town and became seriously ill and it is said that his malady was the result of disappointment. When Miss Lucy heard about it she began to think that she loved him. She recalled her negative and in a few weeks they were married.

Why She is Sad

"And now her friends say that Sam is fickle." Such was the remark of a belle in the swim the other day. She was discussing the recent return of a beautiful girl from the East, and the report that she had been saddened by the discovery that another had slipped into the affections of the man she loved. Merely a case of absence failing to make the heart grow fonder.

Just a Bit Dull

A guest of the Hotel Rafael has complained to me of ennui. The only evidence of gayety is to be found in the club house late at night, for there the Baron's liquid refreshments stimulate and exhilarate as of yore. More than ever before the occupants of the cottages are coming to the front as entertainers. Mrs. Harry Mendell and Mrs. George Gibbs give dinners every week. Mrs. Monroe Salisbury clings to her Sunday tea. The ill health of George Boardman has somewhat delayed the several functions that Mrs. Boardman contemplated giving, but the summer colony is fondly expecting the gay whirl to start just before the National holiday.

Mischief is not always intentional, but it doesn't take much wind to blow up a fire.

Unique Decorations

Miss Alice May, who assisted at Miss Tessa Semple's card party last Friday, is one of the prettiest girls I have ever seen. She is a brunette of almost Oriental coloring and the rose-colored gown of China silk that she wore enhanced her tropical loveliness. There were other pretty girls receiving—Misses McCabe, Bates, Coleman, Redmund, Long and Nourse—and the hostess' charming niece, who so resembles Blanche Bates, Mrs. Marie Craig Babin. Those at the eleven tables were chiefly members of Miss Semple's division of the California Club. The prizes were won by Mrs. Lovell White, Mrs. E. Berrien Grace, Mrs. E. P. Schell and Miss Elinor Croudace, who received the "consolation." After the card games there was fortune-telling by nuts, lottery and cards. The decorations of the rooms were decidedly original, the scheme being Arabic and in harmony with the celebration of last week.

One of my contemporary chroniclers of the doings of society people has been industriously engaged in resurrecting the departed, of late, for the delectation of readers of one of the dailies. The defunct mother-in-law of Mrs. Avery, whose husband was recently drowned in Detroit, was brought back from the dead to entertain her son's wife. The old lady has been dead several years. Dr. and Mrs. Gibbons were said to be rusticating at Larkspur. Mrs. Gibbons died two years ago. The wife of John Perry Jr. was also resurrected. She died a decade ago.

Where Joy is Unconfined

Staggs Leap, the charming home of the Chases in Napa county, has been the scene of considerable gayety this season. Mrs. Horace Blanchard Chase is a hostess possessed of the arts of the old school of hospitality. There is a refreshing absence of conventionality at Staggs Leap, and joy is unconfined. Among those who have been entertained there recently are the Downey Harveys, the Will Tevises, the Rudolph Spreckels', Mrs. Bowie Detrick, Mrs. Oxnard and Miss Ethyl Hager.

Gallant Men Promoted

The promotion of Captain Clark of the Oregon to Rear Admiral has given greater satisfaction than any other the President could make. But in the list sent to the Senate last week were some of the most zealous and efficient officers in the army. Brigadier-Generals John C. Bates and George W. Davis, who were nominated to succeed Major-Generals Brooke and Wheaton, who will retire for age next month, are deserving and energetic soldiers. It was General Bates who rushed his brigade from the coast to the support of General Lawton at Caney on the night of June thirtieth and who was subsequently active at San Juan. He also did gallant work in the Philippines later on. General Davis distinguished himself at Pinar del Rio and was appointed Governor of Porto Rico where he ruled with tact and firmness. In connection with his record it should not be forgotten that he served in the ranks for six months during the Civil War before getting a commission. Colonel Frank D. Baldwin who also moves up a grade enjoys the distinction, I believe, of being the only officer in the service whose name appears twice in the medal of honor roll. He has been twice brevetted in Indian campaigns.

His Promotion a Joke

Among the West Point graduates who have been nominated for Brigadier-General is Major Trasker H. Bliss, who was in charge of the customs service in Cuba. The recommendation in his case was regarded as a joke at the Presidio. My attention has been called to the fact that to make a Brigadier-General out of Major Bliss it would be necessary to advance him over the heads of one hundred and one Colonels and one hundred and twenty-two Lieutenant-Colonels, nearly all of whom have war records. Some of them are old Indian fighters and others were in the Civil War. Major Frank Trask never saw as much active rservice as did our own Major McLaughlin who never smelled gunpowder except at the powder works in Santa Cruz. Major Trask graduated from West Point in 1875. He served on General Schofield's staff for a while and proved himself a capable dancer. For a while he was Military Attache to the American legation in Madrid, and when the war broke out he entered the Commissary Department. He has exhibited strategic skill only by his successful avoidance of active duty at the front. An acquaintance of Major Bliss who admires his ability as a civilian assures me that he does not know how to handle a brigade or drill a regiment.

A Court Scandal Promised

There is to be another contest over the will of millionaire Jacob Z. Davis, and judging from the allegations in the complaint there are to be some very sensational developments. The plaintiff, Laura Davis, a niece of the deceased, not only charges that the will was forged but alleges a conspiracy to loot the estate, and mentions the names of three men who got themselves on the jury when the validity of the will was first contested, for the purpose of sustaining the fraud. Mrs. Tracy was not a party to the first suit but I remember the trial which took place before Judge Coffey. Knight & Heggerty were the attorneys for the plaintiffs who were distant relatives of the deceased, and when the verdict was rendered against them they did not hesitate to declare that their clients had not received a fair trial. They took an appeal, and were no doubt prepared to make some sensational revelations, but Mrs. Curtis and Miss Muir, the heirs under the will, deemed it advisable to compromise. I believe that Knight & Heggerty obtained one hundred thousand dollars for their clients.

A Crack Jury-Fixer

If the new suit comes to trial a very unsavory court scandal will probably be ventilated. The plaintiffs expect to connect one of the most expert jury-fixers that ever manipulated a jury box, with the case. He held responsible positions in the City Hall for a number of years, and was on the staff of several prominent attorneys. It was generally understood that his first great achievement was the acquittal of M. B. Curtis, the actor, who was tried for the murder of a police officer. The Davis will was a suspicious one from the start. The proponents of the will alleged that they found it in a box containing the ashes of the millionaire's wife. It was the contention of Knight & Heggerty that it was absurd to believe that a man would put a will in such a receptacle and send it to the cemetery. They argued that interested people slipped it into the box.

The Chronicle's Coming Editor

Journalism runs in the blood. The Examiner, like the Herald, was handed down from father to son, and there is likelihood of the same thing being done with the Chronicle. In a recent issue of the Harvard Crimson, the university daily, I read an announcement that Charles de Young of San Francisco had been elected one of the editors of the paper. Evidently the young man has decided to go into training for a journalistic career. It was as an amateur journalist at Harvard that Will Hearst had his first newspaper experience. When he came to San Francisco from Harvard he was accompanied by a staff of writers and artists who had worked with him at college. The only one of that staff remaining in this city is Mr. Eugene Lent who is now a successful attorney. Lent soon wearied of journalism.

First Coronation Poem

The first coronation poem made its appearance last week. It is William Watson's "Ode on the Coronation of King Edward VII." It defends the splendor of the decoration and contains these lines:

"Let London rustle with rich appareling
And all the way with festal laces.
Casement and coign and fluttering balcony,
Wave welcome to the King."

Illness of George Loughborough

George Loughborough has been in the seclusion of his home for some time, and it is now reported that there is not much likelihood of his reappearance in the haunts that have known him so well. Young Loughborough has been a sufferer from pulmonary troubles for several years, and he has sought change of climate for his health on more than one occasion, but without satisfactory result. He was one of the gay Fithian party that took a yaching trip to the South Seas a few years ago. It was a trip that occasioned a deal of gossip in society owing to the sudden and unexpected return of Miss Kate Clement who was a guest of the Fithians. Not one of the many stories concerning her withdrawal from the pleasure party has ever been vouched for as authentic. Loughborough has been confined to his home for several weeks and his friends say that he is steadily growing weaker. His brother Aleck died a few years ago after an operation for appendicitis.

There are two Loughborough girls and both are favorites in society, though they do not appear at all the regulation affairs. They partake of the independent spirit of their brother and abhor convention. They are bachelor girls and appear to be in no hurry to get married. When the subject of marriage was under discussion recently one of the sisters commented on the unfortunate venture of her cousin, Marie Zane, and said, "Marriage spoiled her happiness, and we are not anxious to hazard ours." The Loughborough home in O'Farrell street is one of the handsomest in the city. Everywhere throughout the rooms the refined taste and originality of the occupants are manifest. The sisters entertain more or less during the season. They have any amount of money, their branch having been included in the distribution of old General Keyes' estate.

Two Eligible Heiresses

The Loughborough girls are not the only ones in the swim who manage to keep beyond the range of Cupid's arrows. There are two sisters in the same set who also continue to avoid the blind god's arrows. With their friends marrying all about them, no one has yet made the impression on their hearts that would cause them to forsake their liberty. Their eldest sister waited until she was well up in years before marrying and she has never been in robust health since she took the fatal step though she lived a strenuous life before her marriage. Her sisters do not shun masculine society, but they get a lot of pleasure out of single blessedness. They do not need to marry for a home because they own a very handsome one in town. Each has a fine income under her own control. They are both fond of outdoor sports and are crack golf and tennis players. Lately the younger has gone in for automobiling.

When Little Tom Was Baptised

Thomas H. Williams no longer adds the "Jr." to his name, having transferred that appendix to his little son, who was christened last week. Since the christening of the young turf magnate's heir was such an elaborate function, the fashion of making it a formal merrymaking will likely be adopted by others. The little fellow's aunt, Muriel Steele, was his godmother, and Louis Lissak and Charles Paxton were the godfathers. All the proud father's club friends brought loving-cups as their gifts to the heir, so he will have quite a collection of these useful trinkets when he comes of age to make use of them. There was afternoon tea when the baptism ceremony was over and later an elaborate dinner for the relatives and godparents. The Williams's did not discriminate in inviting guests to the ceremony, making no distinction between those in society and out of it. They invited their personal friends. So there was a very pleasant company to toast the heir.

Ethel Would Not Stay Here

It was in vain that Papa Murphy begged his daughter Ethel to remain in San Francisco, even offering the bribe of a fat-salaried position to her husband if he would locate here. Mrs. Biddle prefers the Nation's capital to the town where she was born and bred. Her husband has the entree to good houses, his family's name being sufficient to open any door to him. So next week will see the Biddles flying on their Eastward way. In the meantime little sister Addie is resting in a sanitarium. Later on, when her nerves are in better condition, she will go to San Rafael. It strikes me she could have obtained fuller satisfaction from her rest cure had she gone at once to the somnolent village in Marin county.

He Went to the Theatre

I have more than once commented on the changes in the observance of mourning. The sentiment, "Let us live while we live" has gradually crowded to the wall that old-fashioned idea of grieving a stated period for a beloved one. We are far away nowadays from that ancient date when from a veil and crape mourning was lightened to plain black, then black and white, then gray, violet and lilac, until the gay colors could be worn and satisfy the demands of good form. Yet there must be still many who believe in the old style of bewailing the dead. The other day a rich citizen died and left a host of nieces and nephews beside a widow to mourn his loss. Before the flowers had faded on his uncle's grave one of the nephews was seen at the theatre with his wife. As the nephew was doubly related to deceased, his mother having been a sister of the widow, there was much criticism of the nephew's acion. But after all there is no reason to believe he mourned his uncle's loss less sincerely than did the others in the family who stayed away from the theatre.

During the festivities last week a local wag declared that it appeared to him that a Mystic Shriner was a Mason with a jag.

Mrs. Martin and Her Daughter

The former schoolmates of Theodosia Cook Martin who are admitted to her friendship are eagerly looking forward to her visit here. They expect to hear details of delightful experiences in the swim at Washington, sprinkled with names of distinguished somebodies. Miss Martin, as letters from exiled San Franciscans have told us, was a great hit in the swim at the Capital. Her dark eyes and golden hair—the same combination that makes Margaret Dale of Henry Miller's company so fascinating—were immensely admired. Mrs. Carrie Colton Martin accompanies her daughter and they expect to spend much of their time while in California at the Colton cottage on Beach Hill, Santa Cruz. Mrs. Martin is passionately fond of the sea

The Trousers Centenary

Preparations are being made in London for the celebration of the centenary of the trousers. A tragedy, by the way, may be associated with the introduction of the elongated garments and the discarding of the knee breeches. A tradesman in Paris felt that the sartorial innovation meant that his occupation would soon be gone, so he ended his life in the Seine. He was a manufacturer of false calves for the legs of the nobility.

If there were less make-believe in women they would be less interesting.

A San Jose Romance

Orlando Stevens, at one time world's champion cycle racer, is to leave his wholesale fruit business and return to the Eastern path with hopes of regaining his old laurels. Stevens went to San Jose three years ago with Eddie Bald, Floyd McFarland and other racing champions. A strong attachment sprang up between Stevens and Miss Lottie Heurkauf, daughter of the racehorse owner, and they became engaged. When Stevens was suspended from the track in Paris, two years ago, he did not betray any sorrow, though his suspension came three days before he was to have met Jacquelin for the world's championship. When a friend condoled with him on his misfortune at losing the rich prize offered the victor in the race, Stevens replied:

"Never mind, I get a richer prize when I get home."

He referred to his approaching marriage with Miss Heurkauf. Stevens and Frank Kramer, by the way, will join fortunes on the track this season.

According to an Alsacian proverb, if you would make a good pair of shoes, take for the sole the tongue of a woman, because of its durability.

The date of the Martin-Oelrichs wedding has been shifted again. But this time the nuptials have been set for an earlier day than the one that had been agreed upon. Preparations for the happy event are now complete. I have heard that a writer of musical comedy librettos intends making the affair the theme of his next work.

"Oh, my, I've lost my pocket book," cried Maude as they walked along the beach.

"Much in it?"

"I should say so—my new bathing suit Mamma mailed me from town."

A Question of Etiquette

Ambassador Choate has been subjected to criticism by a contemporary for an alleged breach of etiquette on the occasion of the dinner given by him in honor of King Edward and Queen Alexandra. He is said to have departed from good form when he led the way to the dining room with Queen Alexandra, leaving the King to follow with the hostess in the second place. It should be remembered that technically speaking the dinner took place on American soil, and that therefore the American rule as to the host taking in the principal woman guest should have been adhered to. But there is no occasion to worry over the matter, for undoubtedly the affair was conducted according to program arranged with the co-operation of the King.

What is weakness in man or woman but perverted virtue? Without the struggles of the weak against the strong morality would be but a name.

Roosevelt Wont Be Bluffed

President Roosevelt has reached what appears to be a crisis in his political career. His special message on the Cuban tariff was a challenge to the beet sugar Senators to decide whether they would support the Administration's policy or place themselves in the position of rebels beyond the pale of the party. But it appears to be their theory that the President will be the rebel unless he agrees with them. Last week it was reported that the President would not push his demands for reciprocity for Cuba if he thought those demands would jeopardize his party's success. But Roosevelt evidently believes that it is better for the President to be right than for his party to succeed. The beet sugar men sought to coerce the President into submission but failed. He insists on keeping his country's promise to the Cubans. He may lose his fight but he will retain the respect of his country.

De Vries and McLaurin

Marion De Vries came to town the other day after a long absence in the East. A few years ago Mr. De Vries was a lawyer in Stockton with not much practice. He ran for Congress and was elected. Now he is a United States Appraiser with seventy-five hundred a year, and all his expenses are paid by the Government. Mr. De Vries received his appointment from a Republican Administration though he is a Democrat. The supposition is that he was rewarded for throwing down his party in Congress. In other words he bolted a Democratic caucus because he had been converted to Republican principles, and now he is enjoying a good fat salary bestowed in recognition of his services to the Republican party. The other day Senator McLaurin of South Carolina was appointed a judge of the Court of Claims by President Roosevelt. He was elected to the United States Senate as a Democrat, but his political career was ended when he accepted the Federal judgeship. He voted for Republican measures right along and now it is believed that he sold himself for the job. He has been likened unto Benedict Arnold and Judas. This is the same McLaurin who was attacked on the floor of the Senate by the violent and vituperative Tillman. Since the appointment of McLaurin there has been a growing feeling of respect for his late antagonist.

To be pessimistic is not half so pleasant as to adapt one's self to appreciation of all the goodness, and purity and brightness that are to be found in this world.

Phelan's Letter

If Mayor Phelan ever gets broke he should turn newspaper correspondent. His letter from London published in the Bulletin the other night was the sprightliest and newsiest bit of correspondence that has appeared in print since preparations for the crowning of Edward began. Some days ago Mr. Phelan was quoted in the despatches as having said that the people of America were in sympathy with the Boers during the South African war. The alleged interview read as though it had been written to alienate the Irish vote forever, but the Bulletin letter bristled with Gaelic and American sentiments. I am of the opinion that the Sons of St. George will take it up for condemnation at their next meeting.

Stories About Sybil

Since her return to Paris Sybil Sanderson has been the subject of more club gossip than ever. A correspondent informs me that the gay American is the most extravagant woman on the French stage, but that she is not so prosperous as she was a few years ago. A story recently leaked out that she sought to revive her credit by representing that James Gordon Bennett would pay her bills. About that time Mr. Bennett and his female protege were not on friendly terms but when the latter heard that Miss Sanderson had usurped her place in his affections she lost no time in effecting a reconciliation

In Honor of Benny

Benny Benjamin, the accomplished turf editor of the Chronicle, whose receptions to theatrical celebrities have become famous, started for Montana the other day, where he is to become a turf official. A beer and sandwich jollification was given in his honor by the Chronicle staff the night before his departure. It was a surprise and so were the presents from his confreres. The presentation speech was made by City Editor Simpson while handing Mr. Benjamin the various articles which he took out of a battered trunk that looked as though it might have come over on the Mayflower. Mr. Simpson explained that the staff desired to equip Benny with a traveling outfit. First came a toilet-case out of the trunk. It contained a currycomb and brush. Then followed a bottle of horse liniment, a pair of garters with a brass clasp, a copy of the Decameron, a picture of a vaudeville artist in tights, and numerous other indispensable articles. Benny was overcome with blushes and gratitude.

Once They Were Friends

General Harrison Gray Otis, editor of the Los Angeles Times, who has been sued by Governor Gage for one hundred thousand dollars damages, for libel, was formerly a client of the Governor. At one time he had considerable respect for Gage's legal ability and he used to employ Gage to defend him in libel suits. The breach between them occurred when Gage was nominated for Governor. General Otis thought that he should be entrusted with the management of the campaign in Los Angeles, and he demanded the privilege of naming the men from the South on Gage's campaign committee. He was especially desirous of keeping H. Z. Osborne, a rival editor, and Walter Parker off the committee. But being a candidate for a job Gage was intent upon rounding up supporters rather than fostering enmities. So he took Osborne and Parker into camp.

Hawaiian Affairs

B. F. Dillingham, the Hawaiian financier, who is now in this city, is the most enthusiastic boomer of those islands I have ever met. After a talk with him on the subject of Hawaiian affairs you cannot fail to become impressed with the energy, industry and enterprise of the people of the islands. He can tell you of all sorts of obstacles they have encountered and overcome from the time of the political disturbances that preceded annexation down to the present. They have faced all sorts of unfavorable situations forced upon them through political complications, and they have suffered some distressing reverses, but they never lost heart and today the country is more prosperous than it ever was before. Mr. Dillingham is a promoter whose enterprises have been uniformly successful. He organized some of the richest sugar companies in the islands, and he says that the work of development is being steadily prosecuted. In the last few years several million dollars' worth of machinery was sent to the plantations in Hawaii and they have not yet reached one-half the capacity to which the plants will be pushed. The only drawback, he says, is the inadequate labor supply, and he declares that it is absurd for the people of this country to object to immigration from China and Japan to the islands. "Ninety per cent of what we consume," he said, "is bought in this country. We get our money from our sugar plantations. They cannot be worked without Oriental labor. Shut that off and we must quit patronizing the white labor of this country, for we cannot buy without money." When asked if the sugar growers of Hawaii feared national legislation he said, "Not a bit. We do not object to giving the Cubans a chance to compete in this market. We feel that legislation that would destroy our business would wipe out the sugar industry of the South, and we know that Congress is not going to do that. So we feel perfectly safe."

Smith of Honolulu

One of the most picturesque figures in the political strife of Hawaii is Walter G. Smith, editor of the Dole missionary organ, the Honolulu Daily Advertiser. The news came up from the islands the other day that Smith had been released from the Honolulu jail after serving two days of a thirty days' sentence imposed for contempt of court by Judge Gear. He would have been compelled to languish in jail but for the clemency of Governor Dole who arrived from San Francisco in time to render a valuable service to his friend the journalist. That Smith was guilty of contempt there was no doubt, but Dole hastened to release him. Acting Governor Cooper had refused to interfere. Smith is caviar to Cooper, for on the latter the editor has frequently vented his spleen. But a month or so in jail wouldn't bother Smith. His is one of the most turbulent spirits that ever dictated the policy of a newspaper. A few years ago he was leading editorial writer on the Chronicle of this city. He went to Honolulu for the Chronicle about the time of the revolution, and he has been closely identified with the politics of the islands ever since. He is always ready for a scrap and he has had a deal of exciting experience.

Knocking the Queen

Upon his arrival in Honolulu Smith espoused the course of the anti-monarchists and at their suggestion he started an American newspaper, the Hawaiian Star, now one of Honolulu's leading journals. It was in this paper that Smith so bitterly attacked the deposed queen, Liliuokalani, and for days demanded that she be deported for the good of the islands. He referred constantly to her adviser, C. B. Wilson, as "Paramour" Wilson, coupling his name and title with that of "Paramount" Blount. Had Liliuokalani gained power through President Cleveland's efforts, Smith's head might have rolled into the basket, for the dusky sister of Kalakaua was hot after the scalp of the newspaper man. But she never ascended the throne again, and Smith made a failure of the Star. He antagonized his stockholders and shocked the sedate and religious people of Hawaii by his introduction of yellow journalism. He quit and returned to San Francisco, and was sent later to report the war between China and Japan. He is a brilliant though erratic writer, and made a hit by espousing the cause of Japan.

Journalistic Warfare

About three years ago Smith took charge of the Honolulu Advertiser at the request of Lorrin Thurston, its owner, and the leader of the Dole missionary party. Smith put a strong dose of ginger into the Advertiser and before many months had involved the paper in several libel suits. Among the men that he assailed was Judge Abram S. Humphreys, the belligerent little jurist who was compelled to make a fight in Washington recently to hold his job on the bench, owing to the machinations of his enemies. Humphreys became the publisher of the Republican, an anti-Dole organ, and as a consequence he became involved in all sorts of trouble. He imported an editor from Arizona, in the person of Edward Gill, a gritty little gun fighter, but a weak journalist. Then the Advertiser trained its guns on the Republican. Judge Humphreys fired Smith's brother out of a job, and then the quarrel became personal. Each called the other a liar, and both sweated under the weight of huge Colts in their coat pockets. Both were thought game, and Honolulu gaped for the sight of a street battle. Every blast of coral rock on the beach was hailed as the first shot in the duel. After a few weeks the Kona wind began to blow and it grew too warm to pack guns. One day an Advertiser reporter went to Editor Gill's sanctum to lick him. Later he went to the Queen's hospital with a 44-calibre bullet in his hip. Since then the warfare has been purely wordy, though intensely tobascoesque. The Republican stopped publishing after Humphreys had sunk twenty-eight thousand dollars and had found out that a newspaper was a deeper sink than a new sugar plantation. The Advertiser has cartooned Humphreys almost daily for two years and also pitched into Judge Gear, a friend of Humphreys. Gear finally haled Smith into court and gave him thirty days for publishing a peculiarly malicious picture.

Conspirators in Action

Smith had to spend forty-eight hours on the reef until the steamer arrived with Dole. Some years ago Smith came as near to death as he ever will until he passes away. "Paramour" Wilson, whom he had been roasting, sent word to him to meet a friend under the stairway of the royal Hawaiian hotel. Those were troublous times when conspiracy stalked like a ghost by night, and when men talked in whispers in the shadows of the giant cocoanut trees. Smith kept the tryst at dark, and looked into the muzzle of a revolver in "Paramour" Wilson's hands.

"I am going to kill you. You have defamed my honor and my Queen," said Wilson, a half-white.

Smith persuaded him to take a drink instead, and the two are now good friends.

It was Smith who headed the conspiracy to seize Lower California and organize a Republic, a decade ago. He was editor of a San Diego paper then, and there was a tremendous boom on at Ensenada, which is in Mexican territory, seventy miles below San Diego. The plot was to land American filibusters as miners, invite the officers of the Mexican government at Ensenada to a ball at the Iturbide hotel on the hill, drug them, and capture the cuartel, the military headquarters where some miserable peons were quartered. Uncle Sam discovered the plot and scotched it while the Mexican papers denounced Smith as the most bloodthirsty scoundrel unhung. The San Diego papers gave him the name of Walter "Gringo" Smith which has stuck to him ever since.

"I am engaged to your pretty Count," said Edith.

"But you only met him last week. You don't know anything about him."

"Oh yes, we have been swimming together every day."

THE NEWSPAPER MAN AND THE SOCIETY GIRL.

An Embryonic Newspaper Man, assistant in the Sunday Department of a Leading Daily, became deeply Enamored of a Society Girl.

His love was not bestowed upon the Girl herself for he did not Know her. But he admired her Face and Figure, which were served up frequently to the daily's readers in Various Guises. Sometimes the Society Girl appeared as the Queen of Entertainers, sometimes as an Exponent of Grace, occasionally as an expert Golfist or Ping Pong Player. However she appeared, she was always Beautiful and Charming.

Every time the Newspaper Man saw a new Photo of his Admiration added to the Art Department he managed to Swipe it. He cut out every Item apropos of the Girl and after reading it several times pasted it in his Scrap Book. In time the walls of his room were Covered with her Pictures and space in his Scrap Book was exhausted.

One day, after long Meditation, he confided his Love to the Young Lady Typist in his department. She was Sympathetic and at the close of his Story said she thought she could Fix It so that he might Meet the object of his Worship.

Not long after the Newspaper Man was given the Detail to Do a Large Function.

"Now," said the Sympathetic Typist" is your Chance. That Society Girl will be there. Seek an Introduction, ask her how she wishes her Gown described, and then all will be smooth sailing.'

So he with his Heart in his Mouth, attended the function and gazed and gazed, far and wide, seeking Her.

His eyes became Strained in his Search and he began to think She was not there. But before giving up he decided to ask a Fellow Reporter whether he was right. The other man said at once:

"Oh, yes, She's here—that girl in Yellow over there dishing out Icecream to a lot of Johnnies."

The Society Girl's unknown admirer followed the direction of his friend's eyes. He saw a tall, very thin and none too girlish form, a face whose good features were spoiled by a Bad Skin.

"Is that She? Why, I thought she was the most Beautiful Girl in Society," said the Newspaper Man.

"So She is—in the Supps," was the answer, "she is really a Stunning Dresser and the Photographers understand how to Pose her."

But the other fellow went away with his Copy. At the office the Typist asked him:

"Well, did you meet her?"

His heart was too Full for Reply then. Later, he brought back all her Photos to the Art Department, and he burned his Scrap Book that very night.

Which shows that Favor is Deceitful and Beauty vain. Things are not Always what they Seem, and the Art of Photography is Sometimes a Delusion and a Snare.

The Power of a Play

Darrell went out as the curtain fell upon the fourth act. It was his usual way, to leave Lizette to pass the entr'actes alone. She had grown used to this form of neglect, which from constant occurrence did not seem to her like neglect at all. Anything that Darrell did was right in Lizette's eyes. He was as different from the men she had known before he came upon her horizon as a lord is from a costermonger.

Darrell was a man who cared nothing what anybody said of him. Criticism upon his sins of omission would not have troubled him even had they been offered, which they were not. The women of his own class looked longingly after him as he passed them by with merely the lifted hat of recognition. They wondered what he saw in "that red-haired creature" who went everywhere with him and to whom, though he did not seem devoted, he was constant. Lizette was known as "Mrs. Darrell" to Darrell's friends but the men knew the "Mrs." was only a polite fiction.

The man who openly adheres to a woman not bound to him by tie of law or church must have some reason for his act. Darrell's friends, who knew that Lizette was unlettered and possessed of less wit than the average, explained the position by saying Darrell was used to her ways and was too indolent to change. She satisfied him and that suited his indifference. The women, beautiful and clever, whom Darrell ignored thought it curious that a man like him could endure one so devoid of either beauty or refinement as was Lizette.

Lizette had never understood the difference between herself and the women of Darrell's world until that night. The first three acts passed by unheeded. The fourth act touched her. When Zaza rants and raves "I'm nothing; I'm just dirt," it seemed as if a great veil had been lifted from Lizette's eyes. From then on she took a feverish interest in the act. When the curtain fell and Darrell, without a word of apology to her, took his hat and disappeared into the lobby, she looked about her.

Here and there an occasional man left his seat but the majority remained. She saw pretty girls chatting eagerly with their escorts, comely matrons discussing the actors with men who listened to their remarks with absorbed attention. To her it seemed as if she, and she only, were alone. "I'm nothing," she repeated to herself.

She remembered how proud she had been when Darrell first singled her out with his professed admiration. The other girls in the factory of which she was an infinitesimal part and Darrell one of the owners were wild with envy. She could trace the whole history of her love life, from the first drive she had taken with Darrell on a Sunday morning, to her present position in his household. Most of the girls she had known in those days turned their heads the other way when they saw her now, but she knew they secretly envied her. Others sneered but toadied to her, because she was called "Mrs. Darrell," whatever right she had to the title.

She knew many men, for Darrell brought them home with him often to dinner, his friends. They treated her with good-natured friendliness and though their discourse was usually unintelligible to her, she made up for her lack of intelligence in her zeal as a hostess. She knew their likes and dislikes in the matter of food and drink, and her memory was trustworthy.

She went to the theatre frequently, to the races regularly when the season was on, to dine at a French restaurant every Sunday, and to all the amusements on the calendar. Until tonight she had never understood what was lacking in her life.

* * * * * * * * * *

"Deuce of a bore, this kind of play," said Darrell, tossing his boots into one corner and his collar and cuffs on the bureau. He yawned and added, "I'll have some jolly men to dinner tomorrow to liven us up after this dose of morals."

Lizette did not respond to his mood. She had made no move at undressing but gazed frowningly at her image in the mirror.

"Why don't we have some women to dinner sometimes?" she asked suddenly, "why always men?"

Darrell laughed.

"Why, don't you like to be the only pebble?" he said, "most women would give their eyes to be it."

Lizette did not laugh. She kept on, seriously:

"I think we ought to have women here, too."

Darrell thought she was jesting.

"Well, we'll have some of the girls from the factory," he said jocularly, "we'll show 'em that last new gown of yours—eh?"

"I don't want the girls—not that kind. I want to meet some nice women, like—like those that were in the boxes tonight. And that pretty girl who sat on the seat next but one to mine, and who stared at you so."

Darrell sat up and looked at Lizette.

"Oh, those," he said, and his voice took on a different tone, "what would you want with that kind of women?"

Lizette's courage was evaporating.

"I—just—kind of thought I'd like—to—see what they were—like—close to," she faltered.

"Well, you were close enough to that girl you mentioned," returned Darrell, "if you want to know who she is, she's Markham's sister."

Lizette knew Markham.

"Do you know her?"

"Well, rather."

"But she never bowed to you. She didn't smile, even, but just stared."

"Oh, well, you couldn't expect her to do otherwise, when—" but Darrell was not so brutal as to finish his sentence.

The light was growing in Lizette's newly awakened mind.

"You needn't finish," she said, "I know just what you'd say. 'I'm nothing.'" she quoted, "oh, you—you—you!" Her voice ended in a shriek choked with wild sobs.

She was acting over in her mind the play she had seen. Then her anger turned to pleading.

"I'm as good as they are, ain't I?" she said, "you wouldn't like me so well if I wasn't, would you?"

Darrell made no answer but went on with his preparations for retiring. This sort of thing was only a bore to him, as the play had been. But Lizette went on thinking.

* * * * * * * * * * *

When Markham and the other men were gathered about Darrell's table the next evening, there was no Lizette presiding.

"'Mrs. Darrell' ill?" asked one of the men.

"There is no 'Mrs. Darrell,'" returned their host. Then, to satisfy their illy restrained curiosity, he explained, "She wouldn't stay any more. Left today."

"Quarrel?"

"No—just a moral quibble. Concluded she must either go before the priest or go back to the factory."

"Odd creatures, women," said Markham.

"You bet they are," said another man, "best not to bother with their whims."

"You're right," added Darrell.

But he was thinking that, after all, his menage was rather lonesome without a woman. He already harbored the idea of marrying, and remembered that Markham's sister was a remarkably pretty girl. —The Moralist

A MODERN STORAGE COMPANY.

It is now the season of the moving vans, and one sees any number of them traveling in the streets every day. It is noticeable that the name "Pierce-Rodolph Storage Company" appears on nearly every van. The favor in which this company is held is proved by the constant increase of its patrons. Just now the company is especially busy, because this is the season when people who live in rented houses desire to leave town. The easiest way to make the outing inexpensive is to give up one's house and store one's belongings. The Pierce-Rodolph Company's warehouses at 806 Buchanan street and Eddy street near Fillmore are the finest of their kind. They are fireproof brick buildings 160 feet by 138, six stories high with the brick wall running through. They are light, thoroughly ventilated, and have electric elevators. There are separate places for trunks, pianos, paintings, etc. Vans drive in and out of the building, thus saving considerable wear and tear. The offices of the company are at the southwest corner of Post and Powell streets; telephone Exchange 571.

HE WAS A COUNTRY EDITOR.

"This is what he writes," said Mildred, quoting from her fiance's latest letter: "'When we look upon the sun we think of Mildred. When we gaze upon the rosy wine we think of your lovely lips. When we take our lonely meals, we think of the time when Mildred will be sitting opposite, pouring the tea and putting in the lumps of sugar that are not sweeter than she.' Isn't he an elegant writer?"

"But," suggested Grace, "I don't understand why he says 'we.'"

"Oh," answered Mildred with a blush of pride, "that is because he is used to writing the leaders in his paper."

"I thought he might be twins," said Grace.

ENGLISH IN FRENCH CANADA

A curious plaint is making itself heard amongst the French Canadians, who are lamenting the Anglicizing of their language. They do not like to see the French form of Christian names giving way to the English, nor sign boards in English decorating their shop fronts. Just what is at the basis of the complaint does not appear, but it does not seem to be the proverbial racial antipathy. Very possibly it may lie in a fear of frightening away the tourist. Tourists are attracted by the unusual and the quaint, but except for business purposes, the inhabitants of out of the way corners have no joy in being considered oddities. When the summer boarder and the traveler make their advent they bring in their new ideas, but they do not take them all away. Men and women alike adopt more or less of the fresh, whether it be in the cut of their clothing, the manner of their speech, or the ornamenting of their houses. Between Butterick's patterns and Cook's tourists, the whole of Europe is gradually coming to dress alike, and from a recently compiled book of American slang translated for the use of Germans, it begins to look as if language would not linger long behind costume.

APROPOS THE LIE.

I can see the sense of society fibs that grease the wheels and make matters run smoothly.

I can understand lying to save one's own neck or that of some other person.

I decidedly approve of the kind that is told on the principle "When people ask questions about what is none of their business, anything you choose to tell them is the truth." I believe in making such a lie so big that they will understand the wherefore of it.

But the needless lie, the gratuitous lie, the contemptible lie of the scandal-monger, the lie that blasts a woman's reputation to make a crowd of clubmen laugh at the turn of a witty phrase, the fairy-tale that benefits no one and serves no purpose under the sun—those are the lies that I see no use for. —The Diplomatist.

General Hawaiian Stocks

An authority on the Honolulu market says: The last week in Honolulu shows the feeling to be one of waiting, indicative of the desire of the investors to see the bottom of all stocks before taking on any but the regular dividend-payers. There were some sales but no particular turn one way or another. The stockholders of the Rapid Transit Company, which owns the electric railway of Honolulu, have voted an issue of a million dollars worth of bonds, and as the stock issue was but a half million, another half million was issued and given to the stockholders as a stock dividend, share for share. These bonds will be sold to develop and extend the road, and a brokerage firm has agreed to handle all of them. The stock went up on this showing. Olaa Sugar Company's stock has declined from $2.75 to $2.25. Ewa Sugar Company stock was solid at 2c and Kahuku Sugar Company stock at the same price. There was a slight trade in Waialua with five shares at $60. Of Oahu Railroad and Land Company bonds $24,000 went at $104.50.

Ship Trust Bonds

San Franciscans have a special interest in the issue of bonds of the United States Shipbuilding Company, which opened its subscription books this week. The fact that the Union Iron Works, of this city, is one of the leading factors in the new trust, and one of the principal concerns amalgamated, lends local color to the big deal, and makes the securities of the company a conspicuous figure in this market. The United States Shipbuilding Company is organized under the laws of New Jersey to acquire the plants of the following concerns, or their capital stock, free from any lien: The Union Iron Works, of San Francisco; The Bath Iron Works, and the Hyde Windlass Company, of Bath, Me.; The Crescent Shipyard, and The Samuel L. Moore & Sons Company, of Elizabethport, N. J.; The Eastern Shipbuilding Company, of New London, Conn.; The Harlan & Hollingsworth Company, of Wilmington, Del.; and The Canda Manufacturing Company, of Carteret, N. J. The capital stock of the new corporation is $20,000,000, of which $10,000,000 is preferred, six per cent non-cumulative, and $10,000,000 is common stock. The offer at present is of $9,000,000 first mortgage, five per cent, sinking fund, gold bonds, due in 1932. This is part of an issue of $16,000,000 bonds of $1,000 each, $5,500,000 having been withdrawn from public issue to provide cash working capital for the company, and $1,500,000 being reserved in the treasury of the company. Additional bonds may be issued only for acquiring additional plants, and equipments, and for improvements and betterments, as approved by a majority of the bondholders. The plants are alleged to be earning $2,225,000 a year on the contracts now on hand. The Scotts are said to be firm believers in enlarged profits for them in the new deal, as those at the head of it are high financiers. Among those heavily interested is Lewis Nixon, late leader of Tammany, and the man who designed the battleship Oregon. He owns the Crescent Shipyard, of Elizabethport, and is a power with the Navy Department. The subscription price of the bonds was 97 1-2 per cent.

Oil Stocks Depressed

Throughout the past week sales on the Oil Exchange have been small and trading generally was greatly depressed. The favored stocks of a few weeks ago attracted but little attention and the moderate sales recorded were at a low range of prices. Sterling, which has been selling freely, dropped to the lowest point in several months, $1.50, but Sovereign, the sister stock, was held fairly steady at 27c. Small parcels of Home Oil changed hands at $3.35 and moderate lots of Peerless commanded $8.50. Despite the present dullness manifested on the Board most encouraging reports of development are coming to hand from the various fields and the demand for fuel purposes is showing a steady increase, making general conditions most favorable to producers. The Hawaiian Commercial and Sugar Company has just closed a contract with the Union Oil Company for a supply of crude oil for its Hawaiian plantation and the change from coal to oil fuel will shortly be made. A saving of 35 per cent is anticipated. Fuel oil is also to be used at the mill of the Honolulu Plantation Company. About 7,500 barrels of oil are to be stored for the season and as the cost is about one-half as much as coal at present prices quite a saving is expected. The oil is transported in sailing vessels by the Matson Navigation Company. The Oahu Plantation is also arranging to store oil and will begin the use of oil as soon as it can be obtained. Pipe lines and tanks are being constructed and will be in readiness by the time the California oil carriers arrive. In the Kern Oil Fields complaints are being made that certain companies have pulled casings in wells to be abandoned without shutting off the water and neighboring companies are thus endangered. Vanderlip, Topnot, Southern Pacific and Kern Canyon Companies have combined for the purpose of constructing a pipe line to the Southern Pacific Railroad tracts, two miles distant. Rudolph Spreckels, it is said, will shortly do a large amount of assessment work on his oil properties. The Standard Oil Company is considering a plan to build a pipe line from the Fullerton fields to Redondo.

General Stock Market

Business on the Stock and Bond Exchange during the past week maintained an almost uniform dullness and very little interest was manifested in local securities. At the beginning of the week the attention of investors was devoted chiefly to bonds while stocks were neglected, but this business was short-lived and the market fell back quickly to a practically stagnant state. Some small parcels of Sacramento Electric, Gas & Railway 5 per cent bonds changed hands at easier rates and by a certain speculative element it is believed that the price of the bonds is being manipulated, as reports are current that there are strong interests endeavoring to purchase control of the stock, with H. E. Huntington as the leader. In March these bonds sold freely at $96 and in April were worked up as high as $105, at which price some good-sized transactions were consummated. Since the beginning of this week the best bid obtainable was $99.50, with sellers holding out for $100.25. The $750,000 worth of 5 per cent forty year bonds issued by the North Shore Railroad Company have been all subscribed for through the Mercantile Trust Company of this city at par and are now being held on 'Change at $101.25 with bids at $100.87 1-2. Some minor sales in leading railroad bonds were recorded at steady figures. As previously stated, in general shares, business was of exceedingly small volume, but values were steady, however, and there was no disposition on the part of sellers to make any concessions in prices. Bank shares have been the strongest securities and several small lots of American Bank and Trust Company's stock changed hands at the steady rate of $112.50. As high as $440 was bid for Bank of California shares but even this price, which is the highest ever noted did not bring out any stock, holders raising their asking price to $450. The present annual dividend of the corporation is 16 per cent, so at this rate the return to the investor is about 3.65 per cent, a smaller rate of interest than that received on many good bonds. Values for Spring Valley Water shares showed a partial recovery from the singular weakness noted last week and prices hardened a trifle, ruling at $89 bid and $90 asked. Electric, Gas and Power shares moved in a limited way at steady figures. Sugar shares were moderately active with values showing no material change.

STAGE

The New Romeo and Juliet

When Edward Morgan came stalking down the boards at the Grand the other night, his modernity masked beneath a purple doublet and hose, the audience rubbed its eyes. Surely this was Romeo they had come to see, and here was Hamlet before them. One hears much nowadays of the unfairness of women to women, but never was a woman more unkind to another woman than Edward Morgan is to poor Shakespeare's romantic hero. If ever there were supposed to be a gallant son of romance that one is Romeo. But Morgan's Romeo is a creature of megrims, of sadness and of feminine whims. There is only one scene where he wakes to some semblance of life—that is when he is murdering his Juliet's relative. I thought Morgan would be at his best in the love scenes, but he is not. Perhaps he cannot summon up any enthusiasm over such an immature Juliet as Maude Fealy. It is a curious thing, but true, that youth does not always count on the credit side with an actress. To play even young parts intelligently she must have had years of experience. Miss Fealy's Juliet might be anything else. She has none of the passion of the southern nature that Shakespeare injected in such huge doses into his heroine. Her declamation is the worthiest feature of her performance. It is particularly fine in the scene where she takes the poison and in the final scene. Some of the other roles are less open to criticism than those of the lovelorn hero and heroine. Herschel Mayall gives a very virile impersonation of Mercutio. He understands his Shakespeare well and his death stands out as one of the strongest bits in the production. Benvolio and Tybalt, Friar Lawrence, the Apothecary and Peter are also marked with understanding. The scenery throughout is magnificent. But "Romeo and Juliet" is not a drama that can exist on scenery alone, without great stars to solace one for sitting through nearly four hours of dullness. Morgan and Miss Fealy aren't great stars.

A Pelee Interview

Virginia Harned visited the town of old Vincennes not long ago in "Alice of Old Vincennes," the play adapted from Maurice Thompson's novel. When she got back to New York she was interviewed on her impressions of the town and she said among other roasts of the place, that she couldn't get a decent thing to eat there. The interview found its way to Vincennes, and the people rose in wrath against the actress. They had packed the house at her performance and paid good money to see Maurice Thompson's heroine in the life. But next time Miss Harned goes that way she will not be treated so well. In the meantime the beautiful Virginia and her husband are in London, preparing to enjoy the Coronation and recking not of the storm the former's opinion of Vincinnes has raised in Indiana.

Success of San Franciscans

Mrs. James Harrigan arrived this week from New York to visit her mother, Mrs. Rogers of Jones and Washington streets. Mrs. Harrigan looks even younger and prettier than when she left San Francisco a bride two years ago. Mr. Harrigan comes to the Orpheum in November. Mrs. Rogers' other daughter, Mrs. F. K. Tobin, is meeting with great success doing her musical act in Australia. Her husband, who has been so ill since leaving America, was at last accounts somewhat improving at the Hot Springs in New Zealand.

The Neills have had a somewhat disastrous season at the California. A much more capable company would find it difficult to draw theatre-goers to the once popular playhouse.

Poor Theresa

Theresa Vaughn is the latest actress to succumb to brain trouble. I hear from New York that it is not likely Theresa will ever act again. In her day no actress was more popular than she. Theresa Vaughn's beauty, Theresa Vaughn's gowns and Theresa Vaughn's figure were themes that could arouse the most blase man-about-town to enthusiasm. Everybody may not remember that at one time Miss Vaughn thought of becoming an opera singer, as her voice, a rare and rich contralto, well fitted her for that branch of art. She was the wife of W. A. Mestayer and one of her principal hits was made as Persia in Mestayer's production of "Check 14."

Walter and His Wife

Walter Jones did not leave the stage when he married the Chicago widow and her ducats. Had he desired to do so his new wife would not have permitted the sacrifice. Mrs. Jones fell in love with Walter as a comedian, and she would not have him otherwise. She attends nearly all the performances in which he appears, and applauds his every hit. But she does not ask him to support her on his earnings. She loads him with gifts and, as a New York correspondent writes me, loves the very boards he treads on.

Miss Sybil Page, a promising young soprano, will have the role of Maraquita in the revival of "The Idol's Eye" at the Tivoli next week. Sybil Page is none other than Miss Emily Coleman who has been in the chorus at the Tivoli for several months. Sybil Page is her stage name. She is a sister of Lillian Coleman who was recently at Fischer's. The latter, by the way, is now with the "Prince of Pilsen" company in Boston, where she has made a great hit. Ferris Hartman will have his old part of Abel Conn in "The Idol's Eye" and Harry Cashman will be "Hoot Mon." All the other parts will be in good hands.

Bertha Blanchard, who makes so much of the small part of Alice Morel in "Zaza," is no novice in her art. She has had fine experience, having been a member of Richard Mansfield's company. Both Miss Blanchard and Mr. Wyngate, Dufresne's friend in the present cast, will be members of the next Alcazar stock that will hold the boards after the Florence Roberts season.

Mr. and Mrs. Watrous, who come to the Orpheum next week, are new here. They are society entertainers and are said to have excellent voices and a fine taste in music. Fred Hallen and Mollie Fuller will receive a royal welcome. Hallen is of the old firm of Hallen and Hart, and Mollie Fuller is a sister of La Loie. Mabel Sisson, who comes with May Stewart, is also a favorite here.

The entertainment given by the juvenile class in physical culture and dancing at Hoover's hall last week was a complete success. The little ones sang and danced with splendid spirit and intelligence, reflecting great credit on their instructors.

Some object to Florence Roberts' Zaza as being "not coarse enough," others refer to it as "discreet," but everybody concedes the impersonation to be a remarkable one. The character is unpleasant but the interpretation is great.

Mrs. Fiske's revival of "Divorcons" at the Manhattan has proved so popular that she has been compelled to extend her season over the three weeks originally intended.

Of Interest to Art Lovers

The P. Rossi Co. of 229 Sutter street is a veritable paradise for art lovers. Particularly is one's eye taken with the collection of sofas and chairs of the Louis periods, some heavily carved and gilt, others finished in hand-chased bronze. Mahogany of the Colonial or Empire periods is also seen in some especially fine pieces. The firm has as its special feature the hand-carved furniture which is all the rage just now. Beautiful carvings, porcelains and rare paintings, are shown, the firm's stores at Venice and Paris supplying the San Francisco branch with all the latest objets d'art. One need not have a large bank account, either, to invest in these treasures. Two or three hundred dollars furnish a salon with rare and individual furniture.

Jennie Eustace will make her first appearance with the Miller-Anglin company in "The Gay Lord Quex." She has been playing the leading role in "The Climbers." Miss Eustace is remembered in San Francisco for many delightful characterizations. She was a member of the A. M. Palmer stock company that played a long season at the Baldwin and after the tragic death of May Brookyn Miss Eustace had the former's parts in "The Dancing Girl," "Jim the Penman" and other plays.

There is a professional palmist in "The Gay Lord Quex." William Courtleigh has the role. Margaret Anglin will be Sophy Fullgarney, a manicurist.

A topical song on local topics written by a San Francisco woman will be a feature of "Pousse Cafe" when it goes on at Fischer's.

WHEN WE ARE ONE.

A Duet.

He.

Oh, such gay holidays,
Feasting and jolly days,
No melancholy days,
When we are one.
Time shall pass merrily
Gaily and cheerily,
Nothing prove wearily,
Under the sun.

She.

Your wise speculations, sir,
Gay calculations, sir,
May prove vexatious, sir,
If I deny;
Unless with submission,
To ev'ry condition,
Of my imposition,
First you'll comply.

He.

A bargain submission
To ev'ry condition,
Of your imposition,
I promise to give.

She.

Whatever I choose, sir,
You must not refuse, sir,
Or never with you, sir,
As wife will I live.

He.

Think of the charming joys,
Nice little girls and boys,
Sugar plums, cakes and toys,
How I will buy;
Teach them to read and write,
Dance and sing, what delight,
No one from morn till night,
Gayer than I.

She.

But when I'm growing old,
Will not your love prove cold?
Peevish you'll be and scold,
No longer gay.

He.

No, by those sparkling eyes,
Love like mine never dies,
You it will truly prize,
Till life's last days.

Both.

Then such gay holidays,
Feasting and jolly days,
No melancholy days,
When we are one;
Time shall pass merrily,
Gaily and cheerily,
Nothing move wearily,
Under the sun.

DID NOT BUY A COPY.

"I think your last novel the most brilliant of your works," said her right hand neighbor to the gifted novelist who was the guest of honor at the dinner.

"Thank you," she answered, beaming kindly upon him whom she had previously ignored.

And then he spoiled it all by adding:

"Yes, I read the extracts of it in one of the weekly papers."

DOLORES.

My Lady of Dolors I named her.
She was always in trouble, you know.
And never till now did I blame her,
She did seem unlucky,—that's so!

An innocent damsel I thought her:
So when her seal cape she had lost
An outfit far better I bought her
And never gave heed to the cost.

She had always some rank hard-luck story,
Her pocket-book stolen, maybe,
Or some relative poor gone to glory—
The funeral paid for by me.

I called her my Lady of Dolors,
But now an amendment I make:
I call her my Lady of Dollars,—
When she got them she gave me the shake.

A New Volume of Verse

A. M. Robertson has published "A House of Days," a new volume of verse by Christian Binkley. Mr. Binkley is a Stanford graduate of the class of '99, and is at present head of the English department in the Cogswell Polytechnic College. The sonnet is the form chiefly affected by Mr. Binkley, whose work on the whole is that of a thoughtful, scholarly man who has meditated much on life, nature and art. In the different songs and sonnets comprising the volume there are echoes from the author's wide reading, and I can discern the influence of many models. There is a certain lack of spontaneity and freshness. All is correct, labored, decorative. Perhaps freedom will come to Mr. Binkley when he gets farther away from his masters. In one of his notes the author apologizes for an unintentional echo from "Hyperion." "I stood upon a shore, a pleasant shore," but there are other echoes as distinct and doubtless as unintentional. For example, we have Shakespeare's "multitudinous seas," in the sonnet on page fifty-nine, "the steed with nostrils wide," on page eighty-one strongly reminiscent of Byron's well known line, on page ninety "Softly upon the silver waves of singing" recalling a line of Shelley's "Upon the silver waves of thy sweet singing." All through the book one keeps saying, "Here is a suggestion of Keats, here is Tennyson, here Dante, here Shakespeare"—good models all of them, however, for a young poet, and all too little studied in our days. I do not mean to disparage Mr. Binkley's work by what I have just said. It is of a very unusual order of excellence and is deserving of close and thoughtful study. It is utterly devoid of claptrap and cheap and vulgar conceit. Its tone is thoughtful, honest and sincere. Take it all in all it is the best that has appeared for a long time in California verse. That it will ever become popular I doubt, but as Emerson says, "Popularity is for dolls." Mr. Binkley's verse is not sensational. It is not discolored with the lees of stale passion, and it is not written down to the tastes of the mob. The songs are in many moods, explained to some extent by the title of the groups:—"In Distant Fields." "Enchanted Ground," "Pebbles Wet with the Sea," "Pictures and Dreams," etc. The following bit of description is from the first group:

Looking Eastward—Sacramento Valley.

"The great sun pours his gold athwart the plain—
Over the waving grasses smit with light,
O'er knee-deep cattle, o'er the nearer height
With summit tremulous in the golden rain.

Late afternoon! Already many a lane
Of shadow marks the sunlit mountain side,
And distant peaks in hazy violet dyed.
Show the long summer day upon the wane.

But there are unseen mountains farther still,
Of deeper violet, jutting to the skies,
And plains with twilight noises faint and far.

And far, ah, far beyond a valley lies
Dreaming in darkness, while above the hill
Trembles the glory of the evening star."

Though much in the book is quotable, it is not easy to pick out felicitous lines and use them apart from the context. This will, to some extent, illustrate the close knit character of Mr. Blinkley's poetry. It must be read and judged as a whole. Detached specimens will give no idea of it. The writer says in his notes that he has endeavored to reveal an outline of life and a progressive criticism upon it. The sequence of the work shows that in saying this he has not promised too much. Perhaps his philosophy of life can be best summed up in the closing stanza of "To Omar Khayyam":—

"A million moons shall wax and wane;
Nor ends the game; then boldly play,
And if you lose, or if you win,
Stay on until the stars are wan
And hills are purpling with the dawn,
Then yield your place and go your way.
You've played, rejoiced; there's naught to rue;
The game goes on, nor ends with you."

which are rather out of the ordinary path. "Hopes Afield," by Albert Bigelow Paine tells the story of a story. It was written by a young girl immediately after her graduation, and sent to the editor of a juvenile magazine. The story was accepted at once and a check mailed to the writer, but months and years went by and it did not appear. The author married, and in the course of time she rather hoped her venture into literature would defer its appearance till her little son was old enough to read, but the son was succeeded by other sons and daughters, and the baby of the family had settled down in her own nest before "mother's story" made its appearance—twenty-six years. One might think Mr. Paine were bent on discouraging the venturesome maiden, as was the one in the tale, but then, it did come out after all, and there was that check. "The Resurrection of Mrs. Waring" is a lesson to self-effacing mothers, and "Checkmate" tells how an over-confident constable lost his prisoner. Elliot Flower, whose "Adventures of Policeman Flynn," is one of the best books of the year, tells the story of Cinderella with Nurse Nora for interpreter. Mr. Flower has as good a grip on one side of Irish character as "Mr. Dooley" has on another. The coronation, the White House children and other timely subjects receive due attention. In Lippincott's, Caroline Gebhart's novel, "A Real Daughter of the Revolution," is neither better nor worse than others dealing with the same period. They are all either love at war with politics, or rival lovers for the same girl. As to local coloring and truth to the times, when the Tories and Patriots get to calling each other "hoodlum," a word coined here in San Francisco after the middle of the last century, one may be pardoned for doubting much. "A Diplomat from Chicago" is a domestic tragedy—or comedy, according to the point of view. It is as bright and entertaining as Caroline Lockhart is expected to be, as a matter of course. Llewella Pierce Churchill gives us a view of "A Trader's Station in Samoa," a section of the world which has seemed to belong by right of pre-emption to Louis Becke, but if Miss Churchill can continue in the same vein, Mr. Becke will have encountered a dangerous rival. "The First Love of Aaron Burr" comes in appropriately on the heels of the newly awakened interest in Burr. "Alcazar Island" has a local flavor and is a well told and concentrated tale of the escape of a federal prisoner by Clarence L. Cullen, author of "Tales of Ex-Tanks." "Tips and Commissions" are discussed by John Gilmer Speed, and the information which he dispenses is as interesting to the stay-at-homes as to those who expect to go abroad. In McClure's, the story of Miss Stone's captivity continues and grows in interest. "The Tragedy of Dent Blanche" is a graphic account of the loss of Glynne Jones and four guides while making an ascent amongst the Alps. The pictures which accompany the article are remarkably good. Booth Tarkington's new novel, "The Two Vanrevels," begins serial publication, and promises to be as good as his "Gentleman from Indiana"; John La Farge contributes an article on Rubens, as a continuation of his excellent art series. Some excellent reproductions of the great painter's best works accompany the article. Three excellent stories of out-door life complete the fiction. The "Roping at Pasco's" is the tale of cowboy sports in Arizona, told by Ray Stannard Baker. "Billy the Buck" comes from Henry Wallace Phillips, whose novel, "Red Saunders," is one of the livest of the year. Ellsworth Kelly tells of "The Man Who Found Himself," after being buried in business and politics till he had all but forgotten his early years. McClure's seems to have a corner on the best stories about children, though they are not for children. Edwin Lefevre contributes "His First Suicide," and though we may laugh at the little scapegrace's attempt at tragedy, down in our hearts we feel with him. The most important article in the Cosmopolitan is the second installment of "Captains of Industry," which treats of Marcus A. Hanna, Claus Spreckels, John D. Rockefeller, James Ben Ali Haggin, George Westinghouse, James J. Hill and Marshall Field. Richard Le Gallienne tells again the love story of Sir Philip Sidney and Lady Penelope Devereux; "Diable, a Dog," is one of Jack London's characteristic tales of the frozen North; F. Hopkinson Smith tells another story of the hardships meted out by exact justice and Elizabeth McCracken's "In a Second Balcony" is a pretty tale of an actor's sacrifice in order to give an unknown a chance to prove himself. Timely topics are "The Coronation of Edward VII," "Verestchagin in the Philippines," "The United States Military Academy at West Point," "Modern Bread Making," and a continuation of the biographical sketch of Cecil Rhodes. Gertrude Lynch's novelette, "The Fighting Chance," in the Smart Set, is a clever but not altogether pleasant story. The young woman who occupies the centre of the stage is altogether too smart for her years. "Kitty Wants to Write," the poem by Gelett Burgess, leaves one in doubt whether one wants her to or not. Kitty has run the gamut. Now, do we want her to tell it all, or had she better be suppressed in time? Randolph Forbes' "Interval of Splendor" is quite good enough to be true.

CAMP VACATION.—LARGE HOTEL AND SUMMER RESORT UNDER CANVAS.

Before you go camping, stop and think—think of the new camp, the modern camp, where you sleep in a clean, fresh tent, well furnished and kept in order for you; of the splendid meals you will receive without the worry and bother of hunting supplies, and the labor of cooking;—everything ready for you, and the pret tiest spot in Sonoma county.

The camp is on the west bank of the Russian river, below Guerneville, and the trains of the California Northwestern Railway take guests direct to the camp.

The camp grounds are 150 acres in extent and have a water frontage on the Russian river of one and one-half miles.

The dam is about midway, furnishing between 4 and 5 miles of excellent boating and swimming, whilst below the dam there is a fine sandy beach, and shallow water for children and those who are not swimmers.

The grounds are level, making a little valley around which the hills rise up, giving it much the shape of a cup.

Tent accommodations complete, and board will be furnished for $10.00 per week. Special rates for families and parties. Those preferring to bring their own tents can do so, and arrange for table board at a reasonable figure, as no one will be allowed to cook on the grounds. This is a Hotel Camp, and will be open for reception of guests June 20th. Purchase tickets at the ticket offices of the California Northwestern Railway, 650 Market street (Chronicle Building) or Tiburon Ferry. Address, Camp Vacation, Guerneville, Sonoma county, Cal.

MUSIC

Elaborate Music at a Confirmation Service

Temple Emanu-El, which has the wealthiest congregation of any Jewish synagogue this side of New York, celebrated last week the feast of Shabuoth. Under the efficient direction of Cantor E. J. Stark, the musical portion of the service was of a most impressive character. With the exception of a few numbers, the entire music was composed and arranged by Mr. Stark, who used many of the ancient themes, giving them a modern setting, but adding rather than detracting from the characteristic beauty of the Oriental music. The choir was augmented for the occasion and a string orchestra assisted in all the musical exercises. Cantor Stark conducted the services and his magnificent baritone voice was heard in the chanting and in the concerted musical numbers. Miss Daisy Cohn, Mrs. H. Kelly, Signor Buzzi, Mr. D. Lawrence and Mr. S. H. Henley were the soloists. The entire ensemble work was particularly fine. In the confirmation hymn Miss Cohn sang the soprano solo most effectively. Mr. W. A. Sabin presided at the organ.

Appreciation of Organ Music

The series of free organ recitals instituted by Mr. Louis H. Eaton, organist of Trinity church, at that sanctuary have constantly gained in favor. The audiences have gradually increased and now, from seventy-five present at the first concert, have multiplied until at the last two recitals the church was full. This speaks well for our gain in musical culture. The sixth recital was given on Thursday evening, when Mr. H. H. Barnhart, the baritone, assisted in the program, rendering the four serious songs of Brahms. The organ numbers were Bach's prelude and fugue in A minor, Boellmann's Canzona, Merkels' sonata in D minor, Nocturne in B minor (Lemare), Hollins' andante in D, and Guilmant's sonata in D minor. This was the last recital of the present season, but Mr. Eaton will have a new series when people return to town.

Californians in England

Sigmund Beel is very popular in England. The Telegraph writes of one of his recent appearances in concert: "Mr. Beel is well known as a violinist of considerable attainments, one whose equipment includes a powerful tone, and a rare technical command of his instrument. There was ample variety in the matter put forward by this artist last evening, his program including a sonata for piano and violin by W. Berwald, an American composer, and also a new Irish Rhapsody from the pen of Mr. Esposito." Carrie Roma is located at Jersey for three months. She and her husband, Mr. Douglas, have taken a house of twelve rooms and are entertaining Lady Theresa Craven and others. Roma expected to return to California for six months but her engagements would not permit. She goes to Italy next season. Her "Violets" is very popular and is a favorite song on concert programs. "The Japs" at Belgrave Square were singing it recently.

Musical Fiction

James Huneker, the author of "Melomaniacs," has begun a formidable work which will occupy him for three years to come. It is to be called "Franz Liszt, His Art, and His Times." The author will visit Budapest and Weimar for facts, pictures and details. "Melomaniacs" is taken very seriously by the English reading public. It is certainly one of the most cynical of books, and leaves a most disagreeable impression on the mind. Bristling with art-jargon, it deals unmercifully with the world of music, singers, players, composers and critics alike. "The Dusk of the Gods," "The Piper of Dreams" and "The Disenchanted Symphony," are particularly weird. They show how far it is possible to go in trying to force music to express a greater burden of meaning than it was ever intended to bear. That way madness lies. The composer in "Piper of Dreams" produces an orchestral drama called "Nietzsche" which out-Strausses Richard Strauss, and the result is Mt. Pelee-like in its effects upon the hearers. The experiences of the American girl studying music abroad are satirically described, and the original of Herr Klug and his Five Blackbirds will be easily divined.

Jean Gerardy, the youngest and by far the greatest 'cellist of the world today, left on the Sierra last Thursday with his own company and Manager A. H. Canby, for an extended tour in Australia. During his stay in San Francisco Gerardy was extensively entertained by Sir Henry Heyman. The latter, by the way, has gone on his annual vacation trip and is at present visiting Mrs. J. H. Boalt at her summer home, Montefalde, in the mountains.

In the Quaker city on the second of June "Rob Roy" was presented by members of the Philadelphia Music Club at the South Broad street theatre. The part of Flora MacDonald was in the hands of a former San Francisco girl, Mabel Custer. Miss Custer is the solo alto at the Christ Memorial R. E. church in Philadelphia and is the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. William A. Custer, erstwhile of Folsom and San Francisco. She is a former pupil of Marie Withrow.

After spending two weeks in Placer county and four weeks at Lake Tahoe, Mr. Samuel Adelstein will return to town about the first of August.

BLACKHEADS, PIMPLES, FRECKLES AND TAN.

How to Remove Them.

How to Make the Skin Beautiful.

There is no remedy which will restore the complexion as quickly as Mme. A. Ruppert's Face Bleach. Thousands of patrons afflicted with most miserable skins have been delighted with its use. Many skins covered with pimples, freckles, wrinkles, eczematous eruptions (itching, burning and annoying), sallowness, brown patches and blackheads have been quickly changed to bright, beautiful complexions. Skin troubles which have baffled the most eminent physicians have been cured promptly, and many have expressed their profoundest thanks for my wonderful Face Bleach.

This marvelous remedy will be sent to any address upon receipt of price, $2.00 per single bottle, or three bottles (usually required), $5.00.

Stories of the Clergy

A Witty Oxonian

Dean Mansel was noted as a logician, and the wittiest man in Oxford. One day the cook had written on the bill of fare, for a common-room party, "Reforme cutlets." The guests laughed, but Mansel said, "The man is quite right. Reform generally ends in e mute [emeute, riot.] Of the saying, "March comes in like a lion, and goes out like a lamb,"—"Cold lamb," said Mansel. Chandler, a friend of his, was importuned to sing, but declined. "Sing Old Hundred," said one. "No," said Chandler, "I should only murder it." Being still pressed, Mansel came to the rescue with, "Chandler naturally declines to murder 'all people that on earth do dwell.'" The giving of the degree of D.D. had degenerated in Oxford into a senseless form, which was felt to be discreditable to the university. It was proposed that two theological dissertations should be made the preliminary requirement. During the discussion, Mansel wrote this epigram:

"The degree of D.D.
'Tis proposed to convey
To A double S.
By a double S A."

They were Both at Church

Rev. A. E. Dunning, D.D., of Boston, once told how on going to Minneapolis one Saturday evening a smart young fellow approached him in a free-and-easy way:

"Going to stop over Sunday?"

"Yes," replied the doctor, who usually passed for a drummer, having none of the outward signs of his calling.

"Stop at the Blank hotel, I suppose?"

"No, I am going to stop with a friend."

"Come around to the hotel to-morrow afternoon and we'll have a racket. Quite a number of the boys will be there."

"But tomorrow will be Sunday."

"I know it, and that's why we can have such a good time."

"Oh, I think that we fellows who are traveling all the time ought to keep Sunday," said the doctor.

"Yes," assented the drummer, good-naturedly, "but I'll bet you won't."

"I'll tell you what I'll do, I'll go to church tomorrow if you will."

"I'll do it. Where shall we go?"

"To the First Congregational. It's the best in town."

"All right. I'll be there, but I'll bet you won't."

The drummer was there, according to his promise, and could hardly believe his eyes when he saw his friend of the night before ascend to the pulpit. Dr. Dunning tried to find him after the service but he had fled.

His Feet Not Sybaritic

Dr. John Ritchie, the great voluntary leader, had charged the ministers of the Established Church with living too luxurious lives, faring sumptuously every day and clothing themselves in soft raiment. At a public meeting, Dr. Guthrie had to reply to the assertion. He was standing on the front of the platform; his boots were strong, iron-shod, country boots, and his trousers were bespattered with mud, for he had just walked several miles. Looking round upon the audience, and holding out his foot, he pointed to it and said:

"My friends, Dr. Ritchie declares that we are a set of dandies. Do you call that the foot of a dandy?" The appeal was irresistible.

Metaphor that Galloped

In a Virginia church, at the end of a revival, there were three persons who were expected to unite with the church. Only two were present; the third, quite an old lady, was prevented by the inclemency of the evening. A lay brother was called on to pray, which he did very fervently, "especially for the sister with one foot in the grave and the other galloping on to eternity."

OUR OPINION

Filmer and the Unions

The labor unions of San Francisco have made their influence felt by the members of the Fourth of July committee. They objected to the selection of Major George Filmer as grand marshal of the Independence Day parade because he is an enemy of union labor. They forced him to resign, whereupon Bruce Cornwall, the chairman of the committee, sent in his resignation. He explained that he had not supposed that it was necessary to belong to "any other union than that of the American States, to participate in the celebration of American Independence." Moreover he characterized the coming celebration as a "hollow mockery" and declared that he could not retain both the position and his self-respect. Mr. Cornwall was evidently indignant. At first blush it does appear to be all wrong for the labor unions to attempt to break up a Fourth of July celebration merely because a non-union employer of labor was to act as Grand Marshal. The supposition is that no sentiment but patriotism should actuate us in our Fourth of July merry-making. Partisanship of all sorts should be laid aside on that day, and perhaps it is to be regretted that the men of the unions could not forget their grievances for a few hours. But they believe that a great principle is at stake. It is a principle that involves their interests, and they think it is of greater importance to assert it at every opportunity than merely to rejoice over the great achievements of the founders of the Republic. It was loyalty to principle that made the celebration of the Fourth of July possible, and it is a virtue that tends to good citizenship. There are many labor union men who are as patriotic as either Mr. Filmer or Mr. Cornwall and who are as enthusiastic over the celebration of Independence Day, but who do not think that they should contribute to the glorification of the former while testifying to their loyalty to the country and the principles of the Constitution. However, the circumstances of their having brought their prejudices to bear to shut out Mr. Filmer and of their having succeeded do not prove that the celebration is to be a hollow mockery. The founders of this country who signed the Declaration of Independence and gave us our Constitution made just such a thing as the retirement of Mr. Filmer possible. They guaranteed the common people certain rights, and in the exercise of those rights the laboring people of San Francisco elected one of their number Mayor of the city. He sympathizes with them and as a consequence they have a considerable influence in the committee which is to have charge of the coming celebration. And it is evident that they are going to conduct it as they see fit. They are the people just now and this is a government by the people. Some years ago when the union men were not so strong as they are now, and Mr. Gavin McNab was a prominent member of the Fourth of July committee, the union musicians demanded certain things which were denied them, and they refused to toot their horns in the parade. But the day was celebrated and there was a parade, and nobody pronounced the celebration a hollow mockery. Yet there were many musicians who did not enter into the spirit of the affair. In those days the Filmers of San Francisco were the people.

Roosevelt's Defeat

President Roosevelt has met with his first defeat. But it is not to his discredit that he failed to secure reciprocity legislation for Cuba. He made a gallant fight against the Sugar Trust and lost, but he has won the respect of all decent and honest Republicans. If he were a politician of the character of McKinley, for instance, he would never have forced the issue. He need not have incurred the displeasure of the corrupt Senators and machine politicians who espoused the cause of beet sugar men. He knows that they will have great influence in the next national convention, and that they will try to beat him for having forced them to show their hand, but he did not permit his own political interests to affect his course. He knows that this country has pledged itself to do certain things for Cuba, and he is intent upon proving to the world that this is not a hypocritical nation. He has made it apparent even to those who doubted his sincerity, and who were sure that his ambition would prompt him to surrender to Hanna and his combine, that he has the courage of his convictions and that he cannot be swerved from the line of his duty. Those that have denounced him as a politician pure and simple must acknowledge now that he is a patriot. From his defeat it may be argued that he is not a great statesman but it cannot be denied that he is a man of integrity. But President Roosevelt is bound to succeed. If he were afraid of the consequences to himself there would not be much likelihood of his securing the legislation that is desired, but it is evident that he has the same contempt for machine influence that he had when a Police Commissioner of New York, and that it is his intention to invoke all the forces behind the Executive to force the opposition into line. It was the custom of McKinley to coax the Senate, and to stand in with the millionaires of the Upper House whenever they had a pet policy to enforce, but Roosevelt is a different sort of President. The pompous representatives of the plutocrats cannot awe or intimidate him. They may hold him in restraint for a short time, but when he is fighting the people's battle he is bound to win.

A Question of Happiness

A discussion has arisen as to whether "literary people" are happy. It is the sort of question one should look for in the silly season. There is no more reason why "literary people" should be happy than why iron mongers, wood workers or ditch tenders should, and it does not make any more difference in the world. No trade, profession or occupation has in itself the elements of happiness, and no one can say with assurance that he would be absolutely happy in any other situation than that in which he finds himself. Congenial employment is, naturally, more agreeable than a forced occupation, and "art for art's sake" applies as much to cookery or carpentry as it does to painting and literature. Any man or woman who will not turn out as good a piece of work as he can at whatever he is engaged is not worth the space he takes up in a workshop, but back of the pretty talk there is "work for bread and butter's sake," and that applies to literary workers as well as to artisans. Starving in a garret for love of letters is much more picturesque in books than it is elsewhere, but the truth generally is that the starving author is as little likely to make a living in any other occupation than he is in literature. People who write for a living are just as much concerned about ways and means as are others in the world. They have the same need to keep themselves and their families shod and clothed. They have to make provision for the future, and they are beset with fear lest their hands lose cunning, or some newer style relegate them to the list of back numbers. They suffer more from professional jealousy than perhaps any other class but actors, and there is the same necessity to keep themselves in view lest they be forgotten. Compensation for literary work is no greater than it is for manual toil. Literature has its compensations. Perhaps the one thing which makes it attractive to many is that it is "genteel employment." To have the name of a writer gives a certain social tone, and there are the friendships which result from meetings with cultured people with similar or parallel tastes, but happiness is not like a flower, to be plucked and pressed between book covers.

No Amendment Needed

Because a foolish girl of eighteen married a man whom she had met within two weeks, who expected her to support him on the proceeds of her shame, a contemporary advocates a change in the law which will raise the age of majority for females to twenty-two or twenty-three years. "If the law forbade marriage of persons under the age, let us say, of twenty-three, without the written consent of their parents first had and obtained, and if it made it a crime for a man to marry a girl under that age, without the consent of her parents, the number of runaway marriages of minors might be lessened." No doubt. But in the case under discussion the girl was not a minor. Evidently the thing she lacked was not years, but proper home training. No girl who at eighteen will marry a man whom she hardly knows by sight, but who tells her he is an actor in a local theatre, has had the kind of bringing up which will make her a useful or valuable member of society. Foolish marriages are not confined to children under age by any means. Just as many of the divorce scandals which occur are amongst the middle-aged and elderly, and as far as preventing runaway marriages is concerned, Reno and the tug-boat are no further out of reach for juveniles than they are for older folk. In the last generation, and the one preceding, marriages at fifteen and sixteen were not uncommon, and the mere youth of the contracting parties was never regarded as an excuse for dissatisfaction. The grandmothers and great-grandmothers of the present generation married young, worked hard and raised big families, with none of the modern conveniences, and precious little help, yet they found time to attend to the moral training of their girls, and to give them adequate sense of responsibility. Divorce was not the ready remedy in their time, and not to "get along with her husband," or to return to her father's roof was an everlasting disgrace, not only to a wife, but to both families. Now, a marriage is contracted as light-heartedly and off-hand as a ride on the street cars, and if it turns out not to be a prolonged honeymoon, there is the divorce court handy, miladi goes back to her old home and her old name as contentedly as a child from a day at the park. It would not make a particle of difference in the matter of preventing women from making fools of themselves, if the age of majority were raised to forty years. Instead of advocating laws that will cover all cases, it might be well to find out what is the matter with this generation that they should expect the age of irresponsibility to be extended indefinitely for them.

The Pestilential Chaffeur

Simultaneously, from all sections of the country comes the protest against automobilists. It is simply an aggravation of the annoyance suffered some years ago from the bicyclists, who appeared to imagine that the earth was theirs. New York has had an appalling number of fatal accidents, unfortunately none of them fatal to the owners or manipulators of the machines. Boston has her grievance, St. Louis has been heard from, and in San Mateo county the just ordinary, everyday residents advocate shooting the chaffeurs. There is no real reason why an automobile or a bicycle should be any more of a nuisance on a street or roadway than the familiar horse and wagon. The trouble lies entirely with the owners of the newer vehicles. They respect no rights but their own, and seem to take a pride and satisfaction in being as annoying as possible. To rush past a horse and frighten the animal into running away is great sport, and to come shooting round a corner at breakneck speed, and especially at nightfall, is the best of all fun. With bicyclists one has the poor satisfaction of knowing that if one is run down, there is a pretty fair chance that the rider will not escape scathless, and that the machine itself may come to grief, but with the automobile even that much is denied. It is a curious development of human nature that there appears to be no such thing as satisfaction in moderation. To make reasonable headway is not enough, so long as it is possible to go a little faster, so our highways are infested with a tribe of scorchers whose sole aim and only pleasure is in passing everything they can and running down the rest. If automobilists must race, they should build speed tracks and confine their competitions to them. Public roads and public streets belong to the whole community, and not to any one class.

The University Training

According to the views of a college president men do not go to the universities nowadays to become scholars, but to obtain the training that comes from association. We should wish that the theory were well founded, but we do not believe that it is. It is surely not in consonance with the views expressed by Bishop Burgess in his baccalaureate sermon preached at Columbia University. He declared that the students of today are handed over to specialists who have substituted for the old liberal education a multitude of technical schools for the cramming of the memory and the killing of the intellect. But according to the college president the university is a school of manners where young men benefit by association. That may be true of the English universities where the training is of a social rather than of a scholastic character. The English universities go to the other extreme. There is plenty of leisure in them for the cultivation of the art of living. The atmosphere is quite different from that of the American schools, where the mercantile influence predominates. Englishmen are pleased to have their sons browse in the pastures of literature and are not always eager to have them become Captains of Industry. In a measure the colleges of England are clubs where young men cultivate acquaintanceship. American college presidents have sneered at the English universities because of their failure to keep up to date. They have pointed with pride to the fact that American colleges give an actual training that fit men in a very positive way for the struggle of life. They have boasted of their system which equips a man for industrial competition. Hence the kick of Bishop Burgess, who longs for the old atmosphere. The fact is, that university life in this country has become a reflex of that on the other side of the walls. The most cherished ideals are those of the utilitarian. Occasionally a young man selects his university with a view to congenial association, but it is the association which the gridiron affords. He is not in search of a training in what used to be called the humanities, or in an intellectual way.

The Saunterer

Cupid's Climax

Mrs. E. Avery McCarthy is no longer a grass-widow. Perhaps the news of her second marriage will get into the dailies before this issue of Town Talk appears, but at this time there are less than half a dozen people in San Francisco who are aware of the fact that she is now the wife of J. J. Moore, the wealthy California street commission merchant, whose home, Fair Oaks, in Menlo Park is famous for its hospitality. The news came to me almost directly from the bride on Tuesday of this week. It was a private message. Mrs. McCarthy and her brother left this city for the East about two weeks ago, and a few days later Mr. Moore followed her. They met and were married in an Eastern city. It was in October of last year that the Avery McCarthys were divorced. It was a polite divorce sans scandal and sans everything that could be converted into food for the gossips. It was a case of incompatibility of temperament, and the beautiful young wife, who was formerly Lilian Wagner, had many sympathizers. As Mrs. McCarthy she was one of the most charming and popular young matrons in the swim, and during the last opera season she was pronounced the handsomest woman in San Francisco society.

A Sensational Scare

Shortly after the divorce it was rumored, and I stated so at the time, that Mr. Moore was paying the young grass-widow such devoted attention that he was suspected of harboring intentions matrimonial. But Mr. Moore was then encumbered. He had a wife from whom he had been separated for several years, but who would not vouchsafe him liberty. In November last I told of the shock received by his guests at a house party when the surprising information was buzzed about that one of the female servants was a private detective set by Mrs. Moore to keep tab on the doings in the beautiful home of her husband. Things had been running their "properest," but no one, not even a very proper person, likes to feel that a private detective has eyes glued on his or her every action. So, of course, the report threw uncanny creeps over the guests.

There Were Other Wooers

Whether there was any foundation to the suspicion I do not know, but the guests were afraid, and as adroitly as possible they made their excuses and flitted back to town. The suspected maid was promptly dismissed. At that time it was said that Moore was willing to place a very handsome sum at the disposal of his wife on the day that she would make no objection to a divorce. At any rate, Mr. Moore was eager to regain his freedom, and it is now evident that the object of his passion was the beautiful grass-widow who is now his wife. The social gossips who insisted upon finding a husband for her immediately after her divorce were not quite sure whether she would be won by Moore, by Frank Goad or by a New York millionaire.

THE STANDARD FOR CHAMPAGNE QUALITY IS

THE WORLD OVER

Cheating on the Links

Last week I stated that the popularity of golf was on the wane and attributed the growing apathy of the devotees of the sport to the fact that the clubs were no longer exclusive. But there is another reason. It is of the feminine gender. Poor, weak, frail and meek femininity! What awful crimes are saddled on thy narrow shoulders! The latest charge against the skirted sex is that it has corrupted golf. Judge Coffey once remarked that women were prone to lie under oath; that the sex had a penchant for perjury, and I have heard it said that woman was less reluctant than man to hold five aces in a little game of poker, but gambling implies bad morals. I know that even bridge-whist has promoted evil practices, but I supposed that if there was one pastime on earth so wholesome and pure as to encourage honesty among its votaries that one was the good, old and revered game there is played under the blue canopy of heaven with the beauties of nature to inspire its exponents with noble ambition.

A Game of Honor

But an iconoclastic suburbanite has shattered my fond imagings. From over the channel, in that breezy burg made famous by the bibulous Baron, comes the shocking story of "fudging" on the links. Now, golf is a game of honor. It is played for recreation and trophies, and you cannot get much enjoyment out of it if eternal vigilance is the price of victory. If your opponent is a hundred or so feet away you don't demand that he or she wait until you become Johnny on the Spot. You repose implicit confidence in your opponent's honor, but my friend, the suburbanite, declares that you can't do that in San Rafael. If you do you are most likely to lose. And as a consequence, cheating has been so rife that if you become expert and win many contests you are likely to be viewed with suspicion, and hence the growing unpopularity of the game.

Real Estate Methods

It is all very unfortunate and scandalous. And I am assured that the fair sex is largely responsible for the condition of affairs. Two or three very prominent matrons and one or two belles are under suspicion. It is pretty tough for a woman to hazard her reputation by winning a game of golf, and therefore I am reluctant to give credence to the gossip. But even the men do not escape suspicion, and by way of illustration I will refer to the case of a well-known real estate agent of this city, who is a crank on golf and who spends a lot of time on the links in San Rafael. He belongs to a prominent firm of real estate dealers in this city, and he is rated high by Bradstreet, but he doesn't stand one, two, three among the golfists, and merely because he insists on winning. The other day a gentleman explained that he didn't care to play with this expert, saying, "You know he employs real estate methods to win his games."

Those Diamonds and Dimes

Echoes of the late Grand Parlor of the Native Daughters have not yet died away, and they have a raucous sound. The presentation of diamond earrings to ex-Grand President Genevieve Baker did not meet with unanimous approval, and now it is said that business was mixed with sentiment. The diamonds are said to have a past. The story is that they were once the assets of a jeweler who became insolvent. When his creditors sought the stones they could not be found. Now it is said that he had presented them to his wife, who subsequently pledged them as security for a loan from one of the members of the order. The latter sold them to the committee, by whose order they were reset for Mrs. Baker. And there is also gossip about the cup presented to Lillie Reichling Dyer. It was supposed to have been made out of dimes contributed by the Native Daughters and melted down for the cup. This cup is supposed to contain one hundred and twenty-five dollars in dimes, but somebody discovered that it was marked sterling, and now it said that there is not more than twenty-five dollars' worth of silver in it. There is also a deal of talk about the misappropriation of funds contributed for the entertainment of delegates and diverted for the ornamentation of officers. But notwithstanding the heavy expenses there is a little balance of about three hundred dollars, and it is proposed to donate one hundred of that to Miss Lizzie Douglass, secretary of the committee of arrangements.

The stellar attraction at the home of the James Moffitts just now is Alice's baby. Mrs. George Doubleday with her little girl is visiting her parents in Oakland. The baby is named Marguerite, after Marguerite Joliffe (Mrs. Herbert Moffitt), who was Alice Moffitt's bosom friend. Mrs. Moffitt, by the way, cannot pursue acquaintance with her namesake on this visit. She is in Europe with her husband and sister.

Harrison's Revenge

Though William Greer Harrison and General Barnes buried the hatchet some time ago, and are now popularly regarded as bosom friends, the sincerity of the Olympic Club president is not unquestioned. Some time ago Mr. Harrison, who is a brawny athletic with well seasoned muscles hardened by constant exercise, lured General Barnes into the gymnasium of the Olympic Club and induced him to strip and jog around the track. And while the General was in motion Mr. Harrison acted as pacemaker and at the same time expatiated on the healthfulness of constant exercise. Incidentally he pointed with pride to himself as an example of what may be accomplished by athletic work. He declared that it improved the figure and tended to longevity. The General listened and was tempted. Now he is an athlete. There is nothing that Harrison does that Barnes can't do. The General has become a cross-country runner, a hurdle jumper and a mountain climber. He has reduced his embonpoint, and restored the graceful curves of youth. His face has the glow of health, and he appears to be in fine fettle, but there are skeptics who shake their heads deprecatingly when they see him perspiring in the gym, and they do not hesitate to declare that William Greer Harrison is wreaking a fearful revenge—that he is killing Barnes by inches.

Dewey to Command

It has been generally supposed that Admiral Dewey no longer cared for active service, but a resident of this city who has been sojourning in Washington for several weeks, and who enjoyed the Admiral's hospitality, declares in a letter to a friend that the hero of Manila bay is eager to return to the sea. "He told me," writes the San Franciscan, "that at President Roosevelt's request he has consented to take command of the big fleet which will engage in manoeuvres in the West Indies next winter. And I do not think it will be his farewell appearance, for I think the charms of married life are no longer so soothing to the old sea-dog as those of the ocean wave. He is quite enthusiastic over the prospect of going to sea again. The fleet will be the largest ever assembled by the United States in time of peace. It will consist of three squadrons, the North Atlantic, the European and the South Atlantic, with a torpedo flotilla and necessary colliers. I asked the Admiral if he had selected his flagship and he said he had not, but that in all probability he would command the big fleet from the bridge of the Olympia. 'I led the way into Manila bay on the Olympia, you know,' said Dewey, 'and I like her.' By the way, the Admiral also told me that President Roosevelt expects to attend the manoeuvres."

Should Roosevelt go to the West Indies he would be the second President who went beyond the limits of the United States during his term of office. Grover Cleveland was the only other. He went out to sea on a yachting cruise. There is no Constitutional inhibition imposed on the President to keep him within the boundaries of his country, but either through sentiment or a reluctance to take any chances none of the Presidents except Cleveland ever ventured far away. Should Roosevelt go to the Indies he would be absent a few weeks, and the probability is that an acting President would be designated. Secretary Hay being next in line of succession would have this unique honor.

The Rebuke That Failed

In all probability the Examiner will soon be restored to the Bohemian Club's files. It will be remembered that when the commercial element of the club sought to rebuke the Examiner for espousing the cause of labor by ordering that paper off the files, the representatives of that journal resigned in a body. Many of the members were of the opinion that the attempted rebuke reflected discredit on the club, but there was never much discussion of the matter until the arrival of Joe Redding from New York some days ago. Redding came out to sire the club's mid-summer jinks, and incidentally to get a breath of fog and fresh air. It was not long before he remarked the absence of the newspaper men from the club, and when he was told the story of their resignation he became indignant. He declared that the members who were responsible for the blacklisting of the Examiner had acted like a lot of school boys and that they should be ashamed of themselves. Redding's judgment is highly respected in the club for there are not many of his type left, and I think that he has started a reaction of sentiment. I doubt, however, whether the restoration of the Examiner to the files would result in a reconciliation with the newspaper men who resigned.

Grand Marshal Wallace

The citizens of Monterey have chosen Allan Wallace for their Fourth of July Grand Marshal. A singular role, isn't it, for one of the New York 400 to assume? But Allan Wallace, the great-grandson of the original Commodore Vanderbilt, founder of the Vanderbilt fortune, is a unique aristocrat. Though he has a seat in the New York Stock Exchange as a representative of the firm of John Wallace & Co., brokers, the commercial spirit doesn't dominate him. The family fortune is large enough to suit him. Culture comes with the third generation, it is said, if those that preceded it had the opportunities which wealth affords, and Allan Wallace bears out the theory. His temperament is not of the sordid variety. His keen appreciation of the atmosphere of old Monterey, the dreamy village by the sea, bespeaks a soul such as few of the progeny of our plutocrats possess. And it is there that this scion of the house of Vanderbilt has found congenial company. Not among the prosperous guests of Del Monte did he find kindred spirits, but over in the old town founded by the missionaries, with its historic spots fraught with delightful reminiscences, among the plain but picturesque people whose customs have survived the Gringo's advent, and whose observances are interwoven with early recollections that are essentially venerable. And those are the people who, proud of the fact that their old town with its adobes, and its unpretentious surroundings, is appreciated by the rich young New Yorker, have honored him by electing him, a stranger though he is, to the position of Grand Marshal of their Independence Day parade. And that is no small honor in Monterey.

Allan Wallace, by the way, is a Harvard graduate, and though he prefers the lackadaisical to the strenuous life, he was far from being listless at college. He graduated with high honors, and his proficiency as a French scholar won for him the highest prize in that department. His mother,

The Tourists Were Shocked

Walter Hobart and his wife, unlike most Californians, do not want to jaunt through Europe without first saying "Howdy-do" to the wonders of their own country. They have been "doing" the Yosemite with "Tom" Driscoll and "Eddie" Tobin, and are almost as big an attraction as Sentinel Dome. The Eastern tourists especially are anxious to see the young man who scattered so many millions, for ever since the story came out that Hobart was "broke" absurd tales of his prodigality have taken root. People seem disappointed in Hobart's democratic, good-natured manner and no one has yet been able to trace him by the eagles he flings to the breezes. Dressed in rough outing togs that are anything but "smart" he goes his way apparently unconscious of the comments that follow in his wake. Mrs. Hobart, in her short linen dresses and soft felt hat is one of the few women at the hotel who have left all their ruffles behind them. The other morning a wealthy Eastern woman was introduced to Mrs. Hobart, and impressed perhaps with the simplicity of her costume remarked, in a somewhat insinuating manner, "I suppose you are staying at one of the camps." "No," answered Mrs. Hobart sweetly, "but I wish we were, one is not so likely to run into bores when in camp." The Schmiedell party and the Hobarts form quite a Californian contingent and are giving the foreigners a taste of what to expect in San Francisco. Until their arrival the conventional Eastern fashionables walked shy of the deep verandaed club-house where masculine thirst is quenched. The other morning the Hobart party walked over and calmly took one of the tables on the porch. The tourists were shocked to see the ladies drink but as the thermometer went up their indignation cooled, and before the day was over other parties timidly approached the porch.

The Squaw and the Shirt

"Eddie" Tobin had an unusual experience in the Yosemite. One morning recently he went on a fishing trip with Driscoll and Hobart. They resolved to follow the Indians who fish for a living and who appear to have a cinch on trout. They got up before dawn and trailed the redmen to the cascades. The aborigines were pulling in fish as fast as they could bait the lines, but the Blingumites could not wheedle a trout. They soon learned that it was the worm that the Indians used that did the trick. They proceeded to negotiate with the squaw who held the can of bait, and they tempted her with an offer of a dollar a worm, but she wouldn't close the bargain until Tobin threw in his gaudy shirtwaist. He didn't like to part with the blouse but the squaw insisted. This is probably the first time that a fashionable young man ever swapped his shirt for a bunch of worms.

Extravagance in the Yosemite

The Yosemite Commissioners are not going to degrade the falls with electric lights. Their annual meeting in the valley was punctuated with the usual good cheer, though there was a deal of brow wrinkling over the electric light problem. The commissioners have already spent the plumpest half of the appropriation for a plant and the work is still in its infancy. Where the rest of the money is to come from is a question no one seems able to answer. Where the money has gone to is almost as difficult an interrogation. One palpable waste was the hauling of lumber for poles all the way from Chinese Camp. It takes eight horses to bring in fourteen of these poles and the expense would make any one but a commissioner dizzy. Felling trees in the valley is of course prohibited but just outside its sacred precincts there is plenty available timber for the purpose. For some occult reason the lumber is being hauled by slow freight from Chinese Camp. The need of electricity for ordinary lighting purposes is not exaggerated. The home-made gas now used in the hotels and cottages is an uncertain, nauseating quantity. But the idea of garnishing the falls with arc lights is a shock to every lover of nature. Someone took Jack Wilson, the new commissioner, out to see Vernal falls by moonlight. "Well, what do you think of putting in electric lights there?" he was asked when the party returned to the hotel.

"I see that nature is still doing business at the old stand," replied Jack, "and we won't enter the competition."

However, from the present financial outlook, the completion of the plant for practical illumination is likely to lag for lack of gold.

What McAllister Said

"Wardie" McAllister doesn't pose as an epigrammatist but he says a good thing once in a while. He was asked recently what he thought of Horace Platt as an after-dinner speaker.

"I think he thinks other people's thoughts better than his own," was the reply.

Mr. McAllister was introduced to Mrs. Atherton at Pastori's a few weeks ago. As they shook hands McAllister puzzled the authoress by remarking, "I have never had the pleasure of meeting you before, but I can read."

By the way, the question as to whether the blood in Mr. McAllister's veins is a shade bluer than that which flows beneath the surface of Enrique Grau, the aristocratic Peruvian Consul, is still a moot one. Both discussed it in a corner of the Pacific-Union Club some time ago. The discussion threatened to engender much bad blood without any likelihood of settling the question of blue blood. Somebody suggested that they should shed a little and subject it to microscopical examination. McAllister contended that it was solely a question of pedigree, and he afterwards said: "Grau comes from Peru and so I suppose one must take his word for what he claims."

A Tree Tempest at Berkeley

President Wheeler's hatchet has been honed for action so long that the initiated were not surprised when so many heads dropped into the basket. Oddly enough, the only sensational change was the lowering of Superintendent Kellner to the position of head gardener. There has been a merry war in Berkeley over Kellner for the last year and the "Prex" has given every reason to suppose that he was pro-Kellner. The controversy had resolved itself into a society wrangle and for a while it looked as though the Berkeley ton would be rent asunder by the affair. Now people are undecided whether it was to save society or for the sake of the college grounds that President Wheeler moved Kellner down the line. The affair was started by a charming young over-the-grass widow whose marriage some years ago and subsequent divorce were meat for the gossips. Her family moved in the exclusive set in Oakland, and she was a great belle with the eligibles of our local Athens. After her divorce, she resumed her maiden name and forswore all save the serious things of life. The family moved to the college town and their beautiful home is one of the show places of Berkeley. The young widow is a prominent member of all the clubs and is particularly active in everything that makes for beautifying Berkeley. She is president of a club formed to encourage purer architecture and every prospective builder is waited upon by a committee willing to point the way to architectural chastity.

Some time ago she noticed that Captain Kellner was thinning out the trees on the college grounds. In vain she cried "Woodman, spare that tree!" or words to the same effect. The unheeding superintendent went right on with his work. The widow roused the interest of others and protests began to be heard on all sides. The anti-Kellnerites charged the Captain with felling trees that had every right to live and they called him an arbitrary Teuton and declared he knew more about military tactics than forestry. The Captain kept on cutting. The wrangle waxed fierce and President Wheeler called in Superintendent McLaren of Golden Gate Park to pass judgment on Kellner and he evidently approved Kellner's plans for the trees continued to fall. Mrs. Hearst was importuned but she declined to break into the controversy. However the proper pull must have been brought to bear for Captain Kellner has been reduced to the rank.

An Actress of Character

Judith Berolde, who is supporting Frederick Warde this season, is the wife of Edward Marshall, the Examiner-Journal correspondent who was wounded and crippled as he was rushing in the van up the heights of La Quisama, Cuba. Miss Berolde is a very beautiful woman and has been on the stage for several years. She came to San Francisco first as the star in a rural melodrama called "A Long Lane" that played a two weeks' engagement at the Bush street theatre. Though the play was a good one and well acted, it did not make a great noise during its run and only drew small audiences. On her next visit here Miss Berolde was young Allesandro Salvini's leading lady and her work in "Don Caesar de Bazan" and "The Three Guardsmen" was highly praised. After her return to the East she retired to private life for some time and did not again seek the footlights until her husband's misfortunes forced her to the step. She is a woman of character as noble as her beauty.

The most delightfully blended whisky known to the human palate is "Jesse Moore"—the standard for over fifty years.

A Game Correspondent

Edward Marshall, as I remember him in the height of his health and prosperity, was a splendid type of newspaper man. He was then, about six years ago, Sunday editor of the Journal, which position he left to accept a similar one on the World. He had also attained some reputation as a writer on dramatic topics in the magazines. He was very enthusiastic over his profession. When the war with Spain broke out Marshall was again in Hearst's pay, and he was one of the first to volunteer to go to the front. He was hit very early in the great fight, a ball taking him in the spine. When they picked him up he was still conscious, and before he was examined they asked him:

"Where did you get it, Marshall?"

The bullet had caused numbness so the wounded man did not really know where he was hit.

"I pass," he answered with a smile, "any old place from hat to moccasins, I guess."

They thought he was dead. He was taken to New York and a delicate operation was performed upon his spine by House Surgeon Winfield Scott Schley Jr., son of Commodore Schley, at St. Luke's hospital. The result of the injury to the spine was to cause a pressure on the spinal cord, an interruption of the action of the nerves controlling the movements of the lower part of the body, and partial paralysis. But Marshall recovered, though he was crippled and could never more engage in the active labor that had been his delight. He wrote a book on the Rough Riders' campaign, a virile account of the engagements in Cuba. His wife returned to the stage. One of Marshall's fellow correspondents in Cuba, by the way, was Richard Harding Davis, who wrote of him when despatches of "His Life the Price of News" were flashing over the country: "The spirit of Mr. Marshall was as admirable as that of any soldier on the field. He was shot in the first firing line, and though the bullet passed within an inch of his spine and threw him into frequent and terrible convulsions, he continued in his intervals of consciousness to write his account of the fight and gave it to a wounded soldier to be forwarded to his paper. This devotion to duty by a man who knew he was dying was as fine as any of the many courageous and inspiring deeds that occurred during the two hours of breathless, desperate fighting." This courage Marshall carried into his life afterwards when the doctors told him that, though he would live, he would never be strong again.

Striking Resemblances

Judge Lawlor discovered the other day that he was the "double" of Fred Belasco, the playwright. The discovery was made in the Bohemian Club where he was accosted by Dr. Crandall, U. S. N., of the Iowa, who is en route to Manila where he is to establish a naval hospital. The doctor talked to the judge several minutes on the subject of the theatre and the drama, until finally the jurist told him of his mistake. While on the subject of "doubles" I am reminded of the fact that Pope Leo has one in this city in the person of Herman Shainwald, the real estate dealer. The resemblance is very striking, and in consequence a picture of the Pope hangs in the Shainwald residence.

Birth Months and Characteristics

One Elizabeth Sourdry discoursed through two columns of a recent Bulletin on birth months and their influence on people. One of her theories is that a child takes its characteristics from the progenitor born in the same month as himself. But one thing that knocks Madame Sourdry's pre-natal theory is twins. Twins, as is well known, do not always look alike and only occasionally have characteristics in common. Many years ago Mrs. Ella Sterling Cummins, now Mrs. Philip Verrill Mighels, wrote an article on birth months for one of the dailies. She cast some very interesting horoscopes. I remember she wrote that Ralston and Sharon were January men who, like James G. Blaine, were powerless to overcome their destiny. Ralston she chose as a specially strong illustration. He started out with great anticipations, a prince among men with all the gifts of the good fairies within reach, but when passing into his seventh stage of life disaster overtook him. Had he weathered his July he would have regained all his lost hopes. The same would have happened with the Plumed Knight.

Senator Stanford was a March man, as is ex-President Cleveland. William T. Coleman and Hall McAllister were February men, said to be "wise and well balanced beyond the average."

Not Looking for a Husband Here

I hear that there is no great flutter among our golden youth over the coming of Mrs. McLean Martin's daughter to her old home. All the flutter is among the women who are anxious to see Theodosia Cook Martin's gowns, and listen to what she has to relate about Washington and its marvels in men and manners. Mrs. Martin, Theodosia's mother, never made any pretense of approving of San Francisco society men. She married two very fine men herself—Dan Cook and Henry McLean Martin—and she looks for a great match for her elder daughter. And she does not expect to find an eligible parti for the stately Theodosia in the wild West. Miss Cook-Martin has a dot of admirable proportions inherited from her father. When Grandmamma Colton passes away, she will likely leave her money to her granddaughters, Theodosia Cook, Katherine Martin and Helen Thornton.

It Was a Fake

The story of the sole survivor of St. Pierre, the prisoner in the underground cell of the jail who was serving a sentence of thirty days, and who was found nearly dead three days after the eruption, has been proved to be a fake. But it was published so broadcast that it will probably be included in the permanent records of the disaster. There was no underground cell in the jail, the French officer who was credited with rescuing the prisoner never heard of him, and finally the man who started the story admits that it was based on nothing more stable than his imagination. Yet some of the dailies published pictures of the prisoner, "photographed on the spot."

His Stenographer Came

The Utah editors who arrived some days ago were very indignant over the manner in which they were treated by the agent of the Southern Pacific Company at Portland. He had been instructed to issue transportation to each editor and his wife, but he was a cautious young man and upon inquiry he learned that some of the men in the party were not editors but mere reporters, and that some of the ladies were not wives. In discussing the matter Editor Penrose of the Desert News, the official organ of the Mormon church, explained that in some instances a daughter was substituted for a wife, but that there was no intention to deceive the railroad company. "Now," he said, "take my case. I wasn't accompanied by my wife. I brought my stenographer."

For over half a century "Jesse Moore" Whisky has held its supremacy as the best, purest and most palatable.

Honolulu's Passionate Poet

P. Maurice McMahon, the Poet of Passion of Hawaii, whose volume of virile verse I reviewed some months ago, has returned to Honolulu after some weeks in Samoa. He had hoped to find a warm welcome for his poesy among the fond natives of the Southern Seas but confessed with a heavy heart that romance is dead even where Stevenson sang his stirring songs. "The curse of the islands is linen and the necessity of its washing," writes P. Maurice to me. "Do you sit upon the silver beach and watch the white horses of the surf prancing over the beauteous coral reefs, your very heart is wrung by the appeal of some magnificent Samoan for your laundry. Grant it and he hies to his hut and tosses the clothing to the women folk, for the chiefs do not work. They love to lie in the shadow of the bread-fruit trees and watch the fair maids toil in the running stream, mangling the unmentionables on the rocks, and laving them in the cool waters that run from the distant mountains."

The Poet's Dream

McMahon is sore grieved at the absence of that glamour he had fancied over all things in Samoa. Even the charm of fair women was wanting, he says. He had pictured a very rankness of beauty and himself sitting all day among it; a garden where all was loveliness unadorned and where the yearnings of his soul might find surcease of yearning in a surfeit of delights. The finishing stanzas of his poem to Samoan ladies, written just before he took ship for the further trops, tell the dream he had hoped to see realized:—

Talofa, Taupo, soon will I come unto you,
Soon will I fold you close unto my heart;
And the songs that I fashion forever I'll hum to you,
Ever and ever, and never to part.

Talofa, Talofa! oh, smile to my yearning,
Drain the wild rapture that flows in my veins!
Nurse me and succor me, ease the mad burning
That surges within me: Love's bliss-laden pains.

"Nary a bliss," writes the Poet. "Did I make endeavor to hold communion with one of the dusky blanchisseuses, her husky father, brother or husband taxed me for my week's washing. I found some favor by changing several times a day and bringing a bundle whenever I dropped in for palaver, but it palled on me. Before I left I had accumulated twenty-six suits of underclothes and pajamas enough to fit out a Christian Association. I had bundles with every pretty woman in Samoa, and had to hide in the cocoanut groves when I had no linen to hand the chiefs who came hourly to my bungalow. The curse of Samoa is the washing habit."

Black Corduroy Popular

Black corduroy is much affected by modish women this year, for traveling and outing suits. At first sight it appears an unsuitable material for the season, but on second thought, it strikes one as just right. Men wear corduroy for hunting, tramping or riding, and now women have found out its good qualities. Nearly all the smart young matrons have corduroy walking suits and now most of the unmarried ones are following suit.

Connoisseurs of perfect goods appreciate "Jesse Moore" Whiskey for its purity and delightful flavor. It is without a peer.

A Pioneer Family

Juliet Wilbur Tomkins, who is spending the summer in her native State, is a representative of a well known pioneer family. Her grandfather was District Judge Fletcher H. Haight, who in the early fifties built one of the first pretentious residences in this city. It was in Jackson street near Taylor, a site that was then among the sand hills. It was there that Juliet's mother, Sarah Haight, one of the belles of her day, was married to Gilbert Tompkins the stock man who owned a large breeding farm at Pleasanton.

The Blairs Going to Japan

Mrs. Blair and Miss Jennie Blair are going to Japan and purpose proceeding thence to India and so on to Europe. Their present plan is to explore the Old World thoroughly and give fully two years to that pleasing task. Miss Blair is anxious to revisit Paris where she spent so many years. She speaks French like a native of Paree, having received the finishing touches to her education in the gay capital. It is likely that Miss Blair will add to her collection of slipper models and miniatures during her travels.

Fashionable Parisians no longer wear flowers attached to their person. They carry them but never attach them to their gowns.

Death of Charles Bon

Charley Bon, a member of Oakland's city council, and the owner of the Mont Rouge vineyard, died at his home across the bay last Sunday, after a brief illness. Mr. Bon was a popular young business man, and had been prominently identified with the Californian wine industry for many years. His wines were better known abroad than any other brands produced on this coast. There are very few men in this State who were as skilled as Charley Bon in handling the juice of the grape.

A Juror's Reasons

The ratiocination by which a jury arrives at a verdict is one of the mysteries that lawyers have never been able to solve. But there is nothing cryptic about the process of reasoning indulged the other day by a juror in our Superior court. He was a member of a jury that rendered a verdict for three thousand dollars against the United Railways and in favor of a man who had been injured by a car. It was his talk that won the case. After retiring several of the jurors proceeded to discuss the case.

"Oh, what's the use of talking," said the plaintiff's champion. "Let us give him three thousand dollars."

"But he was plainly guilty of contributory negligence," argued one of his confreres.

"Well, supposing he was; didn't they issue thirty million dollars' worth of bonds the other day?"

"I believe they did," replied the other juror.

"And wasn't he hurt?"

"Yes."

"Well, they can afford to give him three thousand dollars."

And the majority of the jury voted against the bond issue.

Mr. and Mrs. George D. Graham sailed on Monday for Honolulu, and will be gone a month.

That Big Mining Deal

So many mining frauds have been perpetrated in this State that people are quick to give credence to such rumors as those concerning the fleecing of the millionaires who purchased the Sweepstake property in Trinity county. There were certainly some suspicious circumstances connected with that deal, among others being the refusal, as I have been told, of the owners to negotiate with California capital. But that may have been due to their knowledge of the lack of enthusiasm among Californians who have come to believe that there are no more rich mines to be prospected in this State. But the story of the "salting" of the mine is absurd. That the people who sold the property had confidence in it is evident from the fact that they accepted a small fraction of the purchase price in cash and contracted for the remainder on a percentage basis. The rich Philadelphians who thought that the property was much richer than it now appears to be are no doubt disappointed, but the coast will not get much of a blackeye in Philadelphia, for it is capital from that sleepy city which has complete control of the Tonopah district, the richest mining territory that was ever located.

The Unique Trumbo

Colonel Isaac Trumbo evidently worked the receivership of the Golden Cross litigation for all it was worth. Colonel Isaac Trumbo is one of those mysterious, affable, and always prosperous looking individuals who appear to have no wits to live by, and yet who evidently live by nothing else. Chevaliers d'industrie is the name by which they are designated in Paris, but here we call them "promoters." This is a vague designation and is not one of opprobrium. It is bestowed on those who have a knack for inducing men of means to invest their capital in various enterprises. Colonel Trumbo was at one time interested in mining properties in Utah, and he expected to represent that State in the United States Senate. It was said by his enemies that he was a Mormon, but he has always posed as an Episcopalian. Nobody appears to know the source of Trumbo's income or the extent of his wealth, but he always appears to be in affluence. He is not a man of culture, but he poses as one and attitudinizes as a dilettante. As such he is a shining light of the Bohemian Club, where a wit once remarked that he knew as much about art as Harry Gray does about science. When Paderewski was here Colonel Trumbo showed him a deal of attention and induced him to play Chopin on a piano in a French restaurant. The Colonel is a valuable raconteur when discussing his own achievements, and he loves to tell of his visit to Rome, where a Cardinal waited on him and the Pope threw the Vatican wide open. He is a most hospitable chap, is the Colonel, and entertains superbly in his new and palatial home which is presided over by a very charming wife.

Matrimony and the Ex-Mayor

Now that Miss Ada Sullivan is traveling abroad in the same party with Mr. James D. Phelan, the tabbies are again coupling their names in a matrimonial way. It appears that Mr. Phelan cannot move a step on his travels without having the gossips on his track. But this rumor of an engagement between the ex-Mayor and Miss Sullivan is no new one. It has been a nutritious morsel for the society tabbies on regular occasions since its birth many years ago. But here it is, blossoming again. When Mr. Phelan was in Washington, the correspondents coupled his name with that of another San Francisco woman—Mrs. McLean Martin. They will be joining him with Sybil Sanderson if he pays another visit to Paris. I am surprised that no one has suggested as the reason of his European trip that Mr. Phelan was following up Emma Eames Story, for whom he has often expressed a candid admiration.

Eccentric McDowell

Until the despatches from New York told of Harry Bordon McDowell's latest misadventure, many people here fancied him no longer in the land of the quick. When his Theatre of Arts and Letters failed McDowell apparently sank from public view, for his name no longer appeared in the despatches. He honestly intended that Theatre to fill a long-felt want, and improve the dramatic culture of New York. His idea was to give untried playwrights a fighting chance. McDowell was always bristling with ideas. He and Harry Bigelow bought the Ingleside from the Argonaut, with the intention of making a specialty of Oriental subjects. A Japanese village then on exhibition here was fully described, and the prettiest Japanese girl in the tea-house was made a special study. McDowell was great on color and atmosphere and he was one of the first to exploit Chinatown as a field for descriptive work. But in time he began to pose as a reformer and got himself into trouble. The late Judge Levy almost succeeded in railroading him to jail. After the Ingleside died McDowell became a special writer on the Examiner but he soon tired of daily journalism. For a time he had dramatic aspirations and he appeared with a society star who made her debut under the auspices of Mrs. Julia Melville Snyder. He was a frost.

The McDowell Family

Henry Bordon McDowell is one of the two sons of the late Major-General Irwin McDowell, U. S. A., who in 1865 was in command of this Department. The other son died in boyhood and of the two daughters, the younger was a confirmed invalid from brain trouble. Nelly, the elder girl, was a great favorite in society when General and Mrs. McDowell entertained at Fort Mason, then called Black Point. The McDowells were wealthy, Mrs. McDowell's father having left her a large fortune derived from contracts he made with the Government during the Civil War, for the use of a horse shoe which he had invented. From the despatches it appears that though Harry McDowell was a failure at almost everything he undertook he managed to win a rich wife. It was with her money that he got into the Trust company whose funds he is said to have embezzled.

Northrup and Marie

Both Northrup Cowles and Marie Zane in the course of their travels, I am informed, have reached Paris. And now there is speculation in swelldom as to the likelihood of the "old feeling" coming o'er them in the event of their meeting. Marriage ruptured a very cordial relationship when Northrup made Marie his bride. It was a strategic concession to the conventions which shattered a romance and sundered two hearts. Now that they are divorced there is no obstacle in the way of a reunion. If they should decide to come together how full of material would the reconciliation be for a new drama with the eternal sex problem as a theme.

Why Kahn is Worried

The friends of Mr. E. J. Livernash are trying to persuade him to enter the contest for Congress in the Fourth district, and the friends of Julius (Bull) Kahn are very much alarmed. Conditions were propitious for Kahn when he scored his triumphs in the past, but with Livernash as an opponent he would find himself de trop among the laboring men who constitute the bulk of the voting element in the Fourth. Livernash has a record as a champion of the Labor cause which is beyond question. It was made in Washington where he won distinction as the protagonist of the struggle for Chinese Exclusion when Kahn and the other representatives of California were posing and sidestepping. Livernash won the admiration of the biggest statesmen in Washington by his earnestness and the force of his wonderful intellect. With a man of his superb character, rare mental equipment and exceptional forensic ability representing California in the halls of national legislation, the interests of this State would be given the attention which they deserve. Unfortunately Mr. Livernash is not ambitious of political honors and I seriously doubt whether he can be induced to accept the nomination.

The Belligerent Grady

Lawyers who fail to respect the professional code of courtesy which impels polite practitioners to refrain from blackguarding opposing counsel would do well to make sure that Senator W. D. Grady is not included in the anathemas they pronounce. A few days ago Attorney Frank Barris and Grady were before Judge Hunt. Barris testified that he went to Grady's office to find out the merits of his case and that he was ordered out.

"It was a mighty good thing you went, too," interrupted Grady.

"I suppose you would have chewed my ear off if I hadn't," retorted Barris.

"No, but you would have occupied a slab at the morgue," replied Grady.

Judge Hunt stopped the colloquy at the retort courteous, and Grady and Barris contented themselves with making faces at each other. Grady did take off a piece of an enemy's ear once during an animated argument, but he insists that such is not his habit. This is the same Grady who brought suit some weeks ago for the ex-husband of Camille D'Arville against her present husband for damages for alienating the wife's affections. She returned from the East the other day to help fight the suit.

Leaves from His Past

Grady had a picturesque record in Fresno before coming to this city. He was involved in several sensational episodes in which guns figured menacingly. While running for District Attorney he was accused of being a dude. He met his opponent during the campaign at a tough resort in the mountains. Both were dressed as rough farmers to impress the natives. In the presence of a large crowd Grady charged his opponent with being a dude and with wearing striped socks. To prove his own Democracy he pulled up his trousers and showed that he wore none. He was elected. Once he was summoned before the Grand Jury and threatened with indictment for not keeping a fee book. "It's a misdemeanor not to keep a fee book," said Grady, "and it's a felony to keep one and keep it wrong. I'm willing to pay a fine but I'll not take chances on going to the penitentiary." Grady is not a bookkeeper.

Baseball at Blingum

There is to be a charity baseball game on the Carolan polo field at Blingum on July fourth. The proceeds are to be donated to the Armitage Orphanage. W. B. Bourn will captain one team and R. J. Wood the other. Among those who are to swat the sphere are C. O. and R. G. Hooker, J. A. Folger, C. E. Greer, Joseph S. Tobin, Andrew P. Welch, Eugene Lent, Jos Tobin Jr., Frank L. Owens, W. H. Crocker and George H. Lent.

The Coronation Postponed

Dramatic indeed was the climax to the sumptuous preparations for what promised to be one of the most gorgeous pageants in the world's history. A few days ago the people of an Empire were in joyful exuberance over the approaching fete in which representatives of all nations were to join. The crowning of one of the earth's mightiest monarchs was to be the occasion for a grand national festival. The populace of the greatest city in the world had given itself up with utter abandonment to merry-making. The town was magnificently appareled for the royal show when suddenly, like the rumbling that preceded the great cataclysm of St. Pierre, came the news that spread consternation over all. The king had bowed before the strong hand of destiny. He was stricken by a dangerous illness, and the situation was fraught with the possibility of the resplendent emblems of joy being torn down, to be replaced by the gruesome tokens of mourning. And what dreadful irony there was in the shocking tidings—the great monarch who was to be the central figure in the sumptuous show had been reminded of his littleness by so insignificant a feature of his anatomy as his vermiform appendix. Medical science has yet been unable to determine the functions of that troublesome gut. It has been declared to be the one thing in nature which subserves no purpose, but in the case of Edward VII it has at least made history.

His Greatest Act

At this time there appears to be very little chance for the recovery of the King. His death would be deplored by the people of England almost as deeply as was that of his mother, for Albert Edward is a popular monarch. During his brief reign he has not had many opportunities to win the confidence of his subjects, but they admire him for his tact and courtesy. He will be credited in history with having hastened the end of the Boer war, and that was an act of humanity which entitles him to more respect than other monarchs earned who reigned for years. There is no reason why his death should cause any uneasiness in the Empire. The responsibilities of the King are not so great as to seriously affect the affairs of the government.

One of the "Inner Circle"

The star writers who were hired by the yellow journals to report the coronation ceremonies were not denied the opportunity to earn their salaries. But instead of describing the festivities they have been doing some "fine writing" about the King's illness and its effect on the people. Among them is Helen, Marchioness Vacares, whoever she is. She evidently believed it would be advisable to introduce herself to American readers as one of the inner circle for she started off her cabled correspondence with the personal pronoun. This was the opening paragraph:

"I was writing to her Majesty, Queen Alexandra, to thank her for having sent me tickets for the Coronation at Westminster Abbey when the news of the King's illness fell upon me like a thunderclap."

In the language of the comedian in "The Idol's Eye," wouldn't that bump you?

Our Disappointed Representatives

Perhaps one of the saddest men in London when the order postponing the Coronation was issued was Mr. Whitelaw Reid, who went over to wear knee breeches and to spend some of the simoleons of his father-in-law, D. O. Mills. It was a grievous disappointment for Mr. Reid, for he was prepared to make a great display. And General James H. Wilson who went over to represent the Army, was also among the grievously disappointed. General Wilson was one of the West Pointers who were kept in the background when there was a chance to win glory during the Spanish war. General Wilson is one of the ablest and one of the most distinguished of our Army officers, and when the war broke out it was believed in military circles that he would be selected to conduct the Cuban campaign. But like Admiral Watson of the Navy, who should have had the task assigned to Sampson, he was detailed for unimportant service.

Wilson's Record

General Wilson has a brilliant war record with which that of General Miles does not compare, and yet the latter who was boosted ahead of him through the influence of his father-in-law is constantly grumbling because of the snubbing that he has lately been getting and that he so richly deserves. General Wilson was Grant's engineer and bridge-builder around Vicksburg. He was selected by Grant for secret services such as going into Knoxville when it was beleaguered to carry Burnside a letter. When Sheridan went East he asked for Wilson and gave him a division, and the first great raids were participated in by this mounted engineer. He broke the fame and force of the renowned

Forrest, driving him twenty-four miles in one day. He campaigned six hundred and fifty miles in thirty days, keeping relief from Mobile, and in that extraordinary march captured five cities and took seven thousand prisoners. Wilson's independent army moved through a belt of fortified cities, encountering more resistance than Sherman's and its great sweep of strategy cut the Confederacy's west in half and caused the surrender of all its armies in two weeks. General Dick Taylor, son of Zachary Taylor, declares in his book that Wilson's was the best conducted of all Federal expeditions. Surely General Miles should be willing to stand for a lot of snubbing in view of the fact that political pull has enabled him to soar above such a man as Wilson.

A Hard Job

Mrs. Salisbury has found it quite difficult to lead San Rafael society out of chaos. There is a great deal of discord over there among those who have lived in the pretty suburb for several years and the jarring factions have not yet crystallized into what might be termed a social set. Mrs. Salisbury has assumed quite a haughty attitude toward San Rafael. Her air is that of a woman who considers it quite an honor to the faubourg that she condescends to dwell in it for a few brief months. However she is a woman of tact and will straighten out matters if that be possible. She may even be expected to tame the matron who resents attentions to her husband. "He is not so engaging," said one young belle the other day, "but she supports him and I suppose she wants her money's worth."

Those That Are Missed

Doris Jeffrey, by the way, is missed in San Rafael this summer. She was quite conspicuous there last year but she is now living with her parents in this city. If she cared to get into the swim over there this year, I am quite sure that Mrs. Salisbury could lead the way. Indeed, I believe Mrs. Salisbury's services are to be had by almost any nice young girl who would like to be chaperoned into smartdom. The absence of a certain veterinary surgeon of Celtic extraction who was looked upon as a gay cavalier in San Rafael last year has also been remarked this summer. He was very attentive to Miss Jeffrey and also to a daughter of one of the old families whose habitat is San Anselmo. It is a family that prides itself on its blood which is warm as well as blue. One of the daughters deserted her husband and eloped with a man below her station, and the other, the gossips say, was sent East to cool her passion for the veterinary. It is a proud family, and includes in its personnel a son who loudly remarked in the smoking car one day that Marin county would be a fine place to live if you didn't have to ride in a car with the rabble.

Oakland Acquitted

John Morrisey, the impresario of the Orpheum, lives at the Palace hotel. The other night he was standing near the box office of his theatre, nursing a headache. A chance acquaintance happened along and after some chatter, Morrisey remarked that he must be going home.

"You live in Oakland, and have to catch the boat, I suppose?" said the acquaintance.

"Not by a damned sight," said Morrisey, "I look bad tonight because I'm sick."

The Consul Lost

Courtenay Bennett, Great Britain's consul at this port, likes not that publicity which American newspapers give to men of his rank. His consular experience, though of many years, has not been in the land of the free and the home of the hustling daily. So when Murray Bond, a Chronicle reporter, asked Consul Bennett for his photograph to illumine an interview the Britisher demurred, and passed off the question with a word about a chess problem which troubled him greatly. Hs asked the journalist if he understood the game of games, and Bond replying in the affirmative the Consul submitted the problem which baffled him. Bond is a Canuck and canny.

"What say you if we play a game to see whether you let me have your picture?" said he.

Consul Bennett smiled confidently and they got to toying with the rooks and castles without more ado. Like Knut the Page who dared the fair princess to wager her heart upon a sortie on the board, so did the reporter play with might and main. Soon he had the dignified diplomat in hock and with a bold dash won the hazard. He departed from the consular apartments, photo in hand, and next day the Chronicle printed it.

The Burton Sisters

The U. S. transport Hancock, which arrived last week, brought back from a two years' sojourn in Manila the wife of Captain Thomas Pearce, U. S. A., and their two children. Mrs. Pearce will be remembered as Minnie Burton, daughter of Inspector General George H. Burton, U. S. A. During her residence in San Francisco, when her father was on duty here, she was a decided favorite in society circles, sharing the honors of belleship with her sisters Leila and Kathro, all of them being exceptionally handsome girls. Leila, the second daughter, became stagestruck and from filling the role of amateur elocutionist soared into professional life as an actress, joining forces with the late Mrs. Henry Edgerton in a theatrical tour of the northwest. Subsequently, when Colonel Burton was transferred to an Eastern station, Leila joined the Frohman company and went on the road. She has now, I hear, abandoned the stage and re-entered society in New York, where her family now resides. Mrs. Pearce's grandmother, wife of Colonel Charles H. Larrabee, was in her girlhood a noted beauty in Washington, D. C.

A Thespian's Panama

Edward Morgan, the matinee idol, who according to Maude Fealy has an unromantic penchant for spraying the leading lady as though he had an atomizer concealed on his person, lost his Panama hat in a restaurant the other day. Somebody substituted an imitation article for Morgan's sixty-dollar genuine Panama hat. Morgan was as hot as any Montague chasing a Capulet, and his ire was not exhausted until the bland host explained that despite the deep sorrow he felt for his patron's loss, yet he felt compelled to acknowledge that within a fortnight six complaints of the theft of Panama hats had been made to him.

"Ze fac' ees, Monsieur," said the restaratеur, "zat zere ees epidemique ov ze Panama secf an' I can do nossing wiz zem."

He told Actor Morgan that the craze for costly Panamas had bred a new class of light-fingered gentry, and that despite their efforts to prevent loss to their customers they had caught but one thief, and had had, with Morgan's, seven hats "lifted." The police corroborate this statement of the Frenchman that there is a brand-new kind of crook who devotes all his energies to stealing Panama hats.

Proud Man and the Bore

The Panama hat craze is responsible for a great deal of heart-burning. Some of the imitation hats so closely resemble the genuine that it requires the closest inspection to distinguish them, and the craze has developed a new species of bore—the man who takes off your hat to examine the quality. He is an awful nuisance and he has become so active that many Panama hat owners have ceased to flaunt their expensive head-gear. They cannot tolerate the bore. And the popularity of the Panama has given irreverent womankind occasion to jeer at men in general and their talk of extravagance in particular. They point to the Panama hat as an illustration of masculine vanity. A husband with a one-hundred-dollar Panama who struts along under his monument of extravagance, dripping with self-satisfaction, must be possessed of exceptional nerve to denounce the extravagance of woman or growl about the passion of the sex for finery and feathers.

The Postleys to Stay

The Sterling Postleys have taken a home in Sacramento street, and intend to remain here for a year or two. Sterling Postley is the young New York millionaire, son of Commodore Postley. He married Ethel Cook of Belvedere, and it was supposed that they would make their home in the East. But Postley likes San Francisco, and the probability is that the young married couple will do considerable entertaining here. Young Postley has such high class connections in the East that the local smart set should regard him as a valuable acquisition.

Another Military Affair

Another military engagement on the tapis is that of Edith Simpson and Lieutenant Bettison, U. S. A. She made her debut about two or three years ago. She is the daughter of the wealthy A. M. Simpsons of Pacific avenue, and is a very charming and much liked girl. She was educated at one of the fashionable New York boarding schools and came out here to make her debut. Girls continue to marry into the Army notwithstanding the fact that the Army is said to have deteriorated socially since the war.

The American Lord

"The American Lord Fairfax" is one of the many disappointed Americans who went over to witness the Coronation. Fairfax is a name that at one time was well known in this city. The uncle of the American Lord Fairfax settled in Marin county. His home is now the famous road resort known as Pastori's. There never was a man in California who was more loved by his fellow men than Charlie Fairfax, who was born and brought up in Virginia, and who ranked as tenth Baron in the English peerage. Charlie Fairfax came here in 1849, was clerk of the Supreme Court in Sacramento where he made his home, but through the length and breadth of the State he was known and liked by all with whom he came in contact.

A Relative of the Oelrichs'

The life of Charlie Fairfax was shortened by a stab in the breast inflicted by Harvey Lee, a politician. After being wounded Fairfax covered Lee with a pistol, and though he believed he had received his death wound he lowered the weapon and exclaimed as he fell, "Assassin and coward, I spare you for the sake of your wife and child." The wife of Charlie Fairfax was the sister of Calhoun Benham, one of our pioneers from Virginia. And by the way, Hermann Oelrichs and Mrs. William Babcock of San Rafael are cousins of the present Fairfax who has lately laid claim to his title of Baron Fairfax, Earl of Culpepper. The relationship came through the May family of New York.

Fauntleroy is Here

Little Lord Fauntleroy has come to town. In other words the original of that precocious lad, in the person of Vivian Burnett, the son of Mrs. Frances Hodgson Burnett, the novelist, is here. It was by studying the traits of her son that Mrs. Burnett was able to draw such a charming character as the little lord. Since coming to man's estate he rather resents being reminded of the fact that he figures as the curly-haired lad of the book and play. He is a graduate of Yale, and is a bright and successful magazine writer. He doesn't have to rely on the fame of his talented mother. He came hither for his health, but does not expect to remain long. He has passed his life in Washington where his father Doctor Burnett lives. He has a stepfather, too, many years younger than his mother. They live in England.

Arrivals at the Hotel Mateo this week included representatives from eleven cities, Lancaster, England, El Paso, Texas, Butte, Montana, Boston, Chicago and St. Louis being among them.

The St. John Sandwich

Here is the newest society sandwich. Its invention by Chauncey St. John has brought him fame among the Dutch lunchers. Between lightly-buttered slices of flaky new bread toasted just a wee bit, place a slice of deviled Virginia ham, hot. On this a white-lettuce leaf cut to fit. A bit of mayonnaise goes on the lettuce, and a delicate cut of the breast of cold turkey. Then hide this with two slices of raw tomatoes, ice-cold, and cover all with another piece of buttered toast. Cut this into triangles, and garnished with olives, you have a sandwich fit for a god, says Chauncey.

Gertrude Knocks Kate

It is now pretty generally known that "The Aristocrats," a novel which created a big sensation when it made its appearance several months ago, was written by Mrs. Gertrude Atherton, but there are very few who are aware of the fact that one of the characters in the story is a scorching satire on a well-known Californian writer. The victim of Mrs. Atherton's merciless pen is none other than Kate Douglas Wiggin, now Mrs. Riggs of New York. A Californian in New York writes me that Mrs. Riggs recognized the portrait and has vowed all sorts of vengeance on Mrs. Atherton. I am also told that Mrs. Atherton does not deny having posed Mrs. Riggs in her mind's eye for the portrait, of whom one of the characters, an English Duke says, "She is a cat whose proper place is in the fancy basket in the drawing room; no English Tom would ever invite her to the roof."

The Pen Portrait

This is how Mrs. Atherton discusses the victim of her satire:

Mrs. Laurence came into the room with a rustling of skirts I have never known equaled. I should say that her train had at least six inner flounces of silk and it switched about on the bare floor like an angry tiger's tail. I think she changed her seat seven times and always with that portentous rustling. I noticed that this occurred whenever some one else had spoken consecutively five minutes. She is a pretty woman, and the old word "elegant" exactly expresses her; our grandmothers would have called her "most genteel." She has a cloud of cendre hair, softly curled, and the pretty contrast of baby blue eyes, although they, as well as her thin red lips are petulant in expression. Her features are delicate to the vanishing point and her figure graceful. She is, undoubtedly, an old hand at aristocracy, for her voice, in spite of its fretful note, is exquisitely trained, her language polished in the extreme, with every comma and semicolon in the proper place; and her manner quite that of the grande dame of the American novel. She mentioned eighteen people of title she had met in England and alluded, with a fretful sigh, to her many visits in England's "enchanting homes."

This is a sample of Mrs. Laurence's utterances:

"I wish I could marry an Englishman, I've had so many offers from my own countrymen but not one from an Englishman—I think it is too bad! Of course I shall marry again—I'm so feminine and I hate work. I always am so amused when the critics rave over my quick, brilliant style and verbal felicities; I grind out sentences and hate the very sight of paper. I want to marry a rich man who will pet me and leave me nothing to do but to be

She is Particular About Her MSS.

The complaints which have been so frequent of late concerning the number of typographical errors which find their way into books have led the publishers of Mrs. Riggs to make the most of that lady's insistence on good work. It has been told, and told again, how she insists on having at least three proofs, and the story of Carlyle's crankiness is revived, and much else and much more. Commenting on this, a contemporary remarks: "When we read how Stevenson toiled with infinite patience at his work, writing and revising until he reached perfection, and how it was Sir Walter Besant's habit to write first in manuscript, correct this severely, have a typewritten copy made, then make a second revision; and how Kate Douglas Wiggin corrects her manuscript time and again before she sends it to the printer, and then requires three proofs before she finally consents to publication—when we read these details of how literature is made, we are surprised that there is so much good writing in the newspapers. They who feed matter into the press write on the jump, and somebody else corrects the proof." If some of the cranky authors did but know it, it is owing to their own fidgitiness and finicky meddling that a large proportion of the errors is due. It does not follow that authors are reliable correctors. They are often but hinderers, and it is only in exceptional cases that they have the trained eye which is essential to the proof-reader.

Millard Breaks Into Song

Another newspaper man has had an attack of the "divine inflatus." Mr. Bailey Millard, editor of the Examiner's Sunday Supp is the latest victim. "Songs of the Press" is the title of his little volume of verse published by Elder and Shepard. Mr. Miller is the man who first touted Edwin Markham's "Man with the Hoe." That is something that will be charged against him long after his "Songs of the Press" are forgotten. And some of the songs are quite clever, especially those of the lighter vein. In "The Star Writer" he tells of the lament of the reporter who feels that his talents are unappreciated while those of the star are appraised too highly. The lament of the "skate" reporter is familiar to all newspaper men.

Wife Likes to Rule Alone

A New York correspondent writes me that the green-eyed monster is said to be enacting a prominent role in the menage of a veteran Californian turfman and multimillionaire who not long ago married his present wife, who was his niece by marriage. Now, he divides his attentions impartially between his wife and his relative the young Countess, who occasionally forms part of the family circle. It is quite proper that he should, but Madame is said to be not of the kind that is willing to share a divided sovereignty.

Bunthorne Was a Cleric

The librettos of W. S. Gilbert are far too clever to be preserved only in scattered operatic form, and it seems odd that they have not before this been put into a library edition. Such an edition is now under way, and Mr. Gilbert has already written some of the prefaces. In the preface to "Patience" he says that Bunthorne was originally intended as a satire upon the traditional English curate, and the opera was almost completed when the author began to feel shaky as to the attitude of the British public toward so mericiless a criticism of the cloth. Finally he decided it wouldn't do. The curate must be spared, but the libretto was too good to be wasted. The aesthetic craze was just reaching full swing. Mr. Gilbert slashed his libretto, ousted the curate, smoothed the rough edges of revision and handed "Patience" over to the public and the critics.

IN THE MORNING.

When on a fair June morning I wake up very late,
And fail in all my efforts my snug bed to vacate,
I'm generally weak then and can't remember facts,
But what angers me more than all is a great swelled head that cracks.
The few hairs that I've left are jumping out and in·
I cannot call it seasickness, though to sea I must have been.
I feel so suicidal, so blue, I almost burst,
And there's not a drop of water to quench a burning thirst.
The pitcher's grin is cynic, the bootjack's laugh contempt,
But all my other miseries to tell I won't attempt.
Far better had it been for me if I had not
Imbibed the inspiration from that last cold bot.

Confessions of a Husband

[The Confessions of a Wife running serially in the Century have awakened a general interest in Confessions of all kinds. Town Talk has been enabled to secure several of these. The Confessions of a Husband will be followed by the Confessions of a Valet, a Femme de Chambre, a Jockey, a Retired Danseuse and others of like entertainment. It is expected these will run the Confessions of a Wife a close race in public favor.]

I.

The day is warm. The sun shines and I feel too indolent to go to work. My sister brought me a summer novel to read while I lie on the grass beneath a huge tree. This sentence runs through my head. It is on the tenth page and for the life of me I can't get any farther:

The flint in her eyes struck the steel in his and there was a blaze. And he took her in his arms and pressed his lips to hers.

[Sis, please bring me a sherbet, and a lump of ice to put on my head.]

There is so much of that kind of rot in summer literature. I wonder why they don't have instead, something about cool cucumbers and fresh lettuce? Blazes and fires are such untimely terms for the dog days.

[The sherbet is all right. Have Gee How bring me another in half an hour.]

II.

I have taken to writing a diary. My schoolteacher always said I had literary talent. I wish she could see my diary. I am cultivating a splendid egotism. It is so delightful to jot down here all the things I know are true about myself, but which others never believe. I know I am handsome, generous, a little wild sometimes, but as a whole I am a splendid fellow. Now my sister says I'm selfish, lazy and generally mean. If she only knew me as I really am.

VI.

I am engaged to a girl. I always said I would never marry until I was forty, and would then choose a widow. I don't know how this came about. The girl was there. There was moonlight. She was pretty. I kissed her. She told her mother, and now we are affianced. But I shall not marry—not yet. How cruel to try and deprive a splendid man about town like me of his liberty!

VII.

The day is set. I had nothing to say about it. I am only a hosiery model in the hands of Mamie's mother. She said, "Mamie always wanted to be a June bride," and I said, "Well, what hinders it?" Then she said, "It will be in church with six bridesmaids, the bishop and two assistants." Oh, my soul! If there's anybody hates fuss and feathers it is I. But I can't get out of this without such a lot of talk. Just imagine—only a month ago I was lying under the trees reading a summer novel, neglecting my office because I felt too lazy to work—and now! Well, I guess the flint and steel must have met somehow. A pity the ensuing blaze had such a bad result.

XIV.

Mamie likes rings. I spent two hundred for the solitaire, and then another two hundred for a pearl, and then five hundred for a sapphire with diamonds. She wishes a sunburst of diamonds and a tiara for her wedding gift and has instructed me to give the maid of honor a pearl half-moon and the six bridesmaids each a gold clover-leaf with centre. My sister couldn't say I am stingy now. I shall have to give up two of my clubs to meet all this gift-making with equanimity.

XVII.

I always said I would never write a love letter. I object to having them read in court afterwards. But Mamie, who is now in Sausalito resting before the dressmakers get hold of her, insists on writing every day, and having an answer in return. I telephoned once or twice but she did not like that. So I sent this:

Copy.

"My dear Miss Hobbs,

"I received your kind message and was pleased to be remembered. How is the weather at Sausalito this week? It is foggy in town.

"Sincerely yours,

"Thomas Kent."

XVIII.

Mamie objected to the formality of my note, on sixteen pages of large blue paper. Rather than be treated to another of such length, I tried to please her by infusing a little more warmth in mine:

Copy.

"My dear Mamie,

"I wish I could see you but as I cannot that letter of yours is the next best to talking to you. I am dining with Jim Brown today and we'll toast your dear brown eyes in a cold bot. With my best love, I am "Always yours,

"Tom K."

XIX.

Mamie came over to town the next day, and called on me at the office. She looked pretty and stylish and I told her so. But the flint in her eye was hard, and speedily in spite of all my efforts struck the steel in mine. I believe if Mamie hadn't ordered her wedding gown, and told all her friends she was to be married in June, it would have been all off. She said I had no right to go out to dinner with Jim Brown or anybody.

"Well, I can't eat alone every night," I answered.

"Why not take me?"

Now she knows very well her mother will not let her dine alone with me, and I dislike chaperons.

"Why, of course, my dear," I answered, "let's go this very day."

And then she smiled and kissed me, though the office boy was looking on. We didn't go to dinner but I took Mamie down to the boat, loading her with a box of chocolates, all the weekly papers and a huge bunch of violets. Then I went out to dinner with my typist.

believe I'm really married. I always shied off from Hymen, and never imagined I'd be caught at last. Mamie is a nice girl. I suppose some day I'll be very fond of her. Just now, if it weren't for ping pong and the slot machine, I'd die of ennui.

XXXVI.

The cleverest woman I ever knew once said to me: "A husband should, like the gas, go out days and shine at night." But she was a bachelor maid who couldn't know how dull a man feels at night after he's been out all day. Mamie insists on dragging me to dull dinners, and evening calls, and inviting people in to meet me for whom I don't care a rap. If this goes on, I'll never grow fond of her as I had hoped. My sister suggested to Mamie the other day that she let me go to the club every night as I used. "He'll get a few good stories to tell you, then," she added. But Mamie doesn't care for good stories. I told her quite a nice one the other day at dinner, and she said if I told another like that before her she'd go back to mamma.

XXXVIII.

There's a revolution in the house. Mamie's mother has come to pay us a visit. I wonder I never thought before I married Mamie that her mother was a widow. I have some one to tell my stories to now, and she is a woman who sees the point directly and laughs at the right place. She has persuaded Mamie that the club is the proper place for a man on the nights when he is not taking his wife and mother-in-law to the theatre and supper afterwards. She has a fine taste in wines and understands the good and bad points of horseflesh. She is fifty and looks thirty-five.

XL.

Mamie grew so cold to her mother that the dear lady couldn't stand the frigidity and went home. I go to the club every night now, Mamie is such poor company.

XLVIII.

I am a happy papa. When Mamie gets up, I think I shall go away for a month or so in the mountains and she can stay here with her mother, who arrived the day the stork came. This noise and flurry and talk about infants' foods is so tiresome. My nerves are in a dreadful state. I didn't know that attaining the dignity of father entailed so much boredom. Ah, that flint and steel and blaze! If we had only thought before we let them meet!

LIII.

That was a mistake of my old schoolteacher in thinking I had literary talent. This is all the entries I find in my diary for the past three months:

Mamie asked me for sixteen dollars to pay baby's laundry bill.

Gave Mamie one hundred to buy a new gown.

Gave Mamie fifty dollars to buy baby a new outfit.

Three hundred dollars, bill from Blue House. Mamie cried when I told her it was extravagant and she would ruin me.

Mamie says she must have a cottage in San Rafael this summer. She engaged one, without consulting me, and I must give her eighty dollars for the first month's rent.

Resigned from the athletic club.

Resigned from the Merry Club.

Have taken my name off all my clubs.

XCII.

"I will go back to mamma," Mamie said for the six hundredth time in as many days.

"Well, for God's sake, go," I said.

Then she called me a brute and said before I begged her to leave her happy home and marry me, I should have considered how much happier a girl was than a matron ever could be. She said she rued the day I snatched her from her blessed maidenhood, and a dozen other things. I wish I could show her my diary in its early pages.

CII.

Mamie is suing me for a divorce on the grounds of mental cruelty and incompatibility of temperament. Such is life. Ah, why did I ever marry? I did not want to enter the matrimonial state, but was dragged into it. Shall I ever care to enter it again? Who knows?

CIII.

I have rejoined the six swellest clubs in town. Oh, how sweet liberty is, after two years of being tied to domesticity. Decidedly to be a husband is to be in hell.

With the Money Makers

Latest in Hawaiians

My correspondent writes me from Honolulu that the brokers and investors there are comforting themselves for a weak and descending market, that the bottom is all the nearer. Certainly the bottom of the Honolulu market is not touched yet, and holders there are wondering just how low stocks can go before they strike hardpan. The most notable decline since my last advices, was in Hawaiian Sugar which went down to $22 as against $23.25 for Makaweli in San Francisco. My correspondent says: "This showed the inside was forecast at San Francisco first, for there the price has been declining steadily, the rate being $24 while it was three points high in Hawaii. It was believed here that a dividend on the stock would be paid soon. The information that the dividend would be passed seems to have gotten out in San Francisco first. However there are being made such extensive improvements on this plantation that it will soon be one of the best equipped in Hawaii. Olaa went to $2 with a sale of 100 shares. There is a report here and it is given currency by those interested in Olaa, that the stock will go lower within a month and that then it will be gobbled up by these strong holders. They profess to think that those who are selling are weak investors who cannot pay the assessments, and who are better out for the company's good. This may be taken with a grain of salt. Waialua has been weak at $60, there being $57.50 bid, and some stock is said to have been sold outside the Exchange for $59. Reports on Waialua are good enough but the Honolulu money market is very tight. Oahu Sugar Company is weak. Kuhuku is still at $24 asked but there are rumors that the crop will be a little short owing to some fields being cut this year."

Local Stocks Dull

General dullness ruled on the Stock and Bond Exchange during the week and as buyers were apathetic, values showed some easiness. San Francisco Gas and Electric shares were weaker and sales were made as low as $42.20 against $44.25, the closing price last week. Securities of other light and power companies were offered at a lower range of values but had little attraction for investors. Alaska Packers was somewhat stronger, opening firm at $158 and gradually hardening in price until holders demanded $160. Sugar stocks were quiet with sellers asking prices running close to bids of buyers. Oceanic stock was exceedingly weak, being offered freely at $25 with $15 the best bid obtainable. Several small parcels of Spring Valley Water Company's shares changed hands between $89.50 and $89.75 with the former figure generally ruling. The upward tendency in the price for Bank of California shares continued unchecked and values were advanced to $445 bid with no stock being offered. Other bank stocks have ruled steady at sustained prices with no outward manifestation of buyers to obtain shares. In bonds there has been some moderate trading in railroad securities, North Shore Railroad 5s advancing to $101 bid and $102 asked. Some $25,000 worth of Market street Cable 6s changed hands at $127.50. This investment will net the speculator only a 3.23 per cent return. Sacramento Electric Gas and Railway 5 per cent bonds changed hands in a moderate way at $103, an advance of $2.50 over the closing price of last week, caused doubtless by the fact the Bay Counties Power Company has secured control of the shares of the former corporation. The Bay Counties Power Company has been furnishing electric power for the Sacramento Electric Gas and Railway for some time and it is now reported that leading interests of the Power Company have secured some 12,000 shares of the 18,525 shares of capital stock issued by the Sacramento corporation. Advices from New York regarding the short sales of the 4 per cent bonds of the United Railroads of San Francisco have caused quite a bit of local interest as the bonds are largely held here by parties who are not disposed to sell. contracts has arrived, there is a sharp demand for immediate delivery and as high as $99 was bid on Tuesday and $100 asked, cash, while for ten days delivery $90 was the best bid. From present indications it is more than likely that the New York shorts will have to put up good amounts to settle their speculations.

Extreme dullness pervades the Oil market and there is practically a standstill to inquiries for investment at the daily sessions of the local Exchange. Share holders, however, maintain a degree of confidence and are not offering any marked concessions in the hope of unloading. Very few stocks were represented in the transactions of the week, California Standard leading in point of demand with prices ranging from 15c to 16c. Monte Cristo was steady at $1.30 and some fair sales of Central Point were made at 80c. Petroleum Center sold in a moderate way at 1c while Reed Crude brought 31c. Sterling's popularity was on the wane, the best bid of buyers being $1.45 with holders asking $1.50.

General Financial Notes

The Stock and Bond Exchange will adjourn at the close of business to-day, and will remain closed until July 5th.

The subscription books for the issue of the $9,000,000 5 per cent bonds of the United States Shipbuilding Company, which was the portion of the authorized issue of $16,000,000 offered for subscription have been closed, and it was learned at the American Bank and Trust Company that a much larger amount had been subscribed for here than was expected. It is reported that the underwriting subscriptions are already selling at a premium and that when the Eastern and European subscriptions are counted the amount offered will be subscribed for three times over.

The financial statement of the Oceanic Steamship Company covering the period from May 17th to June 17th, 1902, shows total receipts of $211,341.47; agency expenses, $5,683.55; general expenses, $26,724.74; vessel expenses, $197,840.70, total expenses, $229,748.88; net deficits on operation for month, $18,407.52; for betterments a total of $17,597.67 was expended, of which the principal items were repairs on the steamer Sonoma, $4,270.03, and on the steamer Ventura, $6,374.55. The total disbursements over receipts for the month were $36,005.19, making the total amount due J. D. Spreckels & Bros. Co. on June 17th, $1,010,125.14; deducting accounts amounting to $98,067.41, leaves the net overdraft of the company $912,057.73.

The San Francisco Produce Exchange Mutual Benefit Association is now disbursing a final dividend, in dissolution, at the rate of $8.90 to each member.

A New-rich Matron, desiring to do the Proper Thing at All Times, read in the Society Papers that Christenings should be Celebrated with Eclat. The only Baby in the house was something of an Age and somewhat Obstreperous, so Papa demurred to the proposed Function on the ground of a Possible Rumpus.

However, Mamma's plan Prevailed and the Invitations were Issued. It was all beautifully arranged—Flowers, Palms, Potted Plants, Lights, Gifts and Godparents with high-sounding names. A Bishop and Satellites were engaged to Perform the Ceremony.

The Hour came and the Guests were all there to see the heir Baptized. The Bishop asked for the Baby. And then the young Matron burst into Tears of Embarrassment.

It seems she had Forgotten the Baby's part in the Entertainment and for fear he might make that Possible Rumpus that Papa had suggested she had sent him Out with his Nurse, with instructions to keep him out All Day.

STAGE

Pinero's Third Act

"Well, that surely was the limit," said James H. O'Brien, the Democratic philosopher, at the close of the third act of "The Gay Lord Quex" at the Columbia Monday night. Mr. O'Brien did not look the part of a prude as he sat in his claw-hammer and stage box, but he certainly perspired during that third act. "Yes, it was the limit," he repeated. "Not that they did anything to justify police interference, but it was the way they raised your hopes, or rather I should say your misgivings." This third act presenting the chief scene of the play—the one between Lord Quex, the roue and Sophy Fullgarney, the manicurist—is full of promise of a most salacious character, but develops nothing that the most squeamish could protest against. It is technically ingenious and precisely proportioned. Its subtlety is charming and its audacity startling. It is an improvement on the bedstead complications that we have become so familiar with in society dramas. The audience is given a view of the boudoir of the flabby sensuous Duchess of Strood whose married life has always been happy and serene because her aged husband has always been under the care of four nurses. He never interfered in her love affairs, and this adulterous woman is a type of the caste that is counterfeited in Pinero's salacious play. She arranges an assignation in her boudoir at midnight with Lord Quex, ostensibly to say farewell to her lover who is about to abandon gay bachelorhood. Her preparations for his reception suggest the kindling of a hope that it will be a tender farewell. She gowns herself loosely and ravishingly, and she brings on a bottle of wine and glasses. The inevitable bed is not there but you know that it is in the other room, through the open portieres. The lovers are spied upon by Sophy Fullgarney and they detect her. Then follows the scene which shows the superior craft of Pinero. The Duchess vacates her apartments and Quex locks himself in with Sophy, and endeavors to insure her silence by convincing her that exposure means her own ruin. This is a most powerful scene and the most scintillantly phrased of any in the contemporary drama. Pinero concentrates all his force in this act, and impresses its situations and episodes so distinctly on the mind that you might forget the story of the play and yet clearly recall the boudoir picture with its intensely dramatic climax. "The Gay Lord Quex" is a scenic transcript of social conditions which are far from edifying. Its atmosphere is unwholesome. It is the example set by such people, the shining lights of a gay social set, that has led to the demoralization of the entire social body of London. Pinero has done a very clever bit of play-making, familiarized us with the titled belswagger, and the British ladies of easy virtue, but there is nothing in the dialogue of epigrammatic brilliancy. The Miller company handles the play with superb finesse. There is nothing repulsively vicious in Miller as Quex, and he is stolid as the most cold-blooded Britisher could desire in the fascinating third act. Margaret Anglin gives another evidence of her versatility as the manicurist. Her portrayal of the character is exquisitely shaded. Jennie Eustace is decidedly rakish as the Duchess of easy virtue, and Lawrence D'Orsay scores a big hit in a delightful piece of character work. As Muriel, Grace Elliston was far from convincing. She looked like a woman who was well able to take care of herself with any kind of a husband.

Morgan and Hamlet

Morgan told Ashton Stevens that he wouldn't play Hamlet for ten years, but I think he is making the mistake of his life if he keeps to that resolution. In the same interview he said to Stevens that he desired to play Shylock, and was lured out here with that as the bait. But if ever there were a man framed by nature to interpret the melancholy Dane it is Morgan. His physique suggests the character and his natural manner intensifies the suggestion. His peculiar speech is well fitted to the utterances of the Dane. We have had so many Hamlets, and I doubt if one were ever wholly satisfactory. Of late years few have cared to attempt the character that was a favorite with great stars in their day. Wilson Barrett wrote a treatise on Hamlet in which he quoted lines in support of his theory that Shakespeare's hero was only melancholy, not mad, and that he was a young man, not the thirty or forty year old we have been accustomed to seeing. If Mr. Morgan desires to gratify Maude Fealy in her expressed wish to appear as Ophelia—and she would be an Ophelia worth seeing—I am willing to send him Barrett's pamphlet so that he can read up on the character which he hesitates to attempt for ten years to come.

Fourth of July matinees at all the theatres.

For the third week of the engagement of Maude Fealy and Edward Morgan at the Grand the management has chosen "Faust" and a grand scenic and electrical production is promised. Miss Fealy will be seen as Marguerite and Mr. Morgan will play Mephisto and he should be a very effective one, too. There will be a special matinee July fourth, and the regular Saturday and Sunday matinees.

"The Adventures of the Lady Ursula" will follow "The Gay Lord Quex" at the Columbia.

An Actor Who Writes Plays

Robert Drouet has again begun writing plays and his latest will be one of the big productions of the new season. It is called "The Captain's Interference." Drouet was last in San Francisco as leading man with Mary Mannèring, in "Janice Meredith" and "Camille." It was at the one performance of the latter that he made the hit of his life. His Armand was the best Armand ever seen here. But I remember when Drouet came here in 1894 with Effie Ellsler. The feature of their season was Drouet's play "Doris" in which the author played the principal male role. At that time I made some remarks about the play and its star that did not hit the author just right. He wrote me a very caustic note, in the postscript of which he said: "I am not an author trying to act, but an actor trying to write." It strikes me that from the success of his last impersonations here, and what the despatches say of his play, Mr. Drouet has managed to do more than try both acting and writing. He has arrived both ways.

A New Burlesque

The twelfth week of "Fiddle Dee Dee" is, it now appears, to be the last of that amusing piece. Next week "Pousse Cafe," another of the Weber & Field burlesques, will be put on at Fischer's. "Pousse Cafe" is said by those who saw it in New York to be much funnier than "Fiddle Dee Dee." It simply abounds in witty hits. Then there will be given the burlesque on "Antony and Cleopatra" and the one on "The Royal Family," both of which made New York laugh for many months. A specialty will be two novel dances, La Cleopatra and The Pyramids, and the Paloma quartet has been engaged to support Maude Amber in her new song, "The Rose of Killarney." Winfield Blake will also have a new song, "The Phrenologist Coon." Blake, by the way, is already a matinee idol and has his clientele of adoring schoolgirls to applaud him every Saturday. Hal De Forrest and Charlotte Vidot are newcomers who are expected to make a hit. There is a "contract" scene in "Pousse Cafe" that will amuse the lawyers. The management of Fischer's announces that there will never be an advance in prices at the theatre during the run of the Weber & Field burlesques.

A Great Bill

John and James Russell, "the original Irish servant girls," will reappear at the Orpheum next week after five years' absence. Annie C. Russell and John Russell Jr. will be with them, and the four will appear in "A Romance of New Jersey" by George M. Cohan—period, 1906. The Russells are the best in their line and are sure to be warmly welcomed. James Thornton, sophist, singer and satirist, will sing his latest composition, "When You Were Sweet Sixteen." Next is to be a week of old favorites, it seems, at the Orpheum. Others are Harry Linton and Leila McIntyre in "Mr. Quack of Quackenbush." Miss McIntyre is to appear as the heroine of "The Sleeping Beauty and the Beast," by the way, next season.

The Star Role Nuisance

The comic opera season is drawing to a close at the Tivoli, and Hartman and his merry associates will soon take to the road to give the grand opera folks a chance to entertain. "The Idol's Eye" was revived Monday night with Hartman in the star role. That is the unfortunate feature of such pieces as those that have lately been on at the Tivoli—the star role. When a piece is written for a star, especially a star with a voracious appetite for all the "fat," all the other performers are subordinated into obscurity. This is not to be regretted when the star is supported by mediocre talent which is often the case, but it is worse than painful to go to the Tivoli and see talent going to waste. Ferris Hartman is of course all right, and he is undoubtedly a great Tivoli favorite. Tivoli audiences will stand as much of him as Broadway does of Dan Daly, and with much more reason, for Daly is one of the worst I ever saw, but it is irritating to hear such superb voices as those of Frances Graham and Arthur Cunningham, and be denied the pleasure of hearing them more than once throughout a whole performance. And when you know that there is such a tenor as Harold Gordon—the best that the Tivoli ever had in light opera—lying around loose, because he could not be crowded into a cast, you feel like inveighing against everybody that ever prostituted his talents by writing for a star. I enjoy Hartman in "The Idol's Eye," and I think that Cashman is funnier and more grotesque than Wheelan as the Hoot Mon, but I should prefer not to see Frances Graham and Arthur Cunningham in the cast. They irritate by their failure to do as much as you would like to see them do. You are harried by the hope that they will break into song. If they weren't there you could concentrate all your attention on Hartman and Cashman and enjoy "Fairy Tales."

My Josephine

This old poem, by Winthrop Mackworth Praed, was cleverly parodied by Mr. Peter Robertson at a Bohemian Club jinks. It is published by request of several readers. —Ed.

We did not meet in courtly hall,
Where birth and beauty throng,
Where luxury holds festival,
And wit awakes the song;
We met where darker spirits meet,
In the home of sin and shame,
Where Satan shows his cloven feet,
And hides his titled name;
And she knew she could not be, love,
What once she might have been,
But she was kind to me, love,
My pretty Josephine.

We did not part beneath the sky,
As warmer lovers part,
Where night conceals the glistening eye,
But not the throbbing heart;
We parted on the spot of ground
Where we first had laughed at love,
And ever the jests were loud around,
And the lamps were bright above.
"The heaven is very dark, love,
The blast is very keen,
But merrily rides my bark, love—
Good night, my Josephine!"

She did not speak of ring or vow,
But filled the cup of wine,
And took the roses from her brow,
To make a wreath for mine;
And bade me, when the gale should lift
My light skiff o'er the wave,
To think as little of the gift
As of the hand that gave;
"Go gaily o'er the sea, love,
And find your own heart's queen;
And look not back to me, love,
Your humble Josephine!"

That garland breathes and blooms no more,
Past are those idle hours;
I would not, could I choose, restore
The fondness of the flowers;
Yet oft their withered witchery
Revives its wonted thrill,
Remembered—not with passion's sigh,
But, oh! remembered still.
And even from your side, love,
And even from this scene,
One look is o'er the tide, love,
One thought with Josephine!

Alas! your lips are rosier,
Your eyes of softer blue,
And I have never felt for her
As I have felt for you;
Our love was like the bright snow-flakes,
Which melt before you pass—
Or the bunnle on the wine, which breaks
Before you lip the glass.
You saw those eye-lids wet, love,
Which she has never seen;
But bid me not forget, love,
My poor Josephine!

On Being Rejected

Nothing makes a man feel meaner than when, after his inamorata has spurned him, she goes and marries another fellow who he feels is his superior mentally and morally.

Nothing would give him such balm for his wounded heart than to see her who had rejected him bound to a fellow twenty times the inferior of himself.

—The Jilted.

Marking the Difference

Mrs. Snobbe: Who is that charming young man with the delightful manners?

Mr. Snobbe: Oh, that's our host's entry clerk, whom he asked me to invite at the last moment, to fill a vacant place.

Mrs. Snobbe: What effrontery! The idea of his having such manners. Why, if this continues, we will have to drink from our saucers and eat with our knives to mark the distinction between us and the canaille.

A Hot Melodrama

She had been a Poor but Honest factory Gyurrel. And She had been Virtuous though Pretty. Her parents firmly Believed that she was Destined to become the Wife of an Industrious Mechanic, and the Mother of a large family. Her Modesty and her beautiful Face filled them with Great Expectations. She did not betray that Fondness for Sunday picnics which spoiled her Sisters. They could look into the Dim Vista of the Future and see her Cooking the evening meal for her Horny-handed Husband and their several Olive Branches. They rejoiced over the Prospect.

Such in brief was the Heroine of the up-to-date Melodrama, "Ruined by Riches, or The Romance of a Factory Girl."

In the great Third Act on which the Dramatist concentrated his great and Transcendent genius, the heroine is revealed in a Gorgeously furnished Palace on Nob Hill.

She is the Mistress of the Palace. Her old Mother, tear-stained and travel-soiled, is with her.

"And so you have fallen to this!" exclaimed Materfamilias.

"Don't roast me, Ma," pleaded the heroine from behind her diamond studded fan, "I know I was weak. I was tempted and I fell."

Ma raised her calico skirt as though she feared Contamination from her Daughter's silk one.

"But he promised to Marry me, Ma."

"And you deserted your old home in Shipley street to come here, to this gilded cage. Never did I dream a Daughter of the O'Rourkes would come to this."

"But he deeded it to me, Ma."

"The Wretch!"

"And he also gave me an automobile."

"The Scoundrel!"

"And a bucket of diamonds."

"The Villain!"

And then they fell into each other's arms and wept bitterly. The situation was pathetic. But in the next act the hero, a poor newsboy, rushed in waving a Marriage Certificate, and there was general Rejoicing when the curtain went Down. —The Critic.

LETTERS

Advice to Writers in Embryo

It was the genial Autocrat who counseled those in doubt whether to write and tell an author that his books had pleased them, not to doubt but write. One author, to whom some one remarked that he had resisted his inclination because, as he thought, authors were annoyed and overburdened with gushing correspondence, was told that the rarest experience which they have is the letter of approval unaccompanied by some request for an autograph, a subscription or donation, or advice and assistance in "breaking in." Authors, like actors, are popularly supposed to have nothing to do "between times," but place themselves at the disposal of society and the aspirants after honors. Any one who has had a book published is supposed to hold the "open sesame," and it is only jealousy and selfishness which prevent him from communicating the magical pass-word. Some one has said that the kindest course for authors and editors is to rigidly discourage all who apply to them for advice. The faintest and most colorless expression which can be interpreted as favorable will be taken as encouragement, and the self-deluded ones will keep on, year after year, attempting the impossible for them. If there is a real call to literary work, no amount of discouragement will avail. It is a curious fact that while no one would go to a successful merchant or manufacturer or banker and demand to be initiated into his methods, or set up in business, it is made a great grievance that writers do not encourage every tyro who appeals to them for aid. It seems to be useless to tell them that the "secret" is incommunicable and that each must discover methods and pioneer paths for himself. Literary periodicals are to blame to some extent for this, for they print and reprint articles describing, or purporting to describe, how one author or another "lives and works," and there seem to be no pictures so popular with them as those of writers, pen in hand, in the "act of composing."

The Best Sellers

The opinion has gained ground that lists of "the best selling books" have been so systematically doctored as to be no reliable criterion, and that either the practice of making them public will entirely cease in the near future, or some plan will be formulated by which their approximate accuracy will be guaranteed. The lists, as they now stand, are made up from the reports of dealers, and though it is admitted that in the four cases out of five the nominal best-sellers are entitled to a place, they are not enumerated in the order in which they are actually disposed of. When there is reason to believe that some book is to enjoy a "boom," book sellers naturally place large advance orders, and they are obliged to get rid of their stock or suffer a loss. The consequence is that they produce an artificial demand by supplementing the publisher's advertisement, and by filling their windows and calling attention to what they have. The lists of "best selling" are always made up from the new books, but how many copies must be disposed of before a volume is entitled to be listed is "one of those things which no fellow can find out." It is out of the question to believe that any half-dozen books in any month, or even in any year, will reach the hundred-thousand mark, and it is within the bounds of possibility that the sale of a dozen copies, that is, three or four a week, is a pretty fair stroke of business. At all events, there is no special good brought about from the compilation of "best selling" lists. They may feed an author's vanity in some instances, and they may serve the useful purpose of bellwether to the flock who are not independent enough to read what they like whether it be the latest craze or not, but one can hardly imagine the class who feed their brains on the thin diet of "popular successes" having minds enough to look over the lists for guidance.

From One Who Knows

Frank Norris is a genial optimist on the question of the effect of libraries on the profits of the author. Instead of taking the general view that every library patron is to be written with a minus sign on the purchasing side of the ledger, he argues that books are read from libraries where people would go without reading if they had to buy from their own pockets. He thinks the library copies foot up to a considerable number themselves, and it is better in the long run, for authors, that people should read from libraries than that they should lose the habit of reading. Eventually, in Mr. Norris' opinion, a considerable number of the library patrons will become dissatisfied with public ownership, and want their own books, and authors can afford to be patient now for the sake of future advantages. When that time comes, it is to be hoped that public taste will have undergone a regeneration, and "libraries" will not consist entirely of the class of books which figure on the popular lists, not one in ten of which will stand a second reading.

A Literary Morgue

President Elliott thinks that one of the supplementary needs of the modern library is a storehouse for dead books, a sort of literary morgue. When one considers the vast quantity of printed matter which must be bought year after year to please patrons, and the large percentage of it which becomes practically useless in the course of a very short while after it has appeared, there is no questioning the sound sense of President Eliot's idea. Apparently much of the accumulation could be disposed of at the end of the year, as waste paper, and the usefulness of the library be not impaired thereby, but there is no means of actually determining when a book is finally dead. Sometimes volumes remain on the shelves undisturbed for years, and then some incident in the world's history, or some natural phenomenon will awaken interest once more, as witness the sudden demand for Bulwer's "Last Days of Pompeii," which is so great as to exhaust the supply on hand, because of the late catastrophe in Martinique. Librarians can never be certain that some branch of research will not send scholars delving in lore forgotten to all but themselves, and one cannot but believe that there has been an overturning of musty tomes by purveyors to the popular taste, in searching for backgrounds upon which to paint historical portraits. For the ordinary reader, no doubt, "the latest is the best," but there is always a certain percentage who like, or need original documents. An examination of the date-slips in books, especially in works of fiction, is a pretty fair indication of the life that is left in them, and it would seem as if those volumes which are not taken out oftener than once in a year, or even longer, might be put into storage and the space left for other things. One copy of such a work ought to be sufficient, or one left on the shelf, and one in reserve, while the remainder could be sold by weight to the junk man, after patrons had been given their opportunity to purchase what they might wish for. It does not follow that all books thus disposed of would come under the head of trash. On the contrary, some of the very best might be disposed of, but the walls of a library building are not elastic. The patrons are the ones for whom the institution is maintained, and if they manifest their sense of value in a negative way by making no use of certain books, it is tantamount to a vote that those books are useless. One reason why a large number of really good books are never taken out is because they are to be had only in old-fashioned editions, small print, unleaded, and often with double columns, which are a prohibition to aging sight, and unattractive to the young.

To Give One a Chance to Read

Miss M. G. Tuttiett (Maxwell Gray) is of opinion that if the supply of fiction were shut off for at least twenty years, it would be not only no loss, but a decided gain. It is not that the stories have all been told, for they were all told long ago, perhaps even before the age of writing, but we have too much fiction, and people rush through book after book with no definite idea beyond the one of keeping up with the press. If the supply were cut short for a score of years a generation could grow up interested in something besides the latest love story. There would be time and inducement to read Scott, Dickens, Jane Austin, George Eliot, the Brontes, and the host of others scarcely known now by name to the later generation. Maxwell Gray thinks the flood of cheap and poor trash which overwhelms us is to be attributed mainly to James Payn and Sir Walter Besant, both of whom did their worst for literature by their essays and papers encouraging every one to have a try at novel writing and showing what a mechanical process the making of a novel might be. The result is the machine made novel, and the railroad reader. One begets the other. One reason for the quantity of poor books is the cheapness of publication. There are comparatively few publishing houses which will refuse to get out a book provided the cost of publication is assured, and with machine composition and binding, the cost is reduced to a minimum. A good-sized edition can be produced for about three hundred dollars, and it has to be a very poor author in every sense of the word who has not that sum of his own or cannot inspire three hundred dollars' worth of confidence from his friends. At the present stage of development there is a large number of people interested in books who belong to a class that have not heretofore been readers. They have no tradition to guide them either in taste or in other matters. A book is a book. A typical specimen of the class is the Chicago lady who agreed to purchase a set of Balzac on the assurance of an agent that the books were just the thing for her children. Balzac meant nothing to her; it was probably the first time she had ever heard of him, and she was probably as blissfully ignorant of all else pertaining to literature. Owing to the cheapness with which books are produced, much of the class of stuff which was once gotten out in paper covers, and found its circulation below-stairs, is now neatly and even elegantly bound, and circulates in the upper stories. It is probable that the best books still sell largely in the best circles. Otherwise it would not seem to be a good business proposition for publishers to get out new editions and sets of those writers known as standard or classic. One does not expect to find readers of George Eliot or Thackeray sitting down to enjoy a third-rate love story simply because it is advertised as in its -nth edition of over five hundred thousand. Still, when one considers that children form 35 per cent of the patrons of libraries, and that they are left unrestrained to feed on fiction, it does look as if there were sound sense at the back of the idea that the world would not suffer if no more novels were written for a good many years. Children naturally read what is easiest to them and even with the best intentions, not one in a score knows how to select a book. Many a child has been deterred by happening to take hold of a volume printed in uninviting style, from examining into that author's works. The majority of them simply fit their feet to the tracks of some companion and follow a weak leader until taste and habit are formed. The present methods of education lead children to impudence, but not to real independence, and it is the exceptional one who knows how to think. Parents do not guide and teachers dare not, so it looks as if the next best thing is to restrict the output.

MUSIC

Concert Programs and Culture

"Our programs for concerts and recitals of vocal music are veritable foreign linguistic conglomerates. The silly custom of music-makers to belittle their art productions with outlandish and meaningless labels has about reached the utmost limit. Here is a sample: "Nocturne Opus 62 No. 2; Sonata a major; Fugue a minor; Etude Opus 10 No. 6," etc., etc., or a long list of German or Italian titles for songs and arias. What do such announcements on a program convey to the average patron of the concert room? If the popular love of music were not so great such programs would be chilling enough to induce many to eschew the concert-hall and, indeed, the tendency in that direction is much greater than is evidently recognized by the musical compilers and publishers. It is true that music suggests more than language can describe, nevertheless a liberal use of suggestion by title and description of the purport of any and every piece of music is indispensable. Instead of Latin words which give only a bare suggestion of the character of a piece of music, we should have a full designation and mental picture given us in plain language of every number on a program, so as to give at least a hint of the intention of the music we are about to hear. Songs in the native language, oratorio, cantata, choruses, opera, take care of themselves, the language being already an integral part of them. America has entered the field of producing its own music, its own singers, composers and musicians, in which the native language must play an important part. It is to be hoped that they will not ape the custom of using foreign terms, titles and notations to indicate what should be said in plain words of the mother tongue."

The above is the sort of thing that makes a musician tear his hair. The average patron of the concertroom, if he cares as much for music as he pretends he does, can by a little study and attention reach such a stage of familiarity with musical compositions that such titles as Sonata A major, or Fugue A minor are neither meaningless nor outlandish. The concert-goer who criticises in this way is the one who does not know the difference between a symphony and a suite, and who imagines that Palestrina was a composer of pretty tunes. He would do better to familiarize himself a little with the history and laws of music and if he would also teach his ears to listen he would not demand "a full designation and mental picture given us in plain language of every number on a program." Fortunately for art, musicians do not write for "the average patron of the concert room" if such are his ideas.

A New Concert Company

La Boheme is the name of a new quartet and concert company that gave a very successful program in Heine hall last week. The quartet is composed of Carlos N. Keller, first tenor, C. Ernest Edwards, second tenor, Will Louis Smith, baritone, and Carl M. Yoho. The quartet in its several selections showed itself excellently harmonized and balanced, and the members in their solo selections were equally as happy as in the concerted numbers. Mr. Yoho made a particularly strong impression in his bass numbers. He sang David's "King of the Winds" with such fine expression that the audience insisted upon an encore, and after this was granted the singer was importuned for another selection which however he would not grant. The other members of the concert company are Miss Marie Griffith, soprano; Miss Winifred June Morgan, violinist; Miss Maybelle Kelly, pianist; Miss Fern Frost, Ray Hanna and J. C. Tupper, accompanist. Of these Miss Kelly is deserving of more than passing mention. She is one of the juvenile pupils of E. S. Bonelli, and of not only unusual talent but rather more than the average understanding. Her solo was Chopin's Fantaisie impromptu, opus 66, which she interpreted with decided intelligence and easily overcame the mechanical difficulties.

The Etude for June contains the prize essays on the teaching of music. The first prize was gained by Edith Symond Winn of Boston, teacher of the violin.

Prof. and Madame Beringer and Miss Gladys Beringer are at Aqua Caliente Springs.

A Cross of Wits

The minister of Douglas, in Clydesdale, was one day dining with a large party where the Hon. Henry Erskine and some lawyers were present. A dish of water-cresses being, according to the fashion of the period, handed round after dinner, the minister helped himself much more largely than any other person. As he ate with a peculiar voracity Mr. Erskine was struck with the idea that he resembled Nebuchadnezzar in his state of condemnation. Resolved to give him a hit for the grossness of his taste and manner of eating, the wit addressed him with:

"Doctor, ye bring me in mind of the great king Nebuchadnezzar."

The company was beginning to titter at the ludicrous allusion, when the reverend devourer of cresses replied:

"Ay, do I mind ye o' Nebuchadnezzar? That'll be because I am eating among the brutes, then!"

Not Hard Enough Work

Mr. Cyrus Foss, son of the eloquent Bishop of the Methodist Episcopal church, was once introduced to an eminent minister of that church at Minneapolis.

"Ah," said the minister, "you are the son of Bishop Foss, are you? I know him very well, and am glad to know you. I suppose you are going to be a minister, too?"

"No, sir," replied the young man, promptly, "I am going to earn my living!"

A More Elaborate Toilet

In the biography of Dr. Hawtrey, a famous English schoolmaster, there is a description of his unkempt appearance, with a comment which has been greatly quoted. It is said that he was scolding, for being late at morning lesson, a boy, who replied that he had no time to dress.

"But I can dress in time," said the doctor."

"Yes," replied the boy, "but I wash."

A Mistake in Couples

A Baptist minister, of Vermont, narrated a ludicrous incident of his early life. Soon after being settled over a new congregation, he received a note asking him to be at home that evening at eight o'clock. The writer added that he was intending to be married at that hour, and would call at the parsonage with his bride. A few minutes before eight the door-bell rang and the servant announced that a young couple awaited the minister in the parlor. The pastor found a neatly dressed young man and a young woman.

"I am Mr. Homer," said the young man, "and this is Miss Cross."

Having another engagement for the evening, the minister said, immediately:

"I received your note this morning, and we will proceed with the ceremony at once. Please join your right hands."

In bewilderment, which the minister mistook for embarrassment, the couple timidly clasped hands." The ceremony was about to begin, when the young man said:

"I-we-what ceremony is it?"

"Why, the ceremony of marriage, of course."

"O-o-o-h!" shrieked the young lady.

"I don't understand this at all," said the young man; "we came here simply as a committee from the Young People's Society of the Methodist church, to ask you and your wife to be present at a public entertainment we are about to give, and—"

At that moment the maid ushered in the right couple.

His Colleague's Fault

An old anecdote of Dean Liddell was told by the old boys of the Blue Coat School (Christ's Hospital), London. Sometimes a boy would construe a passage differently from Dr. Liddell's interpretation, giving "Liddell and Scott" as his authority. The lexicon being produced and the boy's appeal thus sustained, the learned doctor would invariably exclaim:

"Dear! dear! what can Mr. Scott have been thinking about?"

A Methodist minister residing near Boston had as guests two fellow-preachers who were deaf. On asking one of them to "lead in prayer" at family worship each supposed he was the one invited, and so kneeled down and communed. Both being deaf, the host had no little difficulty in stopping one and explaining the precise state of the case.

Wendell Philips was waiting once for the train, at Essex Junction, Vt., where passengers at times have to exercise great patience. He saw a graveyard, not far from the depot, very full of graves, and he inquired the reason. A Green Mountaineer calmly informed him that it was used to bury passengers who died while waiting for the train.

OFFICE CHIEF of POLICE

It gives me much pleasure to recommend to the public Mr. George Mayerle of San Francisco. I have been using glasses for the past four years and during that time have consulted several opticians, but not until I consulted Mr George Mayerle and had him fit glasses to my eyes did I get entire satisfaction.

Most Respectfully,

J. H. ANDERSON.
